The Earl of Carnarvon observed, that the arguments of the noble earl and of the noble and learned lord, went to prove, that an act of indemnity was necessary on every occasion in which the magistrates exerted themselves to preserve the peace of the country. Did the noble earl mean to say, that the magistrates last year exceeded their powers, and that they, therefore, came to parliament for indemnity? If so, and if the necessity were manifest, that indemnity parliament would not refuse. But he denied that it was to be taken for granted, that when magistrates exerted themselves in the case of tumultuous assemblies, they necessarily violated the law, and must have an act of indemnity to protect them. He supported his noble friend's amendment, not because he thought indemnity unnecessary, but because in this, as well as in other parts of the bill, their lordships were legislating in the dark.

The motion was then negatived without a division.

Lord Erskine rose for the purpose of adding a proviso of some importance to one of the clauses of the bill. He admitted the necessity of protecting magistrates who acted to the best of their judgment, but parliament had always shewn itself reluctant to go beyond a certain point. Thus, before the 41st of Geo. III. was passed, if a conviction were had before a magistrate, and that conviction were afterwards quashed, the magistrate was liable to an action, even though he acted bona fide: that statute had now settled the contrary; the legislature taking care, however, to insert a clause which expressly excepted actions upon the case, where it could be shewn that the magistrate had acted maliciously, and without reasonable or probable cause. In the same spirit, his lordship proposed the following proviso to be inserted in the bill upon the table:—"Provided always, &c. that nothing herein contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, to any act, matter, or thing, &c. where it shall appear that any person or persons shall have been committed maliciously, and without reasonable or probable cause." His reason for introducing this provision, was to provide against cases, if such existed, where magistrates had atrociously and infamously abandoned or exceeded their authority for purposes of oppression, by interfering among assemblies where the people would, perhaps, have quietly dispersed themselves. The only objection that could be made to it on the other side, would be founded upon the words of the preamble, that the magistrate was to be protected on the ground that injurious or dangerous disclosures might be made. Surely such a pretext could not avail at a time when there was no pretence for saying that the country was not in a state of the most profound tranquillity. The committee would no doubt recollect former acts passed to give magistrates extraordinary powers, at a time when large meetings were held for parliamentary reform; perhaps ten times as many persons had there been collected as in these mighty insurrections, as they were ostentatiously called, yet no act of indemnity had been afterwards passed to protect magistrates who might have exceeded the authority entrusted to them. Alderman Kennett (for whom his lordship had unsuccessfully appeared as counsel) was convicted on one occasion of not having gone far enough. He was charged with being too backward in his endeavours, and the verdict against him proceeded upon the ground that, in that respect, he had not acted bona fide. His lordship insisted, that no magistrate ought to be indemnified, if it did not appear that his acts had been perfectly conscientious, and directed to the preservation of the public peace.

The Lord Chancellor said, if the proviso suggested were adopted, it would nullify the whole of the measure. If the house would not pass any bill of indemnity, let it be so said distinctly; and magistrates and others would know to what they had to trust; but if the proviso were introduced, it would be a mere mockery to call this a bill of indemnity. The noble lord had referred to the case of Alderman Kennett, whose cause he had unsuccessfully pleaded, a circumstance not very usual with the noble lord, in his practice at the bar. The noble lord could not, however, have forgotten, that that gentleman actually died of a broken heart, in consequence; so deep an effect had it had on his mind—yet the noble lord was unwilling to concede any thing to spare magistrates from the distress and vexation, and innumerable suits against them, which, if ending in conviction, might perhaps lead to a similar catastrophe. The large meetings to which the noble lord had referred were, under pretence of a parliamentary reform, to effect a revolution, and on this account it was, that magistrates were armed with such large powers.—His lordship contended, that, in the former bills of indemnity, not even in those of the time of King William, could any such exception be found; and though he was most anxious to protect the liberties of individuals who might, in some instances, have been slightly aggrieved, yet he thought that the general welfare demanded, that this bill should be passed in its present form.

The Earl of Rosslyn said, he could not consent to the sacrifice of the rights of so many persons for the sake of protecting a few magistrates from actions. It seemed admitted that some alteration in the preamble was necessary, inasmuch as it did not state the true object of the measure, which was not merely to prevent disclosures, and to protect those who gave evidence on which magistrates had acted, but also to cover with a shield the magistrates themselves, however unwarrantable and illegal had been their proceedings. The noble and learned lord had given no sufficient answer to what had fallen from the noble mover of the proviso, who was anxious not to expose magistrates who had acted bona fide, but to open the courts of justice against those who had availed themselves of their authority to oppress and imprison individuals. The noble and learned lord had stated most truly, that, by the indemnity acts of William III., of 1715, of 1745, and those that had passed since, illegal acts which had been committed were indemnified. It was the only justification of an indemnity bill, that when, to preserve the peace of the country, the law had been violated in particular instances, those who, from a sense of public duty, had committed the violation, should be protected against the consequences of their conduct; but, in this case, it had been averred that no illegal acts were done, and that an indemnity was intended only to prevent actions, which, if proceeded in, might lead to disclosures inconsistent with the public safety. Where, therefore, malice was offered to be proved against magistrates pretending to act for the public good, no indemnity should be allowed to prevent the plaintiff from proceeding, or shut the doors of justice against him. In the first Irish indemnity act, this principle was recognized, and the distinction between illegal and malicious arrests or detention was established, though the act had been afterwards altered.

The amendment was then negatived without a division.

The Marquis of Lansdown proposed, as an amendment, to omit the word "Ireland," and to retain only the words "in that part of the United Kingdom called Great Britain." The provisions of the suspension act did not extend to Ireland, and that country should, therefore, be excepted from those of the indemnity bill.

Lord Sidmouth said, that the indemnity had no reference generally to Ireland, but the name of that part of the united kingdom was necessary to be retained, to meet a special case. A suit might be instituted in the courts of that country, at the instance of a person who was apprehended there for acts done in Great Britain, and it was necessary, therefore, to protect the magistrate who had executed the warrant of arrest.

The Marquis of Lansdown remonstrated against such a general introduction for a particular purpose, and that without any communication to parliament of its nature.

Lord Sidmouth said, that he had no difficulty in alluding to the case. A warrant had been issued against an individual, who had fled to Ireland. He was apprehended in that country, and therefore, unless Ireland remained in the bill, the magistrate who executed the warrant would be liable to an action.

Lord Holland objected strongly to the clause as it stood. Let the particular case be named, however objectionable, rather than leave the exception general. He believed that the magistrates of Ireland, like the magistrates of Great Britain, were active, and generally exemplary, in the discharge of their duty; he did not mean to speak of them with the slightest disrespect; but he too well knew the state of that country, not to feel that a general bill of indemnity for acts done by the magistrates in Ireland, would be a bill of indemnity for many acts of atrocious outrage. After the act of indemnity in Ireland, which followed the suspension of the habeas corpus in 1797, an action was brought in that country by a person of the name of Doyle, against an individual whose conduct he (Lord Holland) had had the misfortune to bring under their lordships' consideration, a Mr. Judkin Fitzgerald, accusing him of acting in his magisterial capacity with malicious motives; and, although the act of indemnity was in force, Doyle obtained a verdict, and sentence was about to be pronounced. In order to save this gentleman, if gentleman he could be called, another indemnity bill, with a sweeping clause, was passed by the Irish legislature. He (Lord Holland) knew not if the bill then before their lordships would screen such acts as that to which he had just adverted. But when it was notorious that for the last five and twenty years there had not been a year unproductive of deviations from law on the part of some of the magistrates of Ireland, their lordships ought to be cautious how, for the purpose of meeting an unknown and conjectural case, they agreed to a clause which might deprive the Irish people of their redress for such injuries. The remedy ought not to extend beyond the evil, and the indemnity ought to be confined to the particular case in question.

The Earl of Liverpool did not think that the principle of indemnity would be construed so broadly as to include any case but the one contemplated. He should, however, have no objection to an amendment, on the third reading, that would limit the operation of the act as it regarded Ireland to the special case in question. The history of that case was as follows:—A man of the name of Benbow, whose petition had been laid on their lordships' table, had fled to Ireland, with the hope of obtaining there the means of being conveyed out of the country, or of finally making his escape. A warrant was issued from this country for his arrest; and he was taken up in Ireland for acts done here, and not for any acts performed there. The magistrate who had executed the warrant in Ireland was liable to an action in the courts of that country. It was necessary, therefore, for his protection, that Ireland should be introduced into the provisions of the present bill. This clause, however, extended no indemnity to magistrates in Ireland, where the suspension did not operate, for any arrest which they might have authorized for acts done there.

The Marquis of Lansdown said, that all this proved the necessity of making the clause special. There was no objection to grant indemnity to the magistrate who apprehended Benbow; but if the clause stood as it was, it would introduce many inconveniences, and might be taken advantage of to protect other magistrates from the consequences of their illegal arrests. The preamble of the act alluded to a conspiracy in the kingdom generally, and except the clause were limited, so as to exclude Ireland, the indemnity might be construed to extend to that part of the empire.

The Earl of Liverpool said, that the first clause had no reference to Ireland. It was never pretended that any conspiracy existed there.

The Earl of Lauderdale concurred in the amendment, and said, that Scotland ought likewise to be excluded from the indemnity bill, as, it was said, that the powers of the habeas corpus suspension had not been exercised in that country. The act of last session merely suspended the wrongous imprisonment act; but, as the law of treason was the same in Scotland as in England, it could not operate in that part of the united kingdom.

After some further conversation between Lord Redesdale, Lord Holland, and the Lord Chancellor, the latter of whom proposed that the clause should extend to the cases of persons apprehended in Ireland for acts done in Great Britain, the amendment leaving out Ireland was passed, on the [illegible] it, on the bringing up of the report, a special clause should be inserted embracing the case alluded to.

The Earl of Carnarvon protested against the payment of double costs by the plaintiffs in such actions as might have been already commenced, without any anticipation of this act. He proposed that the infliction of double costs should be confined to all actions brought after the passing of the act. This would not interfere with the indemnity.

The Lord Chancellor said, it was his intention to propose that the plaintiffs in any actions which had been commenced before the 27th February, should not be liable to any costs.

Lord King was desirous that the infliction of double costs should be entirely withdrawn from the bill. Why, in addition to the evil of a deprivation of redress, were the unfortunate individuals who had been illegally treated, to be punished with the penalty of double costs? Suppose a person were apprehended on a malicious and groundless information, that he suffered a long imprisonment, and was utterly ruined in consequence. This was not an imaginary case. It was that of an individual in Ireland, who had been already alluded to, of the name of Doyle, on whom the most horrid tortures were inflicted by Mr. Judkin Fitzgerald, against whom he brought an action; but, in consequence of a second act of indemnity (the first not having been found sufficiently operative), he was defeated, and cast in 750l. costs, which proved his utter ruin. Conceiving that the words 'double costs,' conveyed as much injustice as two words could import, he moved to omit the word 'double.'

The Lord Chancellor observed, that the next provision of the clause enacted, that those who had commenced actions, but who stayed proceedings, would not be liable to any costs. The double costs were to be imposed only on those who, notwithstanding parliament had taken from them the ground of action, still proceeded.

Lord Holland allowed that the provision just described by his noble and learned friend was commendable; but contended, that the principle of inflicting double costs in such cases was unjust in itself. In an act like that under consideration, and which was extorted from parliament only by necessity, they should be cautious not to go one tittle beyond that necessity.

Lord King's motion was negatived without a division.

The Lord Chancellor then proposed his amendment, to exempt those from the payment of any costs, who might have commenced their actions before the 27th February.

The Earl of Carnarvon wished that the exemption should reach to the passing of the act.

The Lord Chancellor thought, that it would be sufficient to let it extend to the time at which the bill began to operate.

In that form the noble and learned lord's amendment was agreed to.

The Earl of Carnarvon proposed a new clause, framed for the purpose of limiting the operation of the bill to those cases in which the interference of the legislature was indispensably necessary. It was stated in the preamble as the ground of the measure, that the production of evidence in defence against actions, might be dangerous to the parties who had given the information, as well as to the general safety. The object of his clause was, to deprive any person of a right of action, whenever the secretary of state should make an affidavit before a judge, that the action could not be defended without danger to individuals, and injury to the public service. The way in which he intended to effect this was, by enacting, that before the commencement of a suit the solicitor of the party should give notice to the secretary of state, and if the secretary of state made no affidavit, such as he had described, in the course of a month, the information should be produced, and the proceedings should not be stayed; but that if the secretary of state made the affidavit within the month, then the action should be immediately stopped. Unless some proposition of this nature were adopted, the most oppressive acts would escape with impunity, even when not the slightest ground could be alleged for preventing an action.

The Earl of Liverpool replied, that the effect of the noble earl's clause, if passed into a law, would be to subject all the magistrates in the country, and all persons who had acted under them, to the discretion of the Secretary of State, to determine whether or not actions might be brought against them. Nor was this the only evil. The act for suspending the habeas corpus vested in the privy council, as well as in the Secretary of State, the power of granting warrants for the apprehension of suspected persons. The privy council, therefore, would also be subject to a similar discretion on the part of the Secretary of State. And who was the Secretary of State? His noble friend might not always be in that office. One of the noble lords opposite, in the event of any change in his Majesty's councils, might fill that situation, and it would then be to be submitted to that noble lord, whether actions might be brought against his noble friend! Parliament had adopted the only proper course under such circumstances, by appointing committees, who had investigated all the cases of apprehension that had occurred. He was persuaded that his noble friend had, in no instance, issued his warrant for the apprehension of any individual, which he would not readily submit to the examination of any parliamentary tribunal, acting under the seal of confidence, in order that they might determine whether or not he had been actuated by motives of public duty alone.

The Earl of Carnarvon, in reply, contended, that unless his clause were acceded to, the evils growing out of this act of indemnity would be much greater than the benefits resulting from it. The noble earl had said, that if the Secretary of State were changed, the direction would rest with another individual. Certainly, and so it ought, for the secrets of the office would be in the possession of that other individual. It was only by the adoption of some provision such as that which he had proposed, that he could be brought to consent to the great anomaly in British jurisprudence, of shutting the courts of justice against the injured and oppressed. He would not, at present, trouble the committee by pressing his clause, but he gave notice that he would introduce it again in the ultimate stage of the bill.

Their lordships then proceeded to the consideration of the preamble of the bill.

The Earl of Rosslyn proposed, in imitation of the precedent of 1801, after the word 'whereas,' to insert the words 'an act was passed in the last session, enabling his Majesty to secure and detain such persons as his Majesty suspected were conspiring against his person and government.'

The Lord Chancellor did not think it necessary to follow the precedent of 1801. In 1801, there had been only the existence of treasonable conspiracies; whereas, last year, serious insurrections had occurred, which rendered it necessary for the magistrates to act. The bill, therefore, was founded not on the suspension of the habeas corpus alone, but on that measure, and on the means which had been taken to suppress actual disturbances. He should prefer the precedent of much older acts of indemnity, the preambles of which contained no such recital as that suggested by the noble earl.

The Earl of Rosslyn replied, that the recital for which he moved described one of the grounds on which the bill was founded, and he left it to the noble and learned lord to supply the deficiency, by proposing an additional recital which should describe the other ground.

The amendment was negatived without a division.

The Earl of Lauderdale then rose and said, he did not expect that the amendment which he was about to propose would meet with a better fate than those which had preceded it; he would, however, persevere. Notwithstanding the observation of the noble and learned lord, he could not help thinking, that, as the report was in fact the ground and origin of the bill, so the language of the latter should be in conformity with that of the former. With this view he had selected a passage from the report, which he would beg leave to substitute for the first clauses of the present preamble. The sentences which he would read were not filled with all the words of unnecessary recital which incumbered the report itself; but he pledged himself that he had not added one word of his own. Instead of the language of the preamble, as it now stood, namely—"Whereas a traitorous conspiracy was formed for the purpose of overthrowing, by means of a general insurrection, the established government, laws, and constitution of this kingdom: and whereas divers persons have tumultuously, unlawfully, and in a disorderly manner assembled together, under pretence or for the purpose of proceeding to London in such numbers as greatly to disturb and endanger the public peace and tranquillity, and to cause terror and intimidation in the minds of his Majesty's loyal and peaceable subjects: and whereas, in order to secure the internal peace and tranquillity of the country, and to counteract such traitorous conspiracy, it has been deemed necessary," &c. he would beg to read as follows (keeping in only the word whereas):—" Whereas, on the 9th of June last, a rising took place in Derbyshire, and the insurgents were not formidable for their numbers (a laugh); and whereas it was pretended that the state of Nottingham was favourable to their designs (a laugh); and whereas some persons, about 100, were on that night assembled on the race-course near Nottingham; and whereas some of them were armed with pikes or poles; and whereas they dispersed about 2 o'clock (a loud laugh); and whereas the Derbyshire insurgents proposed to surprise the military in their barracks, and to become masters of the town of Nottingham; but, in the course of their march, some threw away their pikes, and retired before the military force appeared; and on the first show of that force the rest dispersed, their leaders attempting in vain to rally them (a loud laugh); and whereas a committee of inquiry having delivered it as their decided opinion, that not only in the country in general, but in those districts where the designs of the disaffected were most actively and unremittingly pursued, the great body of the people remained untainted even during the period of the greatest distress, (hear, hear,) it has been deemed necessary to apprehend, commit, imprison, detain without trial, &c." (a laugh, and hear, hear.) Their lordships would perceive, that he had used no words that were not in the report; and he, therefore, moved, that an amendment so constructed, and in every syllable warranted by their own secret committee, might be adopted, instead of the unauthorized preamble now before them.

The amendment was negatived.

The Earl of Lauderdale rose again. He said that the reception of his last amendment was not very encouraging, but he must venture another. Instead of the words " whereas divers persons, &c. assembled in such numbers as greatly to disturb and endanger the public peace and tranquillity, and to cause terror and intimidation," &c. he would recommend that the passage should run thus: " whereas divers persons assembled in such numbers as would, unless they had been immediately and easily dispersed, have disturbed the public, and would, if they had not instantly disappeared, have caused terror, &c." (A laugh.) Their lordships would see that this language was more in conformity with the report, and with the events themselves, than the sentence as it at present stood.

This amendment was also negatived.

Lord Holland rose to protest against the principle involved in the following passage:—" And whereas, in case the acts, &c. of the several persons employed in apprehending, committing, imprisoning, seizing, and searching as aforesaid, should be called in question, it may be impossible for them to justify or defend the same without an open disclosure of the information given, and the means by which the said traitorous designs and unlawful purposes were discovered; and it is necessary, for the safety and protection of the persons by whose information and means the same have been discovered, and for the future prevention of similar practices, that such information and means should remain secret and undisclosed." His lordship contended, that this paragraph sanctioned a principle unknown to English law, and dangerous to the constitution, to which secret tribunals had ever been a stranger. He thought also, that if this passage stood, something should be added in order to make the object of the bill more distinct and specific. At present, there was not a word that clearly expressed the real intent of the measure, or fairly met its origin and occasion.

The Earl of Lauderdale followed, and expressed a similar opinion.

The Lord Chancellor was ready to allow, that it would be better to be more specific; and with the permission of their lordships he would suggest a few words, which might be added after the word " undisclosed." His addition, if adopted, would be as follows:—" And whereas some of the said acts done may not have been strictly justifiable in law, but being done for the preservation of the public peace and safety, it is fit that the persons doing the same should be saved harmless in respect thereof."

Lord Holland said a few words on the inconsistency of adopting part, and rejecting part, of the precedent of 1801.

The amendment of the Lord Chancellor was then carried.

The Earl of Lauderdale rose once more to propose what he thought right, but what, he feared, would not be adopted. He should move, that, after the addition already made, the following words should be inserted: " Notwithstanding, there were some instances of instigators who provoked and excited the mischief they were about to reveal, &c."

This amendment was rejected.

Lord Holland then brought up the following clause, which was read and agreed to. " And be it further enacted, that all and every person and persons discharged out of custody as aforesaid, although he shall not have been discharged according to law, shall be deemed and taken to have been legally discharged out of custody."

The bill, with its amendments, was then ordered to be reported to-morrow.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, March 3.

POOR LAWS.] Returns were presented of the money levied throughout England and Wales for the maintenance of the poor.

Mr. D. Gilbert said, that, about three years ago, he brought in a bill for the purpose of obtaining the information now presented, in the hope of drawing the public attention to the most important subject which ever, perhaps, came before either house of parliament. Unless some limit could be set to the rapid progress of the poor-rates, the ruin of the country was inevitable. Since that period, a committee had been appointed to inquire into the subject; and he hoped, that they would not confine themselves to mere matters of regulation, but grapple with the main question itself. As an opportunity would soon be afforded for entering into this subject, he should not occupy the time of the house at present, but merely move, that the papers be printed.

Sir Charles Monck said, the country would not be satisfied, unless government came forward, and adopted some radical measure for relieving the people from the intolerable evil of the poor laws.

Mr. Calcraft was at a loss to know what gentlemen meant by some radical measure. If they meant that government ought to come forward, and propose the abolition of the poor-rates, he, for one, would enter his protest against such a doctrine. No such measure ought to be proposed, either by the government, or by any other body of men in that house. The poor-rate was an evil, no doubt; and that evil was still greatly increased by the manner in which the poor laws were administered. But this great evil arose chiefly out of taxation; and if the hon. gentleman who moved the printing of the papers, would but lend his aid to diminish the amount of taxation—to check the extravagance of government, he would contribute more effectually, perhaps, than he possibly could do in any other way, to the reduction of the poor-rates. The mal-administration of the poor laws, which no man could more regret than he did, was no argument against a legal provision for the poor. But, had not the poor-rates been gradually diminishing? From having seen them so high, and from seeing them fall, he was convinced that they would again be low. Gentlemen would have their corn bill—they wanted to have a high price for corn, labour low, and a moderate poor-rate. All these things they could not possibly have at the same time. If corn were high, labour could not be low, without there being heavy poor-rates. The labourers and their families must eat. Low labour was, no doubt, a great advantage in agriculture and manufactures; but it ought never to be so low as not to afford subsistence for the labourer and his family, in a style suitable to his condition in life. Whether his wages were 10s., 15s., or 20s. a week, he cared not, if it procured for him that degree of comfort to which he was entitled. If they wished to check the evils arising out of the system of the poor laws, no man could go farther than he was willing to go; but if it were intended to go against the principle of the act of Elizabeth, he, for one, should protest against such an innovation.

Sir C. Monck said, he did not mean that the house should go against the statute of Elizabeth, but that they should endeavour to remedy the abuses in the administration of the poor laws.

Mr. F. Lewis deprecated all discussion on this subject, at the present moment, as premature, and stated, that he should not imitate the conduct of the hon. gentleman, by going into the question. The subject was of the highest importance, being neither more nor less than the happiness or misery of a vast mass of the population. The committee had nothing so much at heart as to conduct the investigation of this matter in the most dispassionate manner, and to avoid coming to a hasty determination. Perhaps they would be blamed for their dilatory manner of proceeding; but it was better that they should err on the side of caution, than on the side of precipitation. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Calcraft) had asked, whether by setting themselves against the system of the poor laws, it was meant suddenly to withdraw from the people that relief which they had derived from the poor-rates? It was utterly impossible that any man in his senses could entertain a wish to get rid of the poor-rates altogether. Government, however, and the house, ought to set themselves against the existing system of the poor laws. The poor-rates, if they were allowed to go on increasing as they had done, would gradually absorb all the rents and produce of the country. When he said, therefore, that they ought to set themselves against the system, he said, he hoped that they would take such steps as would prevent this ruin, even to the paupers themselves. He should not enter into the subject at present; but, in the mean time, he had no hesitation in saying, that the people of this country would have been incomparably happier, from the highest to the lowest, if the statute of Elizabeth had never been enacted. When he said this, he did not mean to give an opinion that relief to the poor ought to be discontinued. With respect to what the hon. gentleman had said as to the country gentlemen wishing to have high prices for their corn, and low rates for labour, he wished to assure that hon. gentleman, that there was nothing they were less anxious to see than high prices of corn and low prices of labour. If there were any thing they were more anxious to do than another, it was to effect such a connection between the price of food and the price of labour, as would enable the lower classes to maintain themselves without any assistance from the poor-rates. (Hear, hear.) They had had but too many instances before them of the detestable system of paying the wages of labour out of those rates. They had had instances before them of farmers paying sixpence a day to their labourers, and paying them ten shillings and upwards out of the rates; thus taking from others nearly the whole of the wages of such labourers. A most mischievous practice had prevailed among some persons in this country; he meant that of manufacturing goods for exportation at a lower rate than that at which other persons could make them. This was done by charging part of the wages of the manufacturer on the land, which reaped no benefit from a trade of which it paid the cost. He would not have said a word of taxes, had it not been a second time urged, that the increase of the poor-rates arose out of the increase of taxation. Nothing in his opinion was less satisfactorily made out than the position, that taxation influenced the number of paupers, or the amount of the sums distributed to them. (Hear, hear.) He denied that this position had ever been satisfactorily proved. He had heard persons maintain, that the country was so impoverished by taxation, that it was unable to pay for labour. But the effect of taxation was only to take money, which already existed, from the pockets of one class of people, to put it into those of another. It merely altered the channels of expenditure,—it did not destroy the expenditure. That which was taken from the producer, and went into the hands of government, was laid out in the employment of soldiers and sailors, of persons who manufactured gunpowder, or muskets, or other warlike stores. Taxation merely changed the form and shape of the community. If they traced the money raised in taxes through the different channels of society, they would find that government was as large an employer of labourers as individuals would have been, if the sums paid by them in taxes had never been withdrawn from them. To take, for instance, the 27 millions annually paid into the hands of stockholders. There could be no doubt that this interest of stock employed as much labour as if it had not been withdrawn from the agricultural and other classes. They had all witnessed the distress which was felt throughout the country, by the want of a demand in many branches of industry, when government ceased to be a purchaser. He said, then, it ought not to be taken for granted that taxation was the cause of the great increase of the poor-rates. He did not mean to say, that there would have been so great an increase in the rates altogether, if the present accumulation of taxes had not existed; but, that the mere accumulation of taxes was by no means the principal cause of the increase of the poor-rates. Taxation rather changed the description of labourers, and the description of employers, than the amount of employment.

Mr. Brougham said, the hon. gentleman who had just sat down had deprecated all premature discussion of a subject of such importance as the poor laws, and promised to avoid imitating, in that respect, the example of those who had preceded him. In like manner he should begin by deprecating all premature discussion of this question, and promising to avoid entering into such a discussion. But there would be this difference between himself and the hon. gentleman,—that he would keep his promise; whereas, immediately after the deprecation of the hon. gentleman, it had seemed good to him to enter into a most delicate and difficult topic, which had not any connection with this important question. And having thus discussed the subject of the poor laws at considerable length, as if he had not sufficiently redeemed his pledge to the house, the hon. gentleman then entered into another subject, almost as important, namely, that of taxation. The discovery which the hon. gentleman had made on this occasion, was not, indeed, so self-evident as that which he had lately made,—that the country banks issued paper. The present discovery, however, though not so self-evident, was certainly highly curious; namely, that taxation had no effect whatever in increasing the number of paupers, or the sums necessary to be distributed among them; that is—it is of no consequence whether 1000*l.* were laid out in the employment of productive labour, or whether this 1000*l.* should be withdrawn from productive labour, and given to a sinecure lord of the admiralty, who did no work whatever. (Hear, and a laugh.) He had taken this instance, which might serve as a specimen of the doctrines of the hon. gentleman on this subject. But he would keep to his promise, and not enter into any discussion of this subject. He begged, however, to protest, in the first instance—for this was the first time he had heard this doctrine maintained in that house—against all and every part of it; and he should undertake to shew—when the time came for entering into such a discussion—with respect to what the hon. gentleman seemed to consider a great and important discovery, though, by the bye, it was not a new discovery, any more than that of the existence of country bank paper—that there never was a proposition more fallacious or more dangerous to the country; he should then shew, that the falsehood of this proposition was as demonstrable as the self-evident nature of his last discovery.

Mr. F. Lewis explained. He had never meant to say, that taxation had no effect in increasing the poor-rates: what he had said was, that the increase of paupers was not occasioned by taxation alone.

Mr. Brougham said, he had never heard it said by any persons, except the Spenceans, that pauperism was occasioned by taxation alone.

Mr. Calcraft said, the increase of pauperism might not be owing to taxation alone, but taxation was clearly an ingredient.

Mr. Curwen observed, that one twenty-fifth part of the wages of every labourer was taken for a single duty—that of salt.

The papers were then ordered to be printed.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Sir M. W. Ridley presented the following petition of several inhabitants of Newcastle-on-Tyne.—" That the petitioners cannot, without the most lively concern, contemplate the present calamitous situation of his Majesty's subjects of the United Kingdom, fully convinced as they are (in common, they believe, with the great mass of the intelligent part of the community) that the wide-spreading distress which prevails throughout his Majesty's dominions, originated in, and proceeds from, a still accumulating load of national debt, with its consequent burthen of taxation, entailing poverty, pauperism, and crimes on the community to an extent unparalleled in the history of this or any other country; that the petitioners are fully convinced that there is no means of averting impending national ruin and bankruptcy but by an immediate and radical reform of the Commons House of Parliament; that the practice of placing the lives, liberties, and property of his Majesty's subjects at the disposal of, or subject to, the caprice of a minister of state by the suspension of the constitution, is totally subversive of all law and justice, and from the numerous recent instances of the abuse of such power vested in the hands of ministers, the petitioners, and the country at large, are fully convinced of the necessity for a full, free, and fair representation of the people in parliament, as the only means to prevent the recurrence of such very abhorrent abuse of power in future; that the petitioners are convinced that there are no human means of preventing the total subversion of their once glorious constitution, and the establishment of an inquisitorial despotism, or of redressing the people's wrongs, unless by calling the collected wisdom and virtue of the community into council by the election of a free parliament; and the petitioners humbly pray, that the house will not grant any bill of indemnity to his Majesty's ministers to protect them from the vengeance of the insulted laws of the country in their late abuse of power, but, on the contrary, recommend it to his Royal Highness the Prince Regent to dismiss them from his councils as for ever unworthy his or the nation's confidence; that, through the usurpation of a corrupt borough faction, the petitioners, and nine-tenths of the people, have been basely put out of a condition of even assenting to taxation; and considering, that until their sacred right of election is restored no free parliament can have existence; wherefore the petitioners cannot conceive themselves any way responsible for the discharge of debts to the contraction of which they were not even allowed to consent; the petitioners therefore pray, that the house will be pleased without delay to pass a law for putting the aggrieved and much-injured people in possession of their undoubted and inalienable right to a representation co-extensive at least with direct taxation, to an equal distribution throughout the community of such representation, and of parliaments of a continuance according to the constitution, namely, not exceeding one year."

Ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

TITHES LAWS AMENDMENT BILL.] Mr. Curwen presented the following petition of several owners or occupiers of lands in the parish of Saint Cuthbert, in the county of Cumberland.—"That great uncertainty at present prevails respecting the validity of compositions, moduses, and prescriptive payments in lieu of tithes, which are and have been from time-immemorial paid in respect of lands, both in the county of Cumberland and other parts of England; and that this uncertainty is the cause of much expensive litigation between land owners and both ecclesiastical and lay proprietors of tithes; that many districts which had from time immemorial been exempted from the payment of tithes in kind, by moduses and prescriptive payments, have been by various decisions at law again subjected to such tithes, in consequence of which estates which have been purchased at high prices in confidence of the validity of such moduses or prescriptive payments, arising from their immemorial continuance, have been much deteriorated in value, to the great detriment of the present proprietors; that some amendments in the laws relating to tithes, and particularly for the protection and establishment of moduses and prescriptive payments, are highly necessary for the encouragement of agriculture, and that the bill for amending the laws relating to tithes, brought into the house during the last session, will, in the judgment of the petitioners, be beneficial for that purpose; and praying, that the said bill may be passed into a law, subject to such alterations and other provisions as may to the house seem expedient."

Ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

LIBERTY OF THE SUBJECT.] Mr. Bennet said, he held in his hand a petition to which he wished to draw the attention of the house. It was the petition of Jonathan Buckley Mellor, of Warrington, in the county of Lancaster, who had not been imprisoned under the suspension of the habeas corpus act. The act of which the petitioner complained was one of those measures which the noble lord, the Secretary of State for the home department, as head of the police of the country, had chosen to inflict on the country. The house would recollect the circular letter of the noble lord to the lords lieutenants of counties, directing magistrates to hold persons to bail who might be charged with selling libellous publications. Whatever might be the intention of the noble lord as to the degree of mildness or severity with which persons so arrested should be treated, the petitioner had been treated with a degree of cruelty hitherto unknown in the practice of this country. He trusted, therefore, that the house, however indifferent they had hitherto been to the grievances of the people, would, on this occasion, shew, that they would not allow individuals to be made the victims of most wanton, unnecessary, and unjustifiable cruelty.

The petition was then brought up, read, ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed. It was as follows:—"That the petitioner has for some time undertaken the sale of books, with a view to enable him to support himself and family in a more comfortable way than his wages as a servant would allow of; that, amongst the books and pamphlets which he received from his agent in the way of business, was a quantity of copies of a work styled 'The Political Litany;' that, upon the publication of Lord Sidmouth's circular, Mr. Thomas Lyon, junior, in February, 1817, sent one Mary Scholefield to purchase two copies of the litany from the petitioner, for the purpose, as it subsequently appeared, of having the petitioner arrested for the sale of this work; that Mr. Thomas Lyon, junior, notwithstanding his pretended alarm for the interests of religion, instituted no proceedings until the quarter-sessions in April had ended; his motive for this delay was solely to gratify his malice by subjecting his victim to a longer period of imprisonment; as soon as the sessions were over, he deputed Paul Caldwell, the constable, to arrest the petitioner; when taken into custody, the petitioner demanded to see the warrant upon which he was apprehended; the constable produced a pair of handcuffs, and with them securing the hands of the petitioner, replied they were his warrant: the constable took the petitioner to a public-house, and delivered him in charge to Mr. Thomas Lyon, junior, who was there waiting to know the success of his measures; the constable then returned to the petitioner's house, which he searched, and carried away from thence about seventy books and pamphlets in a sack, amongst which were Rollin's Antient History, Wynne's General History of America, Law's Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life, the Evangelical Magazine for two years, some Numbers of the Liverpool Mercury, a few of Cobbett's Registers, and other miscellaneous publications; Law's Serious Call, with some other books thus forcibly carried off, have never been returned; not one parody was found in the house, the one sold to Scholefield was the last sold by the petitioner, for, on learning that the Political Litany was considered by his Majesty's ministers to be blasphemous, he declined to sell any more, although strongly urged to do so by persons, who, he has reason to believe, were emissaries of Mr. Thomas Lyon, junior; soon afterwards, the petitioner destroyed every copy which remained: the petitioner was confined all night in the Bridewell, a dirty loathsome dungeon; he was then taken before the magistrates, Richard Gwyllym and Isaac Blackburne, Esquires, and by them ordered to be confined in the Workhouse, where he continued all night chained by the leg to a sixty pounds weight, without either bed or straw; the next day he was again examined before the same magistrates, who offered to liberate him on his procuring two sureties in the penalty of 50*l.* each, and himself in 100*l.*; the petitioner, not being provided with sureties, was again removed to his former situation for two nights more, with a similar appendage to his leg, and again without bed or straw; he was then conveyed in irons to the House of Correction at Preston; here he was, for six weeks, denied pen, ink and paper; he was confined at Preston fifteen weeks, from whence he was conveyed in irons, at twelve o'clock on a very wet night, in an open cart, to the quarter-sessions then holding at Ormskirk; there he was confined two days and nights, all the time in irons, in a dirty room crowded with prisoners, without any convenience to ease themselves from the burthens of nature except an open leaky tub in a corner, and without even straw to lie upon; on being brought into court, Mr. Peter Nicholson, the attorney for the prosecution, said he had a writ of certiorari to remove the business to the King's Bench; the petitioner was then conveyed back to Preston, handcuffed and ironed, along with convicts sentenced to transportation; in about four weeks more, he was, in consequence of a letter from Mr. Nicholson to the Governor of the House of Correction, discharged on his own recognizance to appear at the Court of King's Bench, in compliance with which, not having received any notice to the contrary, he went to London at a considerable expense of time and money, and, having appeared in court, he was ordered to appear at Lancaster at the March assizes, 1818; the petitioner, unconscious of having infringed upon any existing law, has, by these cruel and illegal proceedings, been imprisoned upwards of nineteen weeks, been conveyed like a criminal seventy miles, from Preston he had to return home, to travel to and from London at great expense, whilst his wife and family have been dependent on the scanty aids of parochial relief and the contributions of the benevolent, and he has lost a situation which, before his arrest, contributed materially to his support; the petitioner humbly prays that the house will take into their consideration the statement now submitted, and that they will adopt measures best calculated to secure the liberty of the subject, and to prevent a recurrence of the arbitrary, unjustifiable, and severe sufferings endured by the petitioner, from the magistracy, or any their inferior officers and agents."

Mr. Bennet then presented the following petition of Samuel Pilling, of Warrington:—"That on the 23d of April, 1817, Paul Caldwell, the deputy constable of Warrington, along with other persons, entered the petitioner's dwelling-house, and told him they were come to search for Cobbett's books, and though the petitioner did not in the least resist the search of his drawers and boxes, but offered to find them the key of one box which was locked, the deputy-constable ordered him away by one of the persons who accompanied; this person took the petitioner to the workhouse, adjoining to which is the prison of the town, a damp unwholesome place; the petitioner was not thrust into this hole, but was permitted to sit on a wooden sofa by the kitchen fire, with a chain locked round his leg, to which was fastened a 60lbs. weight; in this situation the petitioner was kept till the following day, and he was then taken before Richard Gwyllym and Isaac Blackburne, esquires, two magistrates for the county of Lancaster, before whom he was charged with selling to one John Scholefield, on the 8th February, 1817, a seditious and blasphemous pamphlet called 'The Political Litany;' John Scholefield not being present, the petitioner was ordered back to the workhouse, where he was chained to the 60lbs. weight as before, and was taken the next day before the aforesaid magistrates, where John Scholefield's wife deposed, that she bought the Political Litany from the petitioner on the 8th of February, 1817; John Scholefield deposed, that he received the said pamphlet from his wife, and delivered it to Thomas Lyon, junior, esquire; Thomas Lyon, junior, esquire, deposed, that he received the pamphlet so purchased from John Scholefield; on these depositions the petitioner was committed to the House of Correction at Preston, by the warrant of the aforesaid magistrates, there to lie till delivered by due course of law; that on the 26th of April the petitioner was taken like a felon with chains round his legs, fastened to the bottom of a caravan, and conveyed to the House of Correction at Preston, and was there put into confinement along with felons, and kept to hard labour till the quarter-sessions, held at Ormskirk on the 4th of August; to that place, a distance of 18 miles, the petitioner was removed during the night in an open cart, exposed to incessant rain, with chains on his legs, locked to persons charged with felonious acts; when the petitioner arrived at Ormskirk he was put into a room, and was kept there three days, locked to felons, and had nothing to lie on but the room floor, though he was at that time in a bad state of health, and he was there informed, that a writ of certiorari was come from the Court of King's Bench, and that he was to be tried at Lancaster, the Spring assizes; the petitioner was removed from Ormskirk to the House of Correction at Preston, in the same manner he had been conveyed thither, where he was kept five weeks longer in prison, during which time, being unwell with a stoppage of urine, and not being able to go to his daily work, he was severely treated by one of the turnkeys named Anderson, who threw him down, kicked him, and otherwise very much abused him, giving him two black eyes, because forsooth he was unable to work through illness; after being detained a prisoner at Preston for nineteen weeks, the petitioner was liberated on his own recognizance to appear at the Court of King's Bench, to be held at Westminster on the 6th November, 1817; there he appeared, and pleaded not guilty to the charges brought against him, upon which he was bound over to make his appearance at the next assizes to be held at Lancaster, where he will have to appear, a distance of about fifty-two miles; that the petitioner, on his return from Preston, found that Paul Caldwell, the deputy-constable, on the day of his apprehension, had seized the greatest part of his books and papers, many of them not of a political nature, carrying them off in a large basket belonging to the petitioner; and although the petitioner has applied to Isaac Blackburne, esquire, one of the aforesaid magistrates, who promised to speak to Mr. Peter Nicholson, the solicitor who managed the prosecution against the petitioner, to deliver them up, and although the petitioner has repeatedly applied to the said Mr. Nicholson, and to Paul Caldwell, the deputy-constable, they have not been returned to him; and the petitioner humbly conceives the first seizure of his books to be illegal, as well as the present detention of them; that the petitioner suffered very much from anxiety of mind, on account of a wife and two helpless children, who were left in a great measure destitute by his imprisonment; and he humbly prays the house will take into their serious consideration the cruel, unjust, and illegal treatment which he has received, and that they will adopt such measures as they in their wisdom may judge the best calculated to secure the liberty of the subject, and prevent a recurrence of the same cruel, unjust, and arbitrary treatment, which has been received by the petitioner from the magistrates and their subordinate agents, in consequence of Lord Sidmouth's circular."

On the question, that the petition do lie on the table,

Mr. Bennet rose and asked, whether it was the intention of the Attorney-General to bring these men to trial, after the three acquittals of Mr. Hone, the principal publisher of the parodies; or, whether he did not feel it his duty to discharge the recognizances under which they were bound to appear at the next assizes?

The Attorney-General apprehended there was a mistake in the supposition that the recognizances bound these men to appear at the next assizes. The recognizances, he believed, bound them to await the judgment of the Court of King's Bench. Unless they received notice of trial, they would not be bound to appear at the assizes.

Mr. Bennet said, the hon. and learned gentleman had not answered the question, whether he did not feel it his duty to discharge the recognizances? He certainly had no right to demand an answer.

The Attorney-General said, he had no hesitation in declaring, that, because a person had been acquitted for the publication of certain libels, he did not feel it therefore his duty to discharge the recognizances of persons under prosecution for publishing transcripts of those libels. (Hear.) Whether he should proceed in the prosecution of these men would be determined by a variety of other considerations; but he did not feel it his duty to forego the prosecution of what appeared to him to be a libel, because a person had been acquitted for publishing a similar libel in another place. He knew it had happened, that, in one place, a person had been acquitted of a libel on the publication of a paper, which, at another time and place, had been declared to be a libel by another jury, to the satisfaction of those who heard the trial. It was not for him to say on what grounds the jury acquitted Mr. Hone. He wished to cast no reflection on that verdict: it was right that the defendant should have the benefit of it. But he would take leave to say, that it did not satisfy him, that these publications might be ever after circulated with impunity. There were many circumstances which might have weighed on the mind of the jury in the case of Mr. Hone. Mr. Hone had proved, that, after a certain time, when he found those publications were disapproved of by many persons, he ceased to sell them. He thought it extremely likely that, considering this, and considering how, in former times, similar publications had passed without reprehension, they might have acquitted Mr. Hone, though they thought his publications mischievous. But did it follow that men vending this publication, which, if not a libel, was literally poison, (hear) through the country, should be suffered to proceed—to circulate it at the corner of every street? Did it follow, that the law officers should let this pass without animadversion? Since Mr. Hone had ceased to publish the parodies, other persons had re-published them, nearly at the same place in which they were first vended. They professed, that they had a right to do so, and desired, that the subject should be brought before a court of justice; and so valuable did they conceive these publications to be, that they talked of bringing actions for the copyright. Whether, in these individual cases, he should think it his duty to prosecute, would depend upon other considerations than the acquittal of Mr. Hone. The petitioner had been indicted at the Alston quarter-sessions, and he had thought fit to remove the cause to the Court of King's Bench, because, while the case of Mr. Hone was depending before a superior court, he did not think it fit to bring on a similar case before an inferior court.

Mr. Lyttelton said, he was glad that an opportunity had been afforded him of expressing his opinion on these detestable libels, for so, notwithstanding the verdicts of the juries, he should call them. He did not think that those verdicts, however conscientiously given, could, or ought, to alter the opinion of any man in the country. If he had been enabled at an earlier period of the session to express that opinion, he would have done it, not that he thought it of any importance that his opinion should be declared, but, because he looked upon it to be the duty of every man to contribute his mite towards correcting the mischief that might be produced by the verdicts which the juries had given in the case of Mr. Hone.—He thought it right to make an observation on these cases. Inquiries had been refused upon many petitions which detailed circumstances that, if true, reflected the greatest dishonour and disgrace upon the country, and the government, but which, if false, ought as soon as possible to be disproved. The hon. and learned gentleman (the Attorney-General) might consider whether, with all the hardships that had been endured by the persons from whom the last petitions had been presented, he would bring them to trial: but he agreed with him in one point—that if they should be tried, the verdict might happen to be given against them, though the cases were the same in outward form as that of Mr. Hone. He had stated his opinion on that; but he might say, that the effect of further prosecutions would, in his mind, rather augment than abolish the evil. The great cause of Mr. Hone's acquittal was, he thought, another and more important consideration than had been mentioned. He would take the liberty of submitting, whether the juries might not have been indisposed towards any state prosecutions, on account of the measures under which the people had been smarting (hear, hear,) and the manner in which other state prosecutions had been conducted: and it would be a question, how far such a state of mind might exist, when the bill of indemnity should be proposed to the house. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Brougham said, he thanked the hon. member for Worcestershire (Mr. Lyttelton) for an opportunity also of expressing his opinion on this subject. Notwithstanding the three verdicts, he should express his unqualified disapprobation of those reprehensible, and, in every point of view, disgusting publications. But he should not make any remark in disparagement of the verdict of the juries. Had he been upon those juries, considering the impunity of former publications of the same nature, he should have felt himself bound in conscience to have returned the same verdict. They were justified in the view they had taken of the case; they might, and he dared to say they did, consider that the prosecution was the effect of political craft, and not of religious zeal; that if ten times as much blasphemy, if ten times as much could be brought together in a publication, had been published on the other side of the question, they would not have been called upon to condemn the author as a libeller. They felt, that they would do their duty better, and serve religion more truly, by marking, with unqualified disapprobation, those who studiously prosecuted these performances on the one side, and who as studiously avoided those on the other; than by making themselves parties to an attempt to use religion as a cloak for political purposes. He spoke not lightly, when he spoke of things of the same nature from another quarter. There had been publications which appeared more disgusting and more disgraceful even than these; parodies not merely of the liturgy, but of large portions of Scripture. He alluded to those which had been published when the noble lord, and the bulk of his present colleagues, entered into office. At that time, parodies were in the course of publication, not by a few obscure individuals, or by a few dozen copies at a time, but circulated in great numbers under the special protection of those very persons who had carried on these prosecutions. Had they prosecuted those parodies? No. Because they were against their own political adversaries, and to serve their own political ends. He would say, that nothing could do so much harm against religion, as to make it a handle for political convenience, and that he was the worst enemy of religion who made a show of dealing out justice for its protection, and, in reality, acted on political grounds, and for political interests. But, it seemed, a man might blaspheme, he might send forth as much irreligion as he thought proper, as long as he meddled not with the conduct of government—he might abuse the ministers of religion unpunished, so long as he refrained from speaking ill of the ministers of the king—he might say, or publish, what he chose, so long as he was of the right stamp—he might take what liberties he pleased in the affairs of the church, so long as he left temporal subjects unprofaned. He had a most complete dislike of such publications themselves; but religion, he thought, for its own sake, ought never to furnish means for the expression of political displeasure. Was it to be wondered at that juries should condemn such a system, and declare by their verdicts, that the same measure of justice should be dealt out at all times, and to all persons?

Lord Castlereagh protested strongly against the doctrine which he had heard from the hon. and learned gentleman. He had never heard a doctrine which would be more fatal, if it were sanctioned, than this—that juries, acting on their oaths, should travel out of the question before them, and erect themselves into a political tribunal to judge of the motives of prosecutions. This would be fatal to every principle of law and justice. The parallel which the hon. and learned gentleman had mentioned, of publications of this kind, did not hold good. Writings of this nature, and very reprehensible ones, might have been published; but when they were not circulated among the lower orders, for the purpose of deluding them, and eradicating all feelings of religion—he did not know the publications to which the hon. and learned gentleman referred, but they were not addressed to the lower orders of the country. ("In newspapers," said Mr. Brougham.) But there was not that systematic circulation of them, in cheap publications. However, he would not go into that subject; he should now merely protest against the doctrine, that the jury should travel out of the question before them.

Mr. Brougham said, that the doctrine which the noble lord had imputed to him, was no doctrine of his. His doctrine had been, that, under peculiar circumstances, a jury could not act otherwise than as he had stated. When they found that libels of the same description as that they were trying had passed unpunished, when they found, that there was nothing to distinguish the cases, except the different politics of the writers—they would not punish the one, while the other was allowed to enjoy complete impunity.

Lord Castlereagh appealed to the house, whether the hon. and learned gentleman had not directly re-stated the doctrine which he had complained of.

Mr. Wilberforce was very glad that the hon. member for Worcestershire, and the hon. member for Winchelsea, (Mr. Brougham) had so decidedly expressed their opinions against parodies. He was himself entirely ignorant of the libel of which they had spoken. There was certainly a difference between libels which were widely circulated, and those which were not. He remembered a case of prosecution, in which a noble lord (Lord Erskine) had been particularly engaged. In that case, the question of prosecution and not prosecution was fully considered. It was, on the second part of Paine's Age of Reason; and, at that time, it was proved, that the circulation was such amongst all classes of society, that it could not be brought into greater publicity. The real question was, whether such publications had not a tendency to desecrate those things which a man ought to conceal in his bosom, and venerate in secret. And, if such were the conclusion, it might be recollected, that it was the office of the law, it was a part of the law of the land, that religion should be defended. Sir Matthew Hale, a great and excellent lawyer, had established that principle, and he was very glad to see that it was still maintained. He could not but feel grateful to his hon. friends that they had expressed such sentiments on the subject as he had heard from them, and he could not but express it as his opinion, that the officers of the crown would not have done their duty, if they had not exercised the authority of the law against the publications which had been mentioned.

Lord Cochrane said, that the origin of the grievances complained of arose from political motives, although those motives were not stated. The prosecutions were carried on under the pretext of protecting the interests of religion. This convenient handle was laid hold of, for the purpose of oppressing individuals who attempted to expose the conduct of his Majesty's ministers, in the manner which appeared to them most effectual. He hoped that the house would listen with attention to the prayer of the petition laid upon their table; and that, if the grievances complained of were found to be true, and supported by evidence, they would not screen the guilty from punishment.

The petition was then ordered to be printed.

SCOTCH BURGHS.] Lord A. Hamilton presented the following petition of the conveener of the trades, deacons of incorporations, burgesses and guild brethren of the royal burgh of Ayr, "That the petitioners address the house with feelings of profound respect and confidence in their inclination to restore to them their long-dormant, but inherent rights and privileges, as burgesses and guild brethren of the burgh of Ayr; that the town of Ayr was erected by William king of Scots, into a free burgh royal, with all the accustomed privileges, and, for upwards of three centuries, the burgesses and guild brethren enjoyed, in common with the burgesses of other burghs, the invaluable right and privilege of electing yearly their magistrates and council by a majority of their votes, which right and privilege they were deprived of by an act passed during the minority of James the third, in the year 1469; which act, although framed with the best intentions, unfortunately gives a power which was not intended, but uniformly and tenaciously exercised by the magistrates, of re-electing themselves, and their friends and relations, at pleasure; and not being subject to control or removal from office by any court of law at the suit of their fellow burgesses, they have, without the concurrence of the burgesses, assumed and exercised the power of contracting debts, disposing of the common revenues, and alienating almost the whole of the common property and common lands of the burgh, although these lands and revenues appear to have been granted to the burgesses at large by the express terms of the charter; that, besides the serious grievance of misapplication and mismanagement of the common property and revenues of the burgh of Ayr, and the contraction of debts to a considerable extent, for which the petitioners are, in one shape or another, ultimately liable; the petitioners have also to complain to the house of other serious grievances, such as the want of a superintending jurisdiction over the public accounts, and the establishment of juntos in the councils, and the numerous instances of certain individuals or families having continued in the magistracy for a long tract of time, by which means they obtain an undue influence and power over their fellow citizens, and by which all the evils now complained of are exercised, and will be continued in full force, to the utter destruction of the prosperity and well-being of the good and loyal burgh of Ayr, unless a remedy be applied by the house; that the petitioners feel deeply their total deprivation of any share in the election of their magistrates and town council, and they now respectfully and humbly express to the house their firm conviction that the grievances now complained of would be almost wholly removed by restoring to them their ancient, inherent, and invaluable right and privilege of electing yearly their magistrates and town council by a majority of their votes, thereby rendering the magistrates and town council subject to the control, and removable at the pleasure, of those persons who are liable for their public debts and deeds; that the petitioners humbly entreat the immediate and most serious consideration of the house to the grievances herein detailed, and the unjust restrictions under which the petitioners labour, and that they will restore to the petitioners their ancient, inherent, and invaluable right and privilege of electing yearly their magistrates and town council, by passing a law enacting that the guild brethren, members of the incorporated trades, and inhabitant burgesses, who reside in the burgh of Ayr, excluding non-resident burgesses, or town servants, shall assemble themselves at the ordinary time for electing magistrates and town council of the burgh of Ayr first happening after the passing of the law, then and there to elect fit persons, not exceeding nineteen in number, properly qualified in terms of the set and usage of the said burgh, to be magistrates and town councillors of the same, the election to be made in the following manner; that is to say, the guildry and burgesses, who are not craftsmen, to elect fourteen resident guild councillors, the guildry at large to choose one of the fourteen guild councillors to be dean of guild, who shall, ex officio, be a member of council, and also to choose six members of the guildry to be his council; and the nine deacons of the incorporated trades who meet and are then acting as such, and the nine second deacons as at present established, to elect one of themselves to be deacon conveener, who shall, ex officio, be a member of council; and the whole burgesses who are craftsmen, and of the incorporated trades, shall then elect, from among the aforesaid deacons, other four trades councillors; the whole of which five trades councillors may be guild brethren being always operative craftsmen, the persons electing them having no vote for the guild councillors in the same election; and the whole members of council, so elected as aforesaid, to choose the provost, two baillies, and treasurer, from among the guild councillors, and a trades baillie from among the trades councillors; and that the persons so to be elected by a majority of the persons aforesaid shall continue, from the date of their election, magistrates and councillors, till the ordinary time for election in the following year; and further to enact, that, after the said general poll election, the set or constitution of the burgh of Ayr shall, in all time coming thereafter, be as follows: that the town council shall consist of nineteen persons, including in the said number the provost, two baillies, trades baillie, dean of guild, and treasurer, of which nineteen fourteen shall be resident guild brethren, and five shall be resident craftsmen, including the deacon conveener for the time; that, at the election to be made at the Michaelmas next ensuing, the said poll election, and at all future elections, the six eldest councillors for the time from the guildry who have not served in any of the offices after-mentioned for the year preceding, and the whole five councillors from the craftsmen, shall go out, but shall nevertheless be re-eligible if their respective constituents think fit; that, upon the Monday of the week immediately preceding Michaelmas in each year, the magistrates and council shall meet and declare the names of the six guild councillors who go out in rotation, and also what vacancies have arisen during the preceding year by death, non-acceptance, or otherwise, in the number of the guild councillors: that on the following day, being Tuesday, the guildry shall assemble at their ordinary place of meeting, and shall first elect their dean of guild, and six members of the guildry as his council, for the ensuing year, and the person so chosen as dean of guild shall, in virtue of his office, be a councillor of the burgh; and the said guildry and burgesses who are not craftsmen shall then proceed to fill up the vacancies in the number of guild councillors occasioned by rotation, non-acceptance, death, or otherwise during the preceding year; that the whole burgesses who are craftsmen, and of the incorporated trades of Ayr, shall assemble together in one place, on the said Tuesday, and the nine present deacons and nine old deacons shall first elect their deacon conveener, who shall, in virtue of his office, be a councillor to represent the trades; and the whole burgesses who are craftsmen, and of the incorporated trades, shall then proceed to elect from the foresaid deacons other four, in the room of those who retire from office, and that the five trades councillors so to be elected may be guild brethren, being always operative craftsmen, and the persons electing them shall have no vote for the guild councillors in the same election; that the council shall meet on the Wednesday immediately preceding Michaelmas, unless Michaelmas day shall happen to be upon Wednesday, in which case they shall meet on Michaelmas day, and conclude the annual election for the ensuing year, by continuing the ex officiis members, electing the remanent members of council who do not go out by rotation, and receiving the new members from the guildry and trades; and after such election, and receiving the new councillors, the members both of the old and new council shall choose a provost, two baillies, and treasurer, from among the guild councillors, and a trades baillie from among the trades councillors; that the provost and baillies shall not be continued in their office more than two years together, but they, with the dean of guild, shall remain ex officiis members of the council, for the year immediately following that in which they shall have served in these offices respectively, but the treasurer may be re-elected annually if his constituents incline; that the petitioners, while humbly intreating from the house the enactment of a law as to the election of their magistrates and town council in the above terms, at the same time beg to express that they confine their views solely to an alteration of the set or constitution of their ancient and loyal burgh, as above respectfully pointed out to the house, in order that they may regain those rights which were enjoyed by their ancestors until the passing of the act made during the minority of James the third above-mentioned; an act which may have been requisite on account of the particular political state of the nation at that time, but now in its consequences has become extremely hurtful and prejudicial to the interest and prosperity of the petitioners, and of the burgh of Ayr, and other burghs, and the commerce and manufactures of Scotland; and that the petitioners humbly intreat and crave from the house the enactment of a law in the terms herein respectfully submitted to their consideration, as a remedy to cure the grievances complained of."—Ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Sir Samuel Romilly said, he had 46 petitions to present of inhabitants of the city of Bristol, each of them signed by 20 persons, praying for annual parliaments and universal suffrage. The persons who had signed these petitions laboured under a great mistake. They imagined, that there was a law which prevented petitions from being presented by the people to their representatives, if signed by more than 20 persons. There was no such law; and the mode now adopted would surprise those who had seen petitions presented, which were signed by hundreds and thousands. There was an act of parliament, indeed, passed soon after the restoration, (13 Car. II. c. 5.) which declared that "it had been found by experience, that tumultuous and other disorderly soliciting and procuring of hands by private persons to petitions, had produced great confusions;" and, therefore, it enacted, "that no person should solicit, labour or procure the getting of hands, or other consent, of any persons above the number of twenty or more, to any petition, unless the matter thereof had been first consented unto and ordered by three or more justices of the county, or by the major part of the grand jury of the county, or division of the county, where the matter should arise, at their public assizes, or general quarter-sessions, or, if arising in London, by the lord mayor, aldermen, and commons in common-council assembled:" but no law had been passed, and, he hoped, the house of commons would never consent to pass any law, to prevent the people from coming forward to sign petitions, peaceably and quietly, however numerous they might be. Indeed, such a law, combined with the rejection of printed petitions, would make it hardly possible that the sense of the people should be taken*. The

* The fifth article of the Bill of Rights declares, "that it is the right of the subject to petition the king, and that all commitments and prosecutions for such petitioning are illegal."—Sir William Blackstone says, that the right of the subject to petition, as declared by this statute, is under the regulations of the gentlemen who had signed these petitions had done him the honour to entrust him with them, on the supposition that he would present them fairly, for he had formerly declared, in the clearest terms, that his sentiments did not accord with the plan of reform here proposed.

The petitions were ordered to lie on the table.

Lord Cochrane then presented a great number of petitions on the same subject: viz. fifty-two from Bristol; ninety-nine from Leeds; four from St. Margaret's; twenty-four from Tunstal; five, from Manchester, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, Ladywell, Ashton-under-Lyne, and Newcastle-under-Lyne.—Ordered to lie on the table.

GRIEVANCES UNDER THE SUSPENSION ACT.] Lord Cochrane presented the following petition of Robert Thom, of Camlachie, Glasgow.—The noble lord urged the necessity of inquiry, and dwelt on the inadequacy of any member's assertion to satisfy the country on these subjects.

"That the petitioner, actuated by a deep sense of the lively interest which the house has uniformly evinced in behalf of the unjustly oppressed, and that genuine sympathy for the distress of the sufferers so repeatedly displayed, in a manner so characteristic of this nation, approaches the house with sentiments of the most profound reverence, to submit a brief statement of those accumulated grievances to which the petitioner has been subjected in consequence of the suspension of the habeas corpus act, and relies with confidence that the house will take the peculiar hardship of his situation into consideration, and award that redress and indemnification which may be deemed commensurate with the injuries he has sustained; the petitioner begs leave to state, that on the 22d day of February last he was most unexpectedly arrested by certain sheriffs' officers, and committed instantaneously to prison, without the exhibition of any warrant to that effect or any preceding examination; for a period of five days did the petitioner remain cooped up in a close cell, without being allowed any aliment, exposed to all the horrors of famine, and the most imminent danger of perishing from the extreme inclemency of the season, reduced, as he was, to solicit some relief to his sufferings by an attempt at repose on the rusty bars of the iron bedstead, without bed-clothes or covering of any description; when at length he procured a few coals, the vent was so foul that, amidst the smoke which then prevailed in the cell both night and day, the health of the petitioner was seriously affected, and at intervals his existence endangered, and even posterior to his liberation, the petitioner was for upwards of two months utterly incapable of pursuing his usual occupation, and, in consequence, his family of a wife and four children reduced to a state of absolute mendicity; for upwards of eight days the petitioner was interdicted from any communication with his kindred, nor was the attendance of the gaol surgeon permitted; his constitution of course suffered severely, and subjected him to the disease called the bleeding piles, which apparently will adhere to him through life; the sole sources of support which were furnished the petitioner on the fifth day of his imprisonment was the insignificant sum of eight pence per day, from which, after the indispensable deductions for fuel and other necessaries, there remained only one shilling and five pence weekly to support existence; that the petitioner's humble situation precluded the possibility of his being in any respect accessary to the treasonable practices erroneously laid to his charge; there was not only no species of evidence adduced against the petitioner by his wanton oppressors in vindication of their proceedings, but he was eventually released on the 15th day of April last in consequence of bail being found, but this recognizance has never been acted on, or the petitioner called to appear in court; from these circumstances, so replete with calamity and distress to the petitioner, he perceives himself involved in ruin, and from his debilitated state of body rendered incompetent to provide for the sustenance of his family, who depend solely on his exertions to preserve them from the keen sufferings of chilling penury, or the degrading resource of precarious mendicity; on that philanthropy and generosity of character which even the most inveterate foes of England have been compelled to venerate as the brightest attraction of a British senate, the petitioner reposes with confidence an appeal against the un-

13 Car. II. Now, it is submitted, that the declaration contained in the Bill of Rights virtually repealed the 13 Car. II. Upon the trial of Lord George Gordon, Lord Mansfield and the court declared, that they were clearly of opinion that this statute was not in any degree affected by the Bill of Rights. With all due submission, it may be doubted, whether that opinion be correct. Mr. Dunning, (see New Annual Reg. for 1781.) and the editors of Co. Litt. (p. 257. n. 1.) are authorities on the other side, and it must be observed, that if the Bill of Rights did not repeal the 13 Car. II. then it did nothing; for even that statute allows, that, by the law of the land before, it was the settled and undoubted right of the subjects of England, to apply themselves to the king, or to either or both houses of parliament, by petition, to have their grievances redressed. One of the articles against Lord Strafford was, that he issued out a proclamation and warrant of restraint, to inhibit the King's subjects to come to the fountain, their sovereign, to deliver their complaints of wrongs and oppressions. (See Rushworth.) Henry VIII. told his subjects, when in arms against him in Yorkshire, that they ought not to have rebelled, but to have applied themselves to him by petition. (Burnet's Hist. of Ref. vol. i. p. 231.) It was said, even in the court of Star Chamber, "This court hath no intent to discourage the meanest subject of his lawful appeal to his Prince, for that were to disinherit the people of law, and the King of the intelligence of the oppression that might fall upon his people." (See Rawley's Life of Bacon, p. 117.) Holloway, justice, on the great trial of the seven bishops, said, "It is the birthright of the subject to petition."

disguised persecution to which he has been exposed; and as his case presents no tale of simulated distress, he awaits, with deference and submission, that corresponding redress and indemnity which the house may adjudge it in their wisdom expedient to award; and praying the house to undertake the consideration of the preceding statement, and afford such redress as may be deemed commensurate to the distress which the petitioner has so long undergone."

Mr. Finlay said, that neither this person, nor any other in Scotland, had been taken up under the suspension act. Their treatment in prison, he had reason to believe, was mild, and their families were better provided for, than if they had been at large.

The petition was ordered to be printed.

Lord Cochrane then presented petitions of William Irvine, weaver in Glasgow, and of John Buchanan, weaver in Bridgeton, Lanark, complaining of the operation of the habeas corpus suspension act.—They were ordered to lie on the table.

COPY-RIGHT ACT.] Sir E. Brydges moved for leave to bring in a bill to amend the 54th of the king, c. 156. which enacts, that eleven copies of every work shall be given to the universities, and different public libraries.

Lord A. Hamilton said, he should not oppose the introduction of the bill, but if it were of the same nature as that proposed last year, (see Vol. i. p. 1480) he should not approve of it.

Mr. Peel, Lord Palmerston, and Mr. Forbes, severally declared, that they should oppose the bill, when brought in.

Leave was then given.

ARMY ESTIMATES.] Mr. Arbuthnot brought up the report of the committee of supply.

Mr. Lyttelton begged to call the attention of the house to a subject which he had, in the course of the last session, felt it his duty to bring under their notice, and against which, he thought, the secretary at war had adduced very inadequate grounds of objection—he meant with regard to the affidavit which half-pay officers are compelled to make, to entitle them to receive their half-pay, namely, that they derive no other emolument from, nor hold any other employment under, the crown. This he considered a very harsh restriction. He thought, that all officers were entitled to half-pay as a matter of right, in remuneration for their services; and, considering the inadequacy of that remuneration for the maintenance of a gentleman, he deemed it peculiarly ungenerous that an officer should be deprived of it, unless he swore that he had no civil employment whatever under the crown, from which he could derive any additional means of subsistence. These were the grounds upon which he resisted this restriction in the last session; and, if he remembered correctly, the reasons assigned for its continuance were very insufficient. The noble lord (Lord Palmerston) had said, that this regulation was necessary, in order to keep up the military character, and to prevent officers from engaging in civil pursuits, which might unfit, or indispose, them for the resumption of military habits; so that, according to the noble lord, the return of a soldier to the habits of a citizen, or the engagement of an officer in any civil office, was so likely to degrade his mind, or to estrange him from the feelings of the military profession, that, in the event of a new war, it would be difficult to bring him back to the military character. Without dwelling upon a principle so novel, and, as he apprehended, so unconstitutional in England, he should only say, that it was unfounded in practice, and that it formed no valid ground for excluding half-pay officers from any employment which the government might think proper to confer upon them. For, after all, it would depend upon the government to decide whether any such officer should be appointed to a civil office; and, unless it were thought that the possession of a civil office was calculated totally to corrupt a soldier's mind, there could be no good ground of objection to the making of such appointments. He could not, indeed, imagine any principle of justice, or expediency, that should wholly disqualify half-pay officers from the acceptance of such appointments. He objected, therefore, to this affidavit, and to the extraordinary restriction which it imposed. The removal of such a restriction would, in his judgment, be rather a measure of wisdom; because, the more a military man was allowed to partake of the bounty of his country, the more he would feel an interest in its fate, and be disposed to contend for its security. It was, besides, to be considered, that many—very many of those officers were quite unable to support themselves upon the small pittance of half-pay. He appealed, therefore, to the liberality of the house, and to that of the government itself, in favour of a body of gallant men who had served their country amidst so much danger, and with so little profit (hear, hear, hear!); and he appealed with the more confidence of success, because the removal of the restriction to which he objected would be attended with no additional expense to the country, while the government would still have the discretion of appointing any military man to a civil office. But, it was quite unjust, that the discretion of the government to make such an appointment should be fettered by the restriction to which he referred.—There was another point to which he felt it his duty to call the attention of the house. He understood, that a circular had been issued, or was about to be issued, from the war-office, stating, that no widow of any officer who had died since December last, should be entitled to the pension of an officer's widow, if it appeared, that, from any source whatever, she derived an annuity equal to double the amount of such pension. This arrangement appeared to be extremely unjust, because, it might happen, that the annuity, which was thus to deprive a widow of her pension, might be the effect of an insurance upon her husband's life, which insurance was paid for, perhaps, by a material sacrifice of the means of subsistence by both husband and wife. Would that house, then, consent, upon the ground of such an annuity, to exclude an officer's widow from her pension? Yet the circular alluded to would have that effect. The whole charge for widows' pensions amounted to 90,000*l.* and, possibly, the circular, if carried into execution, might produce a saving of 20,000*l.* But would the house, for such an object, acquiesce in an act of obvious injustice? As to the point upon which he had remarked, with respect to half-pay, the adoption of his view would not produce any saving at all, but would be consistent with justice. He was among the warmest advocates of retrenchment and economy in that house: but such retrenchment as that which he had mentioned, respecting widows' pensions, was not the kind of economy for which he looked, or which the country desired. On the contrary, he believed that the people would unanimously wish that the widows of their gallant defenders should be liberally provided for. Ministers could not, therefore, calculate upon gratifying any class of the community by the arrangement to which he objected: on the contrary, such an arrangement was likely to give rise to invidious comparisons between the treatment of those poor widows, and the extraordinary gratuities bestowed on others who happened to be nearer the source of favour, to the commissary-in-chief, for instance. (Hear, hear.) He felt that it was the duty, and, he hoped, it was the inclination of the house, to interpose its authority upon such an occasion.

Lord Palmerston observed, that the affidavit was required by a section in the appropriation act. He denied the justice of the hon. gentleman's statement, that half-pay belonged to an officer, as a matter of right: it was granted merely for the subsistence of officers during the cessation of their services, and as a retaining fee for their future services, whenever it should become necessary to call upon them for the defence of the country. It was felt, and justly felt, that if officers were allowed to accept of civil appointments, it would be difficult to recal them to military duties, whenever occasion should require. There was, indeed, reason to believe, that officers might become so much engaged in civil pursuits as to be disqualified for, or indisposed to, the resumption of military habits. On those grounds, then, the affidavit objected to by the hon. gentleman was deemed necessary. But, after all, it was nothing more than persons connected with other departments of the public service were called upon to make; for, those who enjoyed superannuation, or retired pensions, were obliged to make the same affidavit, namely, that they had no other emolument under the crown. It was also to be recollected, that the requisition of this affidavit was not an innovation, —it was the old established system. As to the circular letter alluded to by the hon. gentleman, the regulation to which it referred did not originate with government, but was recommended by the finance committee, who were of opinion, that the same rule which prevailed in the other departments of the public service should be applied to the army.

Mr. Lyttelton said, that as to the noble lord's reference to other services, he thought it only an aggravation of the principle to which he had objected, that it should be extended to the army; and, as to the alleged antiquity of the practice, with respect to half-pay officers, he could not admit that that antiquity afforded any defence for such practice.

The first resolution of the committee was then read; viz. that the army for the present year be 113,640 men.

Sir Wm. Burroughs insisted that so large an army was inconsistent with the promises of ministers, the expectations of the country, and the state of Europe. Our army was now proposed to be 113,640 men, the third year after hostilities had ceased, and while we were at peace with all the world. This establishment was not only greater than the finances of the country would support, but than its exigencies required. It had been said, that the year 1792 was not a period at which a fair comparison could be instituted of the force necessary in a time of peace, on account of the difference in the internal state of the country. Now, in 1792, a revolutionary spirit was general; there was not a state in Europe uninfected with the poison of its principles. It had pervaded every part of England, and had excited actual rebellion in Ireland. The alarm was so deeply felt, that his majesty's ministers thought it necessary to call parliament together in an extraordinary manner. France, too, at that time was menacing us with war; a rupture seemed unavoidable; and all concurred in the propriety of making provision for it. France was now debilitated in force, and impoverished in finance, whilst a part of her territory was occupied by an army of our own, amounting to 22,000 men, besides the armies of our allies. In the year 1792, when our political situation presented such a contrast, in point of security, with the circumstances of the present year, the whole force for Great Britain was 15,000 men, and for Ireland 12,000. Thus the total force in 1792 was only 27,000, while, for the present year, it amounted to no less than 56,270:—thus creating an excess of 29,270, or forming more than double our peace establishment in 1792. But, in addition to this excess, we had at present a yeomanry force of 23,800 for Great Britain, and 41,000 for Ireland. Thus we had, in the aggregate, an excess of force, at present, beyond that of 1792, amounting to no less than 94,000 men. But it had been said, that as 1792 was the last year of rather a long peace, a comparison of that period with the present was not admissible. He would take, then, the next year, 1793, which was the first year of the war in which we were engaged with France, and how stood the account? In 1793, the force voted for Great Britain was 17,000 men, and for Ireland 16,000, which, with the volunteers in both countries, formed a total of 70,520 men. This force, then, compared with the numbers proposed for the present year, would leave an excess of 11,121. Such being the excess between a year of actual war and the third year of universal peace, both internal and external, he could not imagine how the noble lord and his colleagues could account for the difference. It might be said, that the militia of Great Britain and Ireland were called out in 1793, and their numbers exceeded 53,000 men. Thus the total amount of force at that period might be estimated at about 123,000 men, but even this number, compared with that of the regular army and the yeomanry of both countries for the present year, would leave an excess of no less than 23,307. The noble lord had pointed out the reductions in the regular force, employed for the home service, since the last year: and what was the amount? Why, only 1959 men. The circumstances of the country were, however, very different, according to the shewing of ministers themselves. At the beginning of the last year, they alleged, that the state of the country was so very alarming, from the existence of plots, conspiracies, and insurrectionary movements, that they thought it necessary to call for the suspension of the habeas corpus act. The history of that year was, however, pregnant with evidence to shew, that a large military force was not necessary to preserve the peace of the country. For even the great rebellion at Derby was suppressed by one magistrate, one officer, and eighteen dragoons. (A laugh.) Yet this was the only insurrection in the country in the course of that year, to quell which any recourse was had to the aid of the regular army, for the rebellion at Huddersfield was put down by the yeomanry. It appeared, indeed, that, on that occasion, one yeoman was fired at when he was seen alone, but the corps to which he belonged had scarcely presented itself when the whole of the Huddersfield insurgents, or rioters, immediately fled. And what was the case with respect to the insurrection in London? Why, that the lord mayor, seconded by one alderman, took possession of the baggage and standard of the insurgents before any military force had appeared—nay, the Royal Exchange, of which the insurgents. it seemed, took possession, was surrendered to those two municipal officers, unsupported by any military force whatever. (Hear, hear, hear.) The hon. baronet, after repeating his astonishment at the system of military expenditure which ministers appeared disposed to pursue, concluded with moving, as an amendment, that the number of men be 103,640, instead of 113,640.

No person rising from the ministerial benches,

Mr. Curwen expressed his astonishment, that none of his majesty's ministers should consider it their duty to reply to the able arguments of his hon. friend. It appeared to him that this course of proceeding was extremely well calculated to convince the country of the necessity of some parliamentary reform. If any measure of retrenchment were practicable, the public had a right to be satisfied that it had not been left unattempted.

Lord Palmerston observed, that if what had passed that night in the house was calculated to shew the necessity of a reform of parliament, he presumed it was from the very scanty attendance which the opposite benches exhibited on the discussion of so important a subject. If reproach were applicable any where, it was to those whom some persons considered as the great defenders of the public purse, and who, it appeared, had no time to employ in an investigation of the army estimates. (Hear.) He should think himself fully justified were he to abstain from making any reply to the arguments of the hon. baronet. He meant no personal disrespect, but he could see in his observations no one new point, nor one consideration urged, which had not been already stated and discussed. The speech of the hon. baronet was made up of threadbare references to the establishments of 1792, and it really appeared to him, that an allusion to the period of the Saxon Heptarchy would be as applicable to the present circumstances of the country. To retrace a comparative view of this nature would be an idle waste of the time of the house. He considered it sufficient to recal to their attention generally the prodigious changes which the events of war, and the operation of various causes, had introduced into the internal situation of the country. Let them look at the internal increase of our population, and the consequent increase of turbulent spirits. (Hear, and a laugh.) He could recognize no one point by which any identity could be established between the circumstances of the two periods. The additional charge upon the revenue was created by the increased pay and allowances, and he had not understood that any hon. member was prepared to recommend any reduction in those branches of expenditure.

Mr. Calcraft regretted, as much as the noble lord, the thin attendance of members on a question of so much public interest as the army estimates. The reproach applied generally to both sides of the house, and he should be sorry were a division to exhibit their scanty numbers to the observation of the country. He must contend, that no satisfactory answer had been given to the objections to the amount of the estimates for the service of England and Ireland, and he had no hesitation in declaring his belief, that the reduction of ten thousand men was practicable. When measuring the extent of an establishment, how could they proceed without adopting some basis, and what better one could they select than the peace establishment of 1792—unfortunately the last year of general peace which could be adverted to? (Hear, hear.) But to this the noble lord replied, that the year 1792 was not the year 1818; and that, therefore, there could be no similarity, or point of comparison, between the two periods. The only cause assigned for not making larger reductions was the present system of reliefs; but against this, which he admitted to be an advantage, it was but fair to set the operation of the recruiting service. With regard to the increase of pay and allowances, the charge thus created was only an additional reason for scrutinizing the establishment, which could not be separated from the consideration of our finances. He observed, too, that the security which we derived from the army of occupation in France had not been adverted to, and yet he apprehended that this force would gradually return, and that it could not be disbanded immediately upon its return. Ireland was now completely tranquil; but, in 1792, a large body of united Irishmen were in correspondence with the French government. He had himself proposed reductions in a former year, which had not been assented to. In one instance, he recommended a diminution of 2,000 men on a foreign station, and he was described as an ignorant, prejudiced, person, who entirely misconceived the matter, although, a short time after, his counsel was adopted, and the reduction actually took place. What he then urged, applied only to the service of the year; and he trusted, therefore, that similar recommendations of retrenchment would be attended to. He was not one of those who felt any despondency with respect to the financial resources of the country, but he put it to the noble lord (Castlereagh), whether he and his cabinet conclave of fourteen were not bound to press down the expenditure to the lowest point that was consistent with public security? When the house considered the great number of battalions of infantry, and of regiments of dragoons and dragoon guards, of which the establishment consisted, it would be seen that the reduction proposed by his hon. friend, when applied equally to the whole force, would occasion but a small diminution of numbers in any particular corps. It should be recollected, that our present system of finance was, as it were, living from day to day; that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the great stockjobber for the country, was, in the ordinary course of gambling, taking advantage of every little variation in the interest of the paper which he was enabled to throw into the market. That paper, consisting of unfunded exchequer-bills, amounted to 56,000,000*l.*; and although he did not wish to speak harshly of the transactions of the Stock Exchange, they formed but an inglorious pursuit for the government of a great country. All the success, however, of which the right hon. gentleman could boast in his dealings, was the reduction of 3,000,000*l.* upon 800,000,000*l.* of debt, a boast which, he apprehended, would but little mitigate the pain that a right hon. gentleman who sat beside him (Mr. Huskisson) must feel, after the solemn appeals which he had once made to him on the urgent necessity of bringing the expenditure within the income.

Mr. Peel observed, that, with respect to Ireland, there were two counties still subject to the insurrection act; but the circumstances of that country were greatly improved, in regard to the preservation of the peace. He did not think, however, that the military force could be reduced beyond the scale which was now proposed, and it was pleasing to find, that all those who knew the state of Ireland, concurred in that opinion. Two hon. members had expressed their conviction, that a smaller force would be sufficient: but one of them (Mr. Calcraft) had no personal knowledge of the country, and the other (Sir W. Burroughs) had not set his foot in it since his return from India. (Hear, hear.) Under these circumstances, he could not consider them to be competent judges. He would repeat what he had said on a former occasion, that the force to be maintained in Ireland depended on the opinion of the government, and that opinion had not been controverted by any person on whose judgment he could place any reliance. (Hear, hear.)

Sir John Newport said, that, differing as he did from the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Peel) on many subjects relative to the administration of the affairs of Ireland, he thought him entitled to the highest praise for bringing that country back, as speedily as the nature of the case would allow, to that system which had been acted upon in England. He thought that some measures should be adopted with respect to the distillation; and, generally speaking, he was sure that the house would do best by retracing its steps with respect to that country.

Mr. Marryat observed, with reference to the colonies, that they were not in a situation of contributing to the maintenance of the troops, with the exception of Jamaica. He did not think that a smaller force could be voted for their protection and safety.

Mr. Brougham said, it became the Commons of England—as many, at least, as were then assembled there—to insist, that the number of troops to be maintained, especially in this country, should not exceed what it was in 1792. In a year of permanent peace, and when all danger of internal commotion was allowed to have ceased, it was for ministers, and not for those who sat on his side of the house, to shew why the force should be increased beyond what it was at that period. The people of England had a right to be governed at the smallest possible expense; and if he shewed that the state of the country did not require any extraordinary measures, the onus was on ministers, to establish, step by step, the necessity of maintaining every battalion, and every troop of the line, which they now proposed to the house. The noble lord (Palmerston) had said, that there was a great increase of population, and, of consequence, a great increase of turbulence in the country, but did he mean to say, that because the population was increased to the amount of five or six hundred thousand, that the army must be kept up to the present numbers? In that case, allowing his position to be true, instead of an increase in the army of ten per cent., it would be increased to, at least, one hundred per cent. (Hear, hear.) What was there in the state of the country so different from what it was in 1792, as to justify the necessity of augmenting the army in this degree? Was the year 1792 more particularly tranquil than the other years which had succeeded it? He would maintain, that if ever there was a period in which the constitution of this country was exposed to danger, it was in the year 1792. France was then threatening us with sowing discord and sedition in the country, and great apprehensions were entertained for our external and internal welfare. But the terrors which the French revolution excited were now at an end—that revolution, indeed, had long fallen into disrepute among the nations of Europe, and the danger which it was said to have inspired was now on the other side. The danger which now existed was, not a danger to be apprehended from the people—it was a danger that arose out of the doctrine of legitimate governments, to be maintained and supported by military force—it was a danger that the governments would go too far in trampling on the rights and liberties of their subjects. And yet, this was the time at which the ministers of the Crown thought proper to desire so considerable an increase of the standing army, compared with what it was in the year 1792. It was admitted, that Ireland was the most disturbed part of our dominions, and that England was the most tranquil; but, in framing the estimates, this view of the empire had been entirely overlooked, and the increase of the army in England was much greater than the augmentation which ministers had made for the sister country. If they wished to remove the discontent which unfortunately existed in that part of the empire, if they were desirous of governing Ireland, not by the sword, but by the laws, they would turn their attention to those subjects which formed the principal grounds of murmur. It was scarcely necessary, at this time of day, to observe, that standing armies were utterly inconsistent with the spirit of our free constitution; but he would venture to say, that it was one of the most calamitous signs of the times, that, in every country, armies were kept up for the purpose of spoliation, and of exciting terror in the minds of the people. (Hear, hear.) If any change in the affairs of the world had rendered it necessary for England to deviate from her ancient policy with respect to a standing army, that change took place previous to 1792; and, therefore, he again placed his foot on that year as the standard which ought to govern our proceedings, and he called on the noble lord to shew what there was in the state of Europe, which could warrant him to propose the present enormous establishment. He was persuaded, that it was quite preposterous, and unnecessary; and he lamented, that so little attention had been paid to the discussion of the estimates this year. He would freely admit, and he regretted to observe, that the little attention which had been devoted to them, did as little credit to those who sat on his side of the house as to those who sat on the other; but, he hoped, it might arise from some accidental circumstances which would never occur again. Having stated thus much, he should merely add, that he most heartily approved of the amendment of his hon. friend.

Lord Castlereagh observed, that this was a subject of great importance, and deserved the most serious consideration of the house; but he was confident that, if the house had not been satisfied that every possible reduction had been made, there would have been a fuller attendance of members on this occasion. Arguments had been urged which could not be contradicted, and, therefore, it was unnecessary that they should be repeated. He must protest, however, against taking the year 1792 as the standard for the present year; he was prepared to prove, that the very history of the year 1792 would be an argument on the other side: it was an argument against hasty reductions of our military establishments, as dangers might arise from a state of too great security. The policy pursued by Mr. Pitt in 1792, in reducing the military establishment, had been pregnant with evil, and had, in the end, entailed a greater expense on the country. In the very next year we were at war, not merely for the purpose of opposing the danger of French principles within, but from the necessity of coping with French principles from without. The hon. and learned gentleman had not made proper allowance for the change in the internal situation of the country since the year 1792; such as the increase of population and the enlarged state of the metropolis. Considering the necessity of providing reliefs for the different stations, ministers could not make any further reduction with safety to the country.

Mr. Bankes defended the reductions made by Mr. Pitt in the year 1792. What man could have calculated on the strange aspect which presented itself after the breaking out of the French revolution?—He thought the present vote larger than it ought to be, on account of the change which had taken place in the internal situation of the country. Some reduction might be made in the number of troops to be maintained in Great Britain, and a gradual reduction should be made in Ireland.

The house then divided on the amendment of Sir W. Burroughs.

Mr. Brougham then moved, that the report of the committee of supply be taken into further consideration on Friday next.

Lord Palmerston observed, that the first and most important resolution, determining the amount of the force to be kept up, had already been agreed to. He could, therefore, see no reason why the consideration of the other resolutions, which were comparatively of minor importance, should be postponed.

Mr. Brougham consented to withdraw his motion, and the remaining resolutions were severally read and agreed to.

MUTINY BILL.] A bill "for punishing mutiny and desertion, and for better payment of the army and their quarters," was brought in, and read a first time.

BANK DOLLARS AND TOKENS.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer brought in his bill "to amend an act of the last session of parliament, for preventing the further circulation of dollars and tokens issued by the governor and company of the Bank of England."—Read a first time.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Wednesday, March 4.

INDEMNITY BILL.] This bill was reported, and the amendments made in the committee yesterday were agreed to.

The Lord Chancellor introduced a clause, to obviate the objection made by the Marquis of Lansdown, in the committee, to that part of the bill which included Ireland. This clause extended the indemnity for arrests in Ireland only to cases in which arrests had been made for offences charged to have been committed in Great Britain. This clause was agreed to, and the word 'Ireland' was struck out of the former part of the bill.

The bill was then ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, March 4.

MISCELLANEOUS ESTIMATES.] On the motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the house resolved itself into a committee of supply.

The right hon. gentleman then moved, that the sum of 500,000*l.* be granted to his Majesty, to provide for such expenses of a civil nature in Great Britain, as do not form part of the ordinary charges of the civil list.

After some observations from Mr. Tierney, on the new practice of calling for grants before their necessity had been ascertained, so that it was quite useless to discuss the matter after the money had been voted,—an amendment was moved by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, restricting the sum to 250,000*l.* as being all that was immediately necessary for this branch of the public service.—This sum was agreed to.

Mr. Arbuthnot moved a grant of 20,000*l.* for making and repairing roads and bridges in the highlands of Scotland.

Mr. Gordon said, he was at a loss to understand why a sum should annually be voted for this purpose.

Mr. Arbuthnot said, the house were in some degree pledged to this expense, by the 43d of the King, c. 80. The civilization and improvement of the Highlands had been greatly promoted by the communications which had been opened through them.—This sum was then agreed to.

Mr. Arbuthnot moved a grant of 60,000*l.* towards defraying the expense of building the Penitentiary at Milbank.

Mr. Gordon observed, that very large sums had been already expended on the Penitentiary House at Milbank. But this house had been so built that it was necessary to have several of the towers taken down and rebuilt.

Mr. Lockhart said, no less than 71,000*l.* above the sum at which the expense of this prison was originally estimated, had already been voted; and, as a prison, it had totally failed to produce the effect which the house had in view, namely, to deter from the commission of crime. It might, indeed, have produced the amendment of the criminal; but that was of small importance, compared with the object of deterring from the commission of crime. It might be Christian-like to endeavour to reform these people, and to send them into the world in a more comfortable condition than they were in before. The world, however, could dispense with them; for, he believed, the chasm in society, occasioned by the removal of culprits, could always be soon filled up. Notwithstanding all the sums expended by the country in prisons, and establishments of various descriptions, they found that crimes were perpetually increasing, instead of decreasing. There were other means to which they ought to turn their attention. A vigilant police ought to be established. The metropolis ought to be divided into districts, and a stricter watch set over those individuals who were habituated to crimes, and who were known not to obtain their living by honest means. It was said, that our prisons were nurseries of crime; that the comparatively innocent, from associating with hardened criminals, returned to society much worse members than when they entered the prisons. Why, he would ask, in the prisons of this metropolis, should persons, whose guilt was not established, be kept five or six weeks in the company of hardened criminals? At present, instead of the criminals being punished, society was punished; and society was punished because it was so idle and inattentive to the subject.

Mr. Long said, the objections to the Penitentiary at Milbank ought to have been stated at an earlier period. It ought to be recollected, that the Penitentiary was adopted by parliament after a great deal of discussion. He was astonished that the hon. gentleman who spoke last should consider the amendment of the persons in that prison a secondary object. The hon. gentleman had said, what was perfectly true, that innocent persons, from mixing with hardened criminals in prison, came out depraved. Did he mean to say, then, that a system by which the amendment of prisoners was promoted, was not worth the attention of the house? It was true that one or two towers had been pulled down and rebuilt. Those who planned and superintended the building had not the choice of the situation, which was pointed out by act of parliament. A small part of the building had given way, but the cause was known, and from the means which had been adopted, no further apprehension was entertained. All who had visited the building agreed, that it could not possibly be constructed on a plan better calculated to answer the object in view. The system appeared, as far as they had yet had any experience of it, to answer the purpose of those who projected it. This was very much owing to an hon. friend of his (hear, hear) who had devoted all his time to this object (Mr. Holford.) Without a constant vigilance and superintendence, the hopes of the house from this prison would be frustrated; for it would otherwise soon relapse into a common prison.

Mr. Lockhart explained.—The right hon. gentleman had very much misunderstood him, if he supposed that he considered the amendment of prisoners a secondary consideration. He had merely said, that it was secondary with reference to the greater consideration of preventing crime.

Mr. Arbuthnot appealed to the hon. member for Shrewsbury (Mr. Bennet) as to the melioration in the conduct of the prisoners in the Penitentiary.

Mr. Bennet bore testimony to the excellent manner in which the Penitentiary was conducted.

Mr. Wynn said, when they considered the great expense which the transportation of offenders occasioned to the country, and how little satisfactory the result had been, particularly in the case of females, they could not fail to view the Penitentiary as most beneficial to the country.

The grant was then agreed to.

The following sums were successively voted:

A sum of 11,048*l.* 12*s.* 2*d.* "to defray the expense of the establishment of the Penitentiary house, from the 24th day of June 1818, to the 24th day of June 1819."

A sum of 1,092*l.* 14*s.* 2¾*d.* "to pay off and discharge exchequer bills issued per acts 7 and 11 of Anne, remaining in the chests of the tellers of the exchequer, together with the interest due upon them outstanding and unprovided for."

A sum of 4,655*l.* 2*s.* 5*d.* "being the amount of the annuity granted to the trustees of her late Royal Highness the Princess Charlotte Augusta and his Serene Highness Leopold George Frederick Prince of Cobourg, which would have accrued from the 10th day of October 1817 to the 6th day of November following, the day of her Royal Highness's death.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved a grant of 725,681*l.* 12*s.* 3*d.* "on account of the sum of two millions to be applied by his Majesty, in concert with his Majesty the King of the Netherlands, towards improving the defences of the Low Countries, by virtue of the Convention concluded on the 13th of August, 1814."

Mr. Warre observed, that, by the treaty of 1815, there was to be set apart 60 millions of livres, out of the 125 millions of livres which was to be paid by France to the Netherlands, for the reparation of the fortresses on the Flemish frontier. The whole expense of the reparation of these fortresses was estimated at 137 millions of livres. He did not know whether these 60 millions had already been expended by the King of the Netherlands towards the repair of the fortresses; and he could wish to receive some information from the noble lord on this subject.

Lord Castlereagh said, the house would recollect, that Holland had made over certain colonies to Great Britain, and England had contracted to support the fortifications upon the frontiers of Holland. The 60,000,000 of livres alluded to were to be applied to the same purpose. We were to support the fortifications on the important line he had mentioned; the plans were furnished by the engineers, and subjected to the inspection of the Duke of Wellington; and it was necessary that they should have his approval. A great part of the contributions, settled to be applied to the fortifications, had been applied to those works; and what his right hon. friend now proposed to the house was to be employed for the same purpose. In all cases, the funds had been applied as fast as they were furnished, but the whole 60,000,000 had not been applied, as they had not been received. The stipulation had been, that this country was not to expend more than 2,000,000*l.* upon the whole.

Mr. Warre thought, that in one article of the treaty there was a clause of very ambiguous meaning. We there expressed our determination, and took upon ourselves, to maintain the King of the Netherlands upon his throne, and the family of Orange, binding ourselves to 3,000,000*l.* Upon the whole, he wished to know how far we were liable to be called upon for that third million.

Lord Castlereagh said, the whole sum that we were bound to pay could not exceed 2,000,000*l.* for supporting the fortifications, as appeared on the face of the treaty.

Mr. Warre said, he would read the clause to which he alluded. (The hon. gentleman then read the clause, which declared, that we should bear "such further charges as might be agreed upon, towards the final and satisfactory settlement," &c. as he had stated, "not exceeding, in the whole, the sum of 3,000,000*l.*") The house had been told about 2,000,000*l.*, but here there was evidently a sum of 3,000,000*l.* mentioned.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer was very confident, that the sum never was intended to exceed 2,000,000*l.*; but, from what the hon. gentleman observed, he recollected that there was a provision respecting a cession, for which a sum of 1,000,000*l.* was stipulated. The concluding article, which, as the hon. gentleman had observed, was not very clear, had no other intention than had been stated. The meaning of the whole was, that the total charge should not exceed 3,000,000*l.*, it being understood that 2,000,000*l.* was to be the extent of the sum for the fortifications.

Mr. Warre said, the clause was certainly not very perspicuous, for the million which the right hon. gentleman had mentioned was a fourth million. The first additional article stipulated the payment of 1,000,000*l.* sterling to Sweden, "for satisfaction aforesaid." 2,000,000*l.* were then stipulated for fortifications; and the third clause, which was not very clear, was the clause that might bring the charge of a fourth million on the country. The third clause of the additional article was "that Great Britain do bear equally with Holland such further charges as may be necessary," &c.; and it afterwards proceeded "for maintaining the family of Orange on the throne, &c." not exceeding 3,000,000*l.* to be defrayed by Great Britain.

Lord Castlereagh said, he could assure the hon. gentleman, that that part of the treaty relative to the fortifications was fully understood, as well as the other parts.

Mr. Tierney said, he supposed, that, besides the 2,000,000*l.* for the fortifications, we were bound to provide, as far as might be required, towards the 3,000,000*l.*

The resolution was then agreed to; the house resumed, and the report was ordered to be brought up on Friday next.

INCOME-TAX RETURNS.] Mr. Brougham rose to submit a proposal to the house for carrying into effect a measure in which, he supposed, they would not be unwilling to second him—the destruction of all that remained of that odious and inquisitorial impost, the property tax. He supposed that the house would so little hesitate upon the subject, that he should scarcely detain them by saying one word in support of his motion. The right hon. gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had given assurances, that steps should be taken for the destruction of all the income-tax returns, which had been preserved, throughout the country. It appeared, however, that his instructions had been so tardily complied with, that the returns were every where to be found. They were sold as waste paper, and so widely dispersed, that a man could hardly go into a shop in some parts of the country without seeing his name at full length, with an account of his property, and all the detail of his circumstances. A circular letter had been written from the tax-office, to direct all persons who had the keeping of those returns, before destroying them, which they were to do, to take and preserve copies for the purpose of having them sent to, and kept in, the office in London. After the communications which had been made with the right hon. gentleman, no notice had been taken of the business, till, on application from some friends, he was induced to ask whether the copies were preserved, or whether any returns were yet in the hands of persons in different parts of the country? It was plain that it mattered very little whether the copies or originals were destroyed, provided other copies were preserved. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had replied, that copies were kept, but the names were left out; in other respects, accurate copies were preserved: but if an accurate copy was kept, it was evident that any man who saw his neighbour's return, from seeing it would know as well, almost, that it was the return of A. B., as if he saw A. B.'s name at the head of it, or it was signed by him. What, then, was the necessity for keeping copies at all? It was, he believed, for checking returns of another kind in connexion with county-rates. But would not one single sum, a single line, shewing that the sum assessed upon some district was so and so, be sufficient; would it not do to state the assessment upon the riding, or, if not, upon the parish, and to allow all the particulars to be destroyed? The object would be fulfilled as well by that mode as by any other. If persons who had been written to had not complied with the letter of the tax-office, it shewed that that office had no power. The mode which he should propose for coming at the end he had in view, would be, to appoint a committee for the purpose of seeing what steps had been taken. He trusted that no objection would be made to this; indeed, the proposition was so reasonable in itself, that he could not think it would be objected to. He could not think that the circular would have its effect, judging as he might from the slow manner in which all returns were made by a certain office to that house. He by no means intended to impute any thing to his hon. and learned friend at the head of it; but there was something apparently in the very nature of the office that made them very tardy in expediting any returns that might be ordered by the house. As far back as the 3d of February an account had been moved for, which was very important. By the discontinuance of the property-tax many officers had become sinecure placemen. Either nine commissioners had received 1,100*l.* per annum, or eleven commissioners 900*l.* per annum, he was not certain which. The object of the motion was, to discover what pensions those persons had, or what others had, connected with them, and whether they had any other places. For this information, it had been considered expedient by the hon. member for Shrewsbury to move for returns on those particulars. Notice had been given for a particular day, but the motion was postponed. On the 3d of February, however, it came on, and the return was ordered one calendar month before the time he was speaking, and it had not yet been laid before the house. If the motion had been for returns from the treasury, they would have been made long ago; indeed, in an ordinary way it might have been made in half the time. It was very much the order with the department of taxes to dislike the interference of the house, as having a tendency to impede their taxing operations; and the house were in no favour with them any more than they were two years ago with the treasury. Ever since the discontinuance of the property-tax, they had been looked on with a suspicious eye. A house, or part of a house, had been taken, he believed, and, if he understood rightly, was still in occupation for the preservation of the returns which formed the subject of his motion. There were no names, it had been said, on them; but a stroke or two of the pen drawn over the names, an attempt at erasing them, would not prevent people who had eyes half as sharp as those who were accustomed to such papers, from seeing whose returns they really were. A person had not long ago sent for some goods to a chandler's-shop, and they were transmitted to him, with what he certainly did not expect, a return of his neighbour's property. On mentioning that, he was told, "Oh, if you will go to such a place, you may have the return of every man's property in the neighbourhood: such a man is dead—such a man was a bankrupt, and all his waste-paper was sold:" and the greater part of that waste-paper happened to consist of property-tax returns, by which means exposures were made of what certainly ought to have been concealed. The property-tax was done away; but its destruction was evidently a matter of regret in a certain quarter, though nine in ten throughout the country had loudly declared against it, and he believed that 99 out of 100 were of the same opinion. He should therefore move "that a committee be appointed to inquire into the steps which have been taken to destroy the returns of bodies corporate and individuals under the income-tax acts."

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, he doubted whether any benefit could possibly arise from the appointment of such a committee. The hon. gentleman was mistaken in his imputation on the tax-office; the return to the motion concerning inspectors of property-tax was made on the 10th of February. With respect to the property-tax, he had no wish to enter into its general merits, as he had no intention to propose to parliament to renew it, during the continuance of the peace. It was one of those measures which, in time of war and danger, had been found necessary and advantageous; but which would be highly objectionable, and, he hoped, would be found unnecessary, during the continuance of peace. (Hear.) The object of the hon. and learned gentleman's motion was, that all papers of the description which he had alluded to, should be destroyed indiscriminately; but this could not be done, as some of them were absolutely necessary for the recovery of certain arrears of the property-tax. Orders had been given for the destruction of every paper that was not necessary for the recovery of arrears and the detection of fraud. All returns of commercial property, included in schedule B, were such as, from the circumstances of such property, ought certainly to be destroyed, excepting such as were necessary for the recovery of arrears. The returns of landed property ought to be preserved. Two acts of parliament, passed in the year 1815, referred to those papers for the purpose of settling county rates and assessments, and as the value of landed property would never be a matter of secrecy, it would be useful to keep them as a sort of *Cadastre.

Mr. Brougham, in explanation, stated, that he could find nothing in the book upon the table, which recorded the motion, to signify that that motion had been complied with.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer observed, that the learned gentleman would have found, upon referring to the vote office, that his conception was incorrect.

Mr. Brougham said, he did not feel it his duty to refer to the vote office upon subjects of this nature; there was no record in the book before the house.

Mr. Grenfell said, he rose to express his entire concurrence with the opinion of his hon. and learned friend as to the refractoriness evinced by the different offices connected with the department of taxes in complying with the orders of the house, but he could not agree with him in excepting the gentleman at the head of that department. He knew, however, that no blame could attach to the secretary, whose conduct was, in every respect, highly creditable to himself.—But he rose more particularly to express the satisfaction which he felt in hearing the declaration of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that the country was not again, with his consent, to be afflicted with that odious imposition, the property-tax. (Not in time of peace, said the Chancellor of the Exchequer.) Upon this declaration, even as it was explained by the right hon. gentleman, he was ready to congratulate the country.

Mr. C. Calvert hoped, that some measures would be taken to guard against the vexation to which several persons had been recently subjected, under the system for collecting the assessed taxes. In the course of the last five years, a survey had been made of the houses in his neighbourhood, by which they were assessed at a rack-rent. Notwithstanding this, an assessor lately appeared, who thought proper, without any new survey, to increase the assessments, some 100, some 80, some 70 per cent. And he begged to add, that of 100 appeals for surcharges, only one had been repealed.

Mr. Brougham in reply, said, that the sole object of the motion was, the appointment of a committee to inquire what returns, or papers, connected with the property-tax, had been destroyed, or could be destroyed without injury to the public service. The right hon. gentleman had, on a former occasion, stated, that an order had been issued from the proper office for the destruction of such papers, and was it not rather calculated to excite suspicion as to the execution of this order, to find the present motion so resolutely resisted? But there were some circumstances connected with this motion which he felt it his duty to explain to the house, as they appeared to manifest much less candour than he was generally disposed to ascribe to the right hon. gentleman. The secretary of the treasury had applied to him, in the early part of the evening, to know what motion he meant to bring forward. To this application he made a prompt and frank reply, by giving the right hon. secretary a copy of his intended motion, which copy, or a paper very much resembling it, he saw immediately afterwards put into the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The secretary of the treasury returned to him with this information—that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had no objection to his motion; adding, that the only difference was, as to the nomination of the proposed committee. He had, therefore, concluded, that there would be no objection to the motion for the appointment of the committee to-day, provided he postponed the consideration of the names, which were to compose that committee, until to-morrow. Such being his conclusion, he communicated to several friends, who felt an interest, and were likely to speak upon the subject, that the business would terminate in five minutes, no division, or discussion, being expected. These gentlemen had accordingly left the house, and having thus brought them into a scrape through his reliance upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as that right hon. gentleman's inclination was reported to him, he found himself under the necessity of moving the postponement of the discussion until to-morrow, or Monday.

Mr. Lambton expressed a hope, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would give some explanation respecting the circumstances alluded to by his learned friend, for he could say, that his understanding with respect to the result of the negotiation was the same as that of his learned friend.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that he had no objection to the postponement of the discussion, for the accommodation of the learned gentleman and his friends. An application was, no doubt, made to the learned gentleman for a copy of his motion, and such application was in conformity with the practice usually resorted to for the occasional accommodation of each side of the house. He had thus obtained a copy of the learned gentleman's motion, but, understanding that the learned gentleman insisted upon proposing the nomination of the committee, to which he could not assent, the treaty was broken off.

Mr. Brougham assured the house, that he had treated with the ambassador of the right hon. gentleman in perfect good faith, and he was led to think there would be no objection to his motion for the appointment of a committee; but it now appeared from the language of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that if he himself were allowed to name the committee, he should not oppose the motion.

Mr. Lambton said, that, according to his understanding, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had expressed no objection to his learned friend's motion, until he found, from seeing the names of the committee which his learned friend proposed, that the majority were not very likely to support his views.

The further discussion of the motion was then adjourned till Tuesday next.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Mr. Alderman Wood presented a petition of inhabitants of Leeds, praying for reform. This petition, he felt it his duty to state, contained some expressions of a peculiar character: but as he understood that other petitions containing similar expressions had been received by the house, that which he held in his hand would not, probably, be objected to. Still, he thought it right to state the expressions to which he alluded, namely, that the system by which that house was constructed being the bane of the state, the only antidote was a reform, according to the principles of annual parliaments and universal suffrage, upon the adoption of which it would be an honourable house. The petition also prayed for the impeachment of the ministers, by whom the suspension of the habeas corpus act was proposed, and the powers created by that suspension so grossly abused, adding, that unless reform were acceded to, the petitioners would not be able to pay the inordinate taxes to which they were subjected.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table, as was a petition to the same effect from George Edmonds, the chairman of a meeting consisting of 20,000 persons, at Birmingham.—The latter petition prayed the house to take its stand between a despotic ministry and an enslaved people.

Sir M. W. Ridley presented two petitions of inhabitants of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, each signed by 20 persons, praying for reform, and deprecating any indemnity act. The hon. baronet, in presenting these petitions, thought it right to state, that he could not concur in the wishes of the petitioners for the establishment of universal suffrage and annual parliaments.—Ordered to lie on the table.

BANK OF ENGLAND.] Lord A. Hamilton rose to submit a motion on the subject of the Bank. At a time, he observed, when it was evidently intended to continue the restriction of cash payments, it was, in his opinion, the duty of the house to look to the conduct of that establishment with peculiar care, as well as to the proceedings of the minister, who was so intimately connected with it. With a view to understand the conduct of the Bank, he felt it necessary to move for copies of the notices issued by it for the payment of certain of its notes in cash within the last year. A pretty general impression prevailed, that those notices were issued merely for the purpose of delusion, and to induce a belief that the Bank was in possession of the means, and was in the progress of preparing to resume its payments in cash. The house would recollect, that the minister professed to be desirous, and the Bank professed to be both desirous and ready, to resume cash payments. These notices were held forth to the country, as a preparatory step—or rather, as a partial incipient resumption. It was therefore due to the character of the Bank, as well as to the satisfaction of the country, to explain not only the motive and object of these notices, but also their practical effect—their tendency to facilitate, or to accelerate, the great end in view. It was now clear that there was no intention of resuming cash payments, at the period prescribed by the existing act. A plea was advanced for postponing that desirable measure arising out of certain negotiations for foreign loans; but this he believed to be a mere pretence. It was known that there was a great deal of cash afloat in this country about two years ago, but now, comparatively, little was to be found in circulation, notwithstanding the boasted issue of cash from the Bank. This issue was, however, he apprehended, but very trifling; but trifling or not, its disappearance as fast as it was issued, evinced the lamentable fact, that the existing legal coin, and the existing legal paper could not circulate together; and that the country had not much reason to rely upon the professions, or promises, of either the Directors of the Bank or the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as to the probability of the removal of the restriction upon cash payments. But it was for the Bank to shew whether any, and what beneficial effect had arisen from the steps it was reported to have taken to prepare for the resumption of its payments in cash. This was the object of his motion, and that motion could not be resisted by any such arguments as were advanced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer towards the close of the last session. It was then opposed as unnecessary, because the Bank were about to resume payments at a fixed and stated time—that time, it now appeared, was again to be postponed, and, therefore, it could not be, now, consistently resisted, unless it were shewn that some injury would result to the Bank from its adoption. The noble lord concluded with moving for a "copy of any notice given by the Directors of the Bank to the public in the year 1817, respecting any payment of their notes in specie; together with an account of the amount of specie which in consequence of such notice the company of the Bank became liable to pay, and the amount actually paid, to the latest period the same can be made out."

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, the noble lord might easily have anticipated his objections to this motion, if he had recollected the grounds upon which he resisted a similar motion in the course of the last year. Those grounds were, that nothing would be so unadvisable on the part of that house, as to interfere with the conduct of the Bank in a case of this nature; that such interference was of all things most likely to derange the proceedings of that body, and to impede those preparations so essentially necessary for that final resumption of cash-payments, which it was the wish of that house, and of the country, to witness.—Yet the noble lord would deem it safe and convenient to bring those preparations into general notice, and for what purpose he could not divine. The best plan to pursue, was, to allow the Bank to proceed silently and cautiously in the progress of its preparations. That it had taken up a vast number of notes, and issued cash to a considerable amount, in consequence of the notices referred to by the noble lord, was a fact which, he presumed, no one would venture to deny. It was also indisputable, that those notices were issued with a view of paving the way for the complete resumption of cash-payments. With respect to the circumstances which had since occurred, or which were likely to occur, to postpone that resumption, he was not then disposed to enter into them, but he would maintain, that the Bank had, in the notices alluded to by the noble lord, given a pledge of its sincerity, and preparation to resume cash-payments. The Bank, then, was intitled to confidence for the rectitude of its conduct, and the candour of its disposition, to comply with the wishes of parliament and the public, as soon as it should be deemed advisable to remove the restriction. He could not, therefore, sanction any measure which implied doubt as to this institution, and he felt it his duty to oppose the motion.

Mr. Grenfell observed, that this motion was more interesting to the cause of the Bank than to that of the public; and, therefore, he was surprised to find that no director had risen to speak upon it, especially as he had lately seen no less than four directors in the house. But he remarked, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was always ready to step forward as the champion of the Bank, without the aid of a single speech from any of the directors of that institution; of the votes of all of whom, however, he was of course fully assured, especially upon any question connected with their own interest. The right hon. gentleman had had those votes whenever he (Mr. G.) brought forward any motion with respect to the Bank. But the right hon. gentleman was not ungrateful, for when he (Mr. G.) objected to the allowance of half a million per annum to the Bank for performing the office of bankers for the public, and also to the grant of 300,000*l.*, for managing the payment of the interest upon our public debt—when he protested against such improvident, such inordinate grants, the Chancellor of the Exchequer always stood forward as one of the contracting parties, urging that, whatever the members of that house, or the people of the country, thought of these grants, the Bank rendered such services to the public as formed an ample compensation; but what those services were he had never accurately defined. As to the motion of his noble friend, the Chancellor of the Exchequer's objections were the same, he perceived, as those which he had advanced to a similar motion in July last. The case of the country, as well as of the Bank, was, however, rather different at the present time. The Chancellor of the Exchequer observed in July, that to accede to the motion would only serve to gratify an idle curiosity, as the Bank had virtually resumed its payments in cash. But this was a statement which the right hon. gentleman would hardly venture to make on the present occasion. The motion of his noble friend, against which the right hon. gentleman had advanced neither fact nor argument, was such as the house ought to adopt, especially with a view to obtain such information as was peculiarly necessary to guide its judgment on the subject of the resumption of payments, on the 5th of July next.

The house then divided.

Mr. Tierney then rose and said, he did not intend to enter at length into the grounds of the motion, of which he had given notice, respecting the amount of Bank notes in circulation. The house had already before them an account of the outstanding notes to the 3d of February last; he meant now to move for a similar account for four weeks more, down to the 3d of March. His reason was, that he was anxious, if possible, to see his way upon this subject. He should refer the points connected with the general management of the Bank, and involving the whole question of the resumption of cash-payments, to a future occasion, and a fuller house. But, unless gentlemen had made up their minds upon the subject, and were satisfied that cash-payments would not be resumed at the period fixed by parliament, they must feel an impatience to see whether, during the interesting period between this and the 5th of July, the Bank would do all that was possible for the purpose of resuming cash-payments. The Bank might be collecting great quantities of gold. He had no doubt that they were doing so, but the great increase of notes might counteract their efforts. He believed most sincerely that many, very many, of the Bank directors were anxious to prepare for the resumption of cash-payments. He believed this to be particularly the desire of the governor of the Bank (Mr. Harman), a gentleman of great experience and high character, a thorough bred English merchant of the old school, who knew the value of a wholesome state of the circulation to the commercial world. It was a most singular thing, that the right hon. gentleman, too, in the month of June last, had most peremptorily affirmed that there was not the smallest doubt of the Bank resuming cash-payments at the period fixed, and that it had virtually resumed them at that time. Now, if the Bank were really to resume cash-payments, it could not be doubted that a considerable reduction must be made in the number of their notes in circulation. Two opinions could not exist on that point. That, then, was the cause of his alarm. He felt that it would be inconvenient to withdraw a large proportion of notes suddenly from circulation, and he should deprecate, therefore, any sudden and extensive reduction in the quantity circulated. He was anxious not to be misunderstood on this point. If, on the 5th of July, the Bank should be obliged to withdraw one half of their notes, in order to resume cash-payments, he should be very sorry that they should be obliged to withdraw so much. But, to prevent the necessity of withdrawing any large quantity of notes, it was reasonable to expect that they would gradually withdraw, that they would gradually narrow, their issue of notes. If, then, the intention of resuming cash-payments were really entertained, some reduction in the issue must have taken place. How must the house be surprised to find, that they had acted in a manner directly contrary to this natural expectation, and that, in six months after parliament had been prorogued—that is, from July to December last—they issued more notes than had previously existed for several months. This would appear by looking at the issues for the last eighteen months, taking them in three periods of six months. The issue was,—

From July to Dec. 1816, 26,300,000*l.*
From July to Dec. 1817, 29,256,000*l.*

He was happy that he had made this statement in the presence of hon. directors, who would explain this extraordinary increase of issue, when a decrease was so reasonably expected. There was an increase of not less than 2,000,000*l.* in twelve months, and during the time that such strong assurances of cash-payments were given. How could they have acted more dexterously, if their object had been to prevent the resumption of cash-payments? Some gentlemen would explain this proceeding. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had said, that nothing in the state of the finances at home would prevent the resumption of cash-payments. Would he now say that this increased issue was not of the greatest use possible to his plans of finance? Would he say, that it did not contribute most materially to enable him to make the flattering—(he did not wish to use an invidious term)—the flattering statements he had brought before the house? Would he say, that he could have made his arrangements respecting exchequer-bills, if this increase had not taken place? The extraordinary issues of the Bank were either in accommodation to the government, or to the public, or (a third purpose which he was scarcely at liberty to mention) to purchase exchequer-bills. They had accommodated government with ten millions; but 19 millions of their issue in the last six months still remained to be accounted for. Was the increase, then, for the accommodation of the public? It evidently was not; for the amount of discounts was from 1,500,000*l.* to 2,000,000*l.* This was easily accounted for, as the rate of interest at the Bank was so high as five per cent., while the rate of interest elsewhere was lowered by the immense issues of the Bank. This subject was not very entertaining at that hour of the night, and in so thin a house; he would, therefore, abstain from going into all the points connected with it; but there was one point which he would mention, and which he begged the house to attend to; it was, that it became very necessary to watch the Bank. They increased their issues so enormously, either to amass profit to themselves, or to accommodate the government. If they had entertained any intention of resuming cash-payments, some reduction would have been observed in their issues during the last four weeks, and would be found in every period of four weeks till the 5th of July; for he would call for similar accounts at the end of every four weeks, and if no reduction took place, he would bring the subject in a different form before parliament. The danger of foreign loans was not the object of inquiry. His object was to restore the circulation to a wholesome state. If, during the restriction, notes were issued with moderation, and as the state of the country warranted, he should have no objection to it. No man could be desirous of hoarding guineas while there was no panic in the state. But restriction led inevitably to profusion and ruin. He most confidently affirmed, that the personal property of this country was in the greatest jeopardy. This was not a hasty opinion; it was the result of much discussion, of mature deliberation, and long time devoted to the inquiry. He was fully convinced that some dreadful calamity was inevitable, if the present system of finance were persisted in. He did not allude to the extraordinary fluctuations of the funds, and other interesting sources of alarm which the country owed to Mr. Pitt. The whole question was, whether the notes circulated in this country could ever become convertible into metallic currency. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had said, with a due quantity of parentheses, that it would be no inconvenience to the government, if the Bank were to resume cash-payments. But let the Bank, then, state to him, why they had increased their issue. If no explanation were given; if the Bank remained in profound silence, sheltering themselves under the right hon. gentleman's majority of votes, and leaving him to fight their battles, he must suspect all that could be suspected. Just at the moment when reductions were expected, they had increased their issue, and thus created an insuperable bar to the resumption of cash-payments. The right hon. gentleman concluded by moving for "an account of the total weekly amount of Bank notes and Bank post bills in circulation from the 3d of February to the 3d of March 1818; distinguishing the Bank post bills, the amount of notes under the value of five pounds, and stating the aggregate amount of the whole."

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, he did not intend to oppose the production of this account, nor did he think the present a fit period for entering into a consideration of the general question. He should only say, therefore, that he agreed for the most part with the principle maintained by the right hon. gentleman, that the reduction of the issues of the Bank was a necessary means and preparation for enabling them to resume their cash-payments. He had some limitations, however, to suggest to the broad proposition that it was the only means, which limitations had been very clearly explained in the work of a deceased friend both of his and of the right hon. gentleman—he meant the late Mr. Henry Thornton.

Mr. Manning denied that the Bank had ever sought to shelter itself behind the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The directors were prepared to justify every part of their proceedings. The right hon. gentleman had accused the Bank of enlarging their issues immediately after the last session of parliament, as if the operation of the funds, and the payment of the public dividends in July last, did not sufficiently account for an increased quantity of paper in circulation at that period. He could not at that moment, not having expected to hear the right hon. gentleman's statement, mention the other circumstances which might have contributed to an extension of their issues; but he disclaimed, on the part of the Bank, any wish to extend them at that particular time. He had no intention to oppose the motion, and had never, when filling the chair of the direction, been averse to afford the house all the information which, in its vigilance or jealousy, it might require.

Mr. Grenfell remarked, that the increased issues alluded to by his right hon. friend had taken place, not at one period, but had continued during the whole half-year ending in December of last year. The average circulation for that period exceeded by a sum of between 2,000,000*l.* and 3,000,000*l.*, the average circulation of the corresponding six months of the year preceding. He would go further, and assert, that the amount of circulating paper issued by the Bank of England for the last six months, was greater than at any former period of equal duration since the year 1797. He wished the house to understand that the extent to which gambling in the funds was carried on at the present moment was without precedent or parallel. (Hear, hear.) He did not say that the right hon. gentleman was desirous of producing such an effect; but the system on which he acted had an inevitable tendency to create and encourage the evil. It had, in fact, caused a greater degree of fluctuation in the value of the funds than had ever before been known; and it might be traced in some measure to the uncertainty that existed on the subject of renewing the restriction act. He entreated the right hon. gentleman to put an end to this uncertainty by openly declaring his intentions, or, if the event depended on a contingency, to state what that contingency was. It was due, in justice to the public, that those who stood nearest to the right hon. gentleman should not, by becoming first acquainted with the secret, possess themselves of very considerable advantages. The right hon. gentleman was a moral man, and, he was sure, was not aware of the effects of the present vacillation of the funds, or of the number of those who daily became its victims. The same uncertainty prevailed with respect to the right hon. gentleman's plan of finance for the year, and whether it was in his contemplation to fund exchequer-bills. He could not conceive any adequate reason for all this concealment; and he again entreated the right hon. gentleman, either now or at some early opportunity, to give the public some information on the subject.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, he felt himself called upon to say a very few words, after what had fallen from the hon. gentleman. He denied, and challenged the hon. gentleman to shew, that any thing he had ever uttered with relation to the finances of the country, had led to the encouragement of gambling in the funds. He likewise denied that any persons had received, or would receive, private information from him of what financial arrangements he proposed to submit to parliament for the service of the year; and he treated the insinuation, therefore, with the contempt which it deserved. (Hear, hear.) He did not think it consistent with his public duty to make the disclosures suggested by the hon. gentleman, and he should leave it to the house to judge, whether he was not more likely to promote gambling by any premature or partial declarations than by preserving a perfect silence on the subject.

Mr. Tierney, in reply, observed, that the country was entitled to look to the Bank for the protection of its currency; it was the condition of their charter, and the tenure by which they enjoyed all their advantages. If he should, therefore, observe, that they failed in making those timely and gradual preparations which alone could enable them to restore the circulation to a sound state, his only course would be to draw the attention of the house and the public to their conduct. He should then contend that the Bank had forfeited their claim to any further confidence. The hon. director (Mr. Manning) smiled, but he must repeat, that the Bank were, on this question, bound to act separately and independently of the right hon. gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer). If the Bank neglected to take those necessary and precautionary measures which must precede their return to cash payments, happen when it might, the responsibility would belong to them, and not to the government. With regard to foreign loans negotiated in this country, it could not be pretended that they would be facilitated by the resumption of cash-payments. The house certainly did not know how far the right hon. gentleman might wish to see our allies accommodated; but however that might be, with this the Bank had nothing to do. They had a plain, simple course to pursue. He could not help thinking that the hon. director, who had twice passed the chair, must, with his experience, be able to state the cause of the increased issues subsequent to the last session of parliament. As he would not, however, give any reason, he (Mr. Tierney) must find one for himself. He entertained much private friendship for the hon. director, but he could not forego his public duty; and if he should find in April next that the Bank were still proceeding in their present career, he should move certain resolutions, declaratory of the opinion of parliament, for the purpose of giving that security to the property of the country which he conceived it would, under such circumstances, require.

Mr. Grenfell, in explanation, observed, that he had not imputed, or meant in the most distant way to impute, any corrupt or dishonourable practices to the right hon. gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer), of whose personal purity no man was more satisfied than himself.

The motion was then put, and carried.

Ways and Means.] The house went into a committee of ways and means. The account of Exchequer bills issued under act 51 Geo. 3. (presented on the 12th of February) was referred to the said committee, and the following resolution was agreed to. "That, towards raising the supply granted to his Majesty, there be issued and applied the sum of 21,448*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* paid into the Exchequer, pursuant to an act of the 51st year of his present Majesty, for enabling his Majesty to direct the issue of Exchequer bills to a limited amount, for the purposes and in manner therein mentioned, and which remains for the disposition of parliament."

Copyright Bill.] A petition of the University of Oxford against this bill, was presented, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mutiny Bill.] This bill was read a second time.

Mutiny Act Mistake Bill.] Lord Palmerston moved, that the Mutiny Act, 55 Geo. 3. c. 108. be entered as read. This being done, the noble lord brought in a bill "to rectify a mistake in an act passed in the 55th year of the reign of his present Majesty, for punishing mutiny and desertion, and to indemnify certain persons in relation thereto."—Read a first time.

Marine Mutiny Bill.] Mr. Croker brought in a bill "for the regulating of his Majesty's Royal Marine Forces while on shore."—Read a first time.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Thursday, March 5th.

Bank Restriction Act.] The Earl of Lauderdale rose to move for a variety of accounts, in order that the house might have before it accurate information respecting the effects of the Bank Restriction, which, in some shape or other, must soon come under discussion.—The noble earl moved first, for an account of the market prices of gold and silver of different denominations, and the rates of exchange at Hamburgh, Lisbon, and Paris, from the 1st of January 1818, up to the latest time at which they could be furnished.—The noble earl then observed, that there was a difference in the price of Spanish dollars and silver in bars, owing to the difference in the quantity of alloy. The quantity required to the ounce was 480 grains, but there were 20 grains more of pure silver in the ounce of standard silver than in dollars. It was very singular, however, that, according to the accounts which had been presented to the house, the article which had 20 grains less of pure silver should be described as the highest in price. From the evidence which had been given by the refiners, it appeared that the price, however small the difference might be, was invariably regulated by the quantity of pure silver in the ounce; but there was a very suspicious circumstance in the account which had been produced. It appeared that in all the accounts before the bullion committee, the word "standard" had been added to silver; but in the account to which he alluded, the word "standard" had been omitted. There was, therefore, no knowing what degree of alloy the silver in question might contain, and, of course, no means of making a comparison. He therefore moved, that there be laid before the house an account stating the number of grains of pure silver and alloy in the ounce of bar silver and in dollars.

The noble earl then moved that there be laid before the house an account of the average amount of bank-notes, and bank post bills, in circulation during each half year, from January 1797 to January 1818, inclusive.—The whole of these accounts were ordered.

NEPAUL WAR.] The Lord Chancellor stated, that he had received a letter from the marquis of Hastings, governor-general and commander-in-chief of his Majesty's troops in India, dated at Cawnpore, in September last, acknowledging the receipt of the Lord Chancellor's letter, communicating the thanks of the house for his conduct in India, (see vol. 1, p. 111), and expressing his high sense of the honour thus conferred upon him.

Ordered to be entered upon the Journals.

INDEMNITY BILL.] The Earl of Liverpool moved the third reading of the indemnity bill.

Lord Auckland said, that notwithstanding the alterations which had been made in this bill, many of which he acknowledged to be improvements, he could not bring his mind to accede to it. His objections to it appeared to him insurmountable, but he should endeavour to comprise his statement of them in as few sentences as possible. At the same time he must observe, that, great as his objections to the measure were, he did not mean to propose a motion which should be a direct negative to it. What he should recommend was, that the bill be recommitted, with a view to its being divided into two bills in the committee. Only one ground of defence had been laid for the measure when it was brought forward, namely, that ministers or magistrates might have arrested persons improperly, through mistake or from zeal for the public good, and it was proper that parliament should protect the magistrates who had ordered such arrests. As far as this defence fairly went, he should be willing to admit the application of the bill, though he could not but regret that so very small a portion of information on the subject had been laid before their lordships; and that, with regard to the necessity of this protection of the magistrates, their lordships had nothing before them but assumption. The noble and learned lord on the woolsack had, on a former night (see page 678.) supposed the case of a magistrate, dismissing a tumultuous assembly of 12,000 persons; and had asked, would their lordships allow that magistrate to be exposed to 12,000 actions? Now, it so happened, that a magistrate in the situation supposed was already indemnified by the 24th of Geo. 2; for, according to that act, no action can be maintained against a magistrate, unless it be brought within six months after the arrest. If, then, there were any actions which had been commenced within the time specified for such cases, it might be reasonable to call on their lordships to provide for them, but not for others. In fact, nothing could be more absurd and inconsistent than the grounds on which it had been attempted to support this bill. Their lordships had been told by the noble duke who introduced it, that it was a necessary consequence of the suspension of the habeas corpus; but this ground, even after all the explanations which had been given, appeared unintelligible. The defence seemed to resolve into this—that when, in consequence of the suspension of the habeas corpus, a number of arrests had been made by magistrates, the circumstance of those magistrates having acted with a view to the public good under the existing law, rendered it necessary that they should have an indemnity; but, in the preamble of the bill, there was no reference to the acts of the last session, nor to any actions brought against magistrates. The other ground of defence, the necessity of not disclosing information, was equally unstable. It was to the real circumstances of the case their lordships had to look, in considering whether ministers had established any ground for passing this bill. Now, what were the circumstances? A committee of secrecy had been appointed, under the pretence of inquiring into the state of the country, and the conduct of ministers under the suspension of the habeas corpus, but, in fact, with the sole view of stifling all effectual inquiry. What did the report of that committee contain? What could it be expected to contain? When it was brought forward, their lordships had found it merely a sort of newspaper abstract of the proceedings at Derby, terminating with a pompous encomium on the conduct of his Majesty's ministers, and the magistrates who had carried the habeas corpus suspension act into execution. The bill, however, did not confine its protection to these highly commended ministers and magistrates, but extended the indemnity to every menial agent who had been employed under them, to all the base informers and spies, at whose instigation every act which was really criminal appeared to have been committed. Why were these men to be protected? On innocent men, at least men against whom no charge could be preferred in a court of justice, a mark of infamy was allowed to remain. It was most unjust that this protection should be given to concealed evidence. Such a practice was perfectly hostile to the spirit of English jurisprudence, which required that the accuser should not be heard in secret, but should be confronted with him against whom he brought his charge. This sanction given to secret information was deeply to be deplored, and he almost equally regretted that their lordships had, in the committee, given their sanction to the preamble of this bill, which was so inconsistent with all the grounds on which it was pretended to be introduced, and the purposes to which it was proposed that it should be applied. For these reasons he should move, "that the bill be re-committed."

The Lord Chancellor put the question, that the words "now read a third time" stand part of the motion.

Lord King said, he thought it necessary to say a few words on the motion made by his noble friend for re-committing the bill. In the shape in which the measure came before their lordships, it obviously extended the protection of indemnity too far, and much farther than any of the grounds on which the bill was pretended to be introduced warranted. In fact, it was proposed to extend indemnity as fully to him who did not deserve it, as to him who did. It not only indemnified the magistrate who had acted in good faith under the suspension act, but the spy who had provoked the disorders which afforded pretexts for that law. That this protection of informers had been in view, from beginning to end, was evident from the manner in which the clause proposed for excepting these persons from the operation of the bill had been opposed and rejected. It appeared clear that it had, from the first, never been intended to confine the bill to ministers and magistrates; but to make it give a sweeping protection to the lowest agents. With respect to the preliminary measure, the report of the committee, which preceded the bill, it was notorious that the evidence on which that report was founded was altogether ex parte; for their lordships had refused to refer to the committee any of the numerous petitions presented from persons who stated themselves to have been aggrieved, or seriously injured, by the suspension of the habeas corpus. It was undeniable, that many persons had had to endure solitary confinement for a great length of time. Why did not the committee inquire into their cases? The report of a former committee admitted, that the spies employed to discover treasonable designs had instigated to acts which they were only employed to detect. Did not this warrant the suspicion that many of the persons who complained of the operation of the habeas corpus suspension, had suffered innocently? The last report laid before their lordships stated, that, up to a certain period, it had been intended to bring the persons in custody to trial. He should be glad to be informed, when that intention had been abandoned? He believed that the true reason of refraining to try them was, that ministers had no evidence against them, except what they had procured from their spies and informers. But, after the result of the proceedings on a charge of treason in Westminster-hall, where almost the whole case rested on the evidence of an informer, he did not think it probable that any trial on such evidence could have been again contemplated. The period at which the intention of trying the persons detained had been abandoned, was, therefore, in all probability not very recent. When the bill was in the committee, their lordships had been told, that it was necessary to protect persons who had given information of illegal designs. Here he could not help asking himself, whether he was living in a country governed by law? Was it possible to conceive, that, in England, it had now become dangerous for a man to do his duty to the public? Was it meant to be said, that if a man performed his duty, by giving evidence, tending to the punishment of crimes, he was liable to assassination? To this extent the supposition on which the protection was called for went; but he never could be brought to think so ill of the people of England, as to believe there could be any ground for such a calumny. In what part of the world were witnesses so secure as in this country? Their security rested on a solid foundation—on the publicity of all legal proceedings—on the excellent practice of confronting the accuser with the accused. Witnesses were safe, because there were no secret tribunals to excite the jealousy and indignation of the people. The way to bring witnesses into danger was the very practice which had been resorted to—the throwing a veil over their evidence—the taking of informations without confronting the accuser with the accused. This was precisely the principle on which the inquisition acted. The holy office could, like his Majesty's ministers, assign very plausible reasons for not making public the evidence on which its victims were consigned to dungeons and torments. This principle was the most dangerous ever introduced into this country, and, if allowed to take root, would destroy every vestige of liberty. If bills of indemnity of this sort were to become the consequence of the suspension of the habeas corpus act, a most fatal encouragement to the abuse of power would be afforded. If all the base agents employed during the late unfortunate period, all the infamous spies, were to have protection and reward, hosts of those iniquitous beings would be created. The country would soon abound with such wretches as that Judkin Fitzgerald of whom their lordships had heard so much. When ministers were asking for the power which was put into their hands, they called upon parliament to give it them upon their responsibility but, after obtaining that power, and exercising it, they shrunk from their boasted responsibility by refusing all inquiry. But this was not all they would, by the passing of this bill, establish a most dangerous precedent, and the act of 1818 would be quoted in support of future encroachments on the law and constitution; for it was impossible that any indemnity of a more extensive and sweeping nature could ever be proposed.—The public had been disgusted within these few days, with reports of persons employed by the police exciting individuals to commit crimes, in order that they might obtain the blood-money consequent upon the disclosure of those offences which they had themselves excited; and what was the difference between the practices of persons of this description exciting others to the commission of offences for the sake of obtaining a reward, and the practices of individuals employed by the government, who excited to acts of treason, in order that they, too, might obtain their reward? When Brock, Pelham, and Vaughan, and wretches of that description, obtained a pardon, was it not to be apprehended that the same crimes would be again excited for the sake of the rewards which their prosecution produced, and if informers, such as Oliver and his associates, were to obtain impunity, would it not be a consequence, that treason would again be excited, and that discontent would be increased? The system of employing spies had led to all the mischief on which this bill of indemnity was grounded: it was that system which promoted the proceedings that were made a pretext for suspending the habeas corpus. To grant an indemnity to such men, must strike at all confidence in public justice, a confidence which greatly, if not mainly, contributed to its support. The suspension was had recourse to last year in a period of profound peace: there was as much reason for its adoption four years ago, when the Luddites were creating disturbances. The only difference between the two periods was, that it was asserted last year, that the disaffected were connected with clubs in the metropolis; but this rested only on the evidence of Oliver, and if his evidence were taken away, there was nothing else to support the allegation. If, then, these spies had promoted the measures that led to the suspension, and if they were afterwards the only evidence on which that suspension was so unnecessarily continued, it became the house, at least, to except them from the operation of the present bill. He doubted not that his Majesty's ministers might be able to bear an inquiry; but unless these informers were excepted from the operation of the bill, it would look as if they shrunk from all inquiry: he should therefore oppose the bill, unless the indemnification were confined to magistrates, and spies were altogether excluded from its operation.

Earl Bathurst, after stating the nature of the motion before the house—that it was not to reject, but to re-commit, the bill, for the purpose of dividing it into two parts, so that his Majesty's ministers, and the magistrates acting under them, might be protected, and informers exposed to punishment, or at least be excepted from the proposed indemnity—observed, that the intention of the bill was not to protect informers, but to save his Majesty's ministers from the dilemma of giving up the names of the persons from whom they derived their information, or being obliged, if they refused to do so, to remain without defence. The noble mover himself had no objection to protect the magistrates who had acted conscientiously in discharge of their duty; but let the house look to the other parts of this case. Their lordships were aware that all cases of suspensions of the habeas corpus had been followed by bills of indemnity, and those bills had been granted without an inquiry, or without any appointment of a committee, on the notoriety that the powers granted under the suspension had not been abused. The only exception to this practice was in 1801; and the circumstances of that period were very different from those of the present. At that time there had not been merely a single suspension, but a series of suspensions from year to year; and an inquiry had then been instituted to ascertain, whether the powers confided during so long a period had been properly exercised; and if it was found that no abuses had been committed, a bill of indemnity was considered as the consequence of the inquiry. On the present occasion, the conduct of ministers had been referred to the inquiry of a committee; the committee had found, not merely that no abuses had been committed—the committee did not, as it had been asserted, conclude its report with a few compliments to ministers—but that no warrant had been made out except on information on oath. That was different from the language of the report of 1801. He did not say that this was the standard by which ministers were to be tried, or the rule by which they were in future to guide themselves in the exercise of extraordinary powers: he had reason to know that, in other times, those powers had been exercised on very different grounds, and such times might come again, when it would be impossible for ministers to discharge their duty honestly by such means. It was not, therefore, that he conceived the secretary of state bound to abide by such a rule, but that, abiding by it, he had succeeded in saving the state from all the horrors of anarchy. This afforded the strongest presumption, that the powers confided to him had been well and properly exercised. It had been objected, that the evidence was all ex-parte. But, after the report of the committee, were there any noble lords who would deny that parties had been detained on oath, and that their conduct had justified that detention? Of what, then, did the noble lords opposite wish to be informed? Did they say, that they wished to know the character of those who had furnished information to ministers, that they might then consider whether it were proper to conceal their names? What then, in order to know whether the names of these persons ought to be concealed or not, they would begin by a disclosure of their names! This was extraordinary reasoning indeed. But their real object in wishing to obtain the names of the informers was this:—that they might be able to shew, that, in fact, no traitors and no conspiracy had existed, and that, therefore, the act of last session ought never to have passed. It was not now the time to inquire whether that act should have been passed or not, but whether the powers granted under it had been properly exercised. It was not now the time to inquire whether dangerous designs and treasonable practices had existed, but whether the means adopted to repress them were such as were warranted by the extraordinary powers confided for their suppression. The argument of the noble lord was most extraordinary; for he brought forward facts of the most contradictory nature, to shew that such an act should never have passed. If the act was justified on the ground of disturbances having existed, of what use was the act, said the noble lord, when disturbances had existed four years before, and the same measure was never applied to them? If it was shewn that the country was now restored to a state of tranquillity, the noble lord said, the quietness that now prevails is a proof that the act was uncalled for. If it was urged that trials had taken place, and criminals had been found guilty, those criminals, according to the noble lord, were led into a conspiracy by spies and informers. If the result of some trials had been a verdict of not guilty, the noble lord urged it as a proof that no conspiracy existed. It would be just as reasonable to say, that a verdict of not guilty on a trial for murder was a decisive proof that no murder had been committed by any one. This, then, was the state of the case—the noble lord could not dispute that dangerous designs had been checked in their progress; but he disapproved of the means that had been adopted for that purpose, and, therefore, vented all his invective against the persons on whose information the warrants had been granted; and what did these invectives mean? That if any well disposed, any good and loyal person, knew of dangerous designs and conspiracies directed against the government and peace of the country, it was not his duty to come forward and disclose them as quickly as possible. Would the noble lords opposite say, that when parliament itself found and proclaimed the dangers that were impending over the country, those who were acquainted with the cause and point of danger were not to come forward and disclose all they knew? And if they did come forward, was it not fit that the house should afford them protection? But the noble lord said, "What had they to fear? why not bring them forward, and confront them with those whom they charged with crimes?" Was it nothing to be the object of the noble lord's invective? (Hear, hear, from the opposition bench.) Was it nothing to be exposed to all the shafts of disappointed malice, and the revenge of those whose schemes had been disappointed? Was it nothing to be the objects of party-spleen, and victims of a busy malignity? (Hear, hear.) It was, indeed, the duty of parliament to afford them its protection—a protection that the ordinary courts of law afforded to common informers. Another objection had been made by the noble lords opposite, to the practice of a bill of indemnity following a suspension of the habeas corpus; and their objection was this—"that a suspension was first proposed, and in order to smooth the way for it, it was held out, that persons in the execution of extraordinary powers were to be restrained from exercising them in an improper manner, by the responsibility they were subject to; but this was all nugatory, if a bill of indemnity was to follow every suspension." To whom, then, were the persons intrusted with such powers responsible? To parliament—to parliament that gave them the powers—to parliament that would not have given them, unless they had been necessary, but which would certainly protect those whom it entrusted, whenever it was necessary. It was in the full confidence that this protection would be afforded if they conducted themselves properly, that ministers ventured to exercise the powers intrusted to them; and the apprehension that such protection might be refused, if their conduct would not bear inquiry, prevented the commission of any abuse. Their lordships knew that they had given their sanction to such measures over and over again; but their doing so had never injured the liberties or prosperity of the country. And why? Not because the men to whom such powers had been committed were men of extraordinary forbearance or goodness; no! they were but men, and, as such, subject to all the infirmities and weakness of their fellow men: but the reason that they did not abuse the powers intrusted to them was, that they were responsible to parliament; and if they failed to exercise those powers in a proper manner, they knew that no protection would be given to them. The practice of passing bills of indemnity shewed the necessity there was for so doing, and that necessity shewed the responsibility of those for whom they were passed. If they were not responsible, it would not be necessary to pass a bill of indemnity. As he did not perceive any argument against the bill in all that had been urged, he could not possibly accede to the motion made by the noble lord.

Earl Grosvenor said, the noble earl who had just sat down, had taken a great deal of pains to justify the employment of spies and informers; but whatever the noble lord might urge on that subject, he did not expect that, in defending the practice, he would have deemed it expedient to attack the laws of his country. (Hear, hear.) His lordship had stated, that informers were heard and protected in the ordinary courts of law. Now, no person whatever came forward with the hope of reward, but his evidence was always received cum grano salis. It was true that informers were protected in the courts of law, but they were not concealed. (Loud cries of hear.) The noble lord was not more happy in his argument, that warrants had only been granted on information on oath, than in his attempt to shew that the evidence laid before the house was not ex-parte. The noble lord stated, that the information had all been on oath, and that this was not the case in 1801. But how did the house know that? Who had been examined to the fact? Supposing that the information was all on oath, was not that of itself ex-parte evidence? There was no opposing testimony, no examination whatever of the other side of the question. He had great pleasure in supporting the motion of his noble friend, and he thought it afforded the most intelligible way of discussing the merits of the bill, if it must be discussed at all. For himself, he had but one opinion—that of decided hostility to the whole measure, and he begged to enter his solemn protest against it. He did so because he was satisfied that the measure, connected with all that had been done during the last twelve months, struck most deeply into the constitution and freedom of the country. It cut them up, root and branch, and left them to be scattered by the wind. Their lordships must know the danger and the value of precedents: this would be a precedent relied on, and taken advantage of, in bad times—a precedent to justify the suspension of our liberties in times of profound tranquillity. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, precedents were relied on more than any argument; and the noble lords opposite defended every measure by precedent. What, then, would be the case hereafter, if weak and wicked ministers should have recourse to a precedent like this, so fatal to the liberties of the country? It was impossible to appreciate the extent of the danger. He was not prepared to say that such a measure ought never to be adopted. It might be necessary, after times of revolution, as in the time of King William; or in the reigns of George I. and II.; and in the year 1801: but it was not necessary at the present time. Two grounds ought to be shewn for its necessity: first, that there was no vice or infirmity in the original bill of suspension; and, secondly, that a proper inquiry had been made into the mode of exercising the powers granted by that bill.—The noble earl then proceeded to take a view of the reports of last year. Although the ratio justificativa of the suspension act was the apprehension of treason; yet the ratio accessoria was a wish to prevent all discussions that called for a reform of existing abuses. (Hear, hear.) If there really had been a persuasion that any danger existed in the cry for a reform of parliament, the mode of proceeding had not been manly or candid. If the publications on this subject were dangerous, they should have been prosecuted as libels, and proved to be dangerous by a verdict against them. Considerable alarm was excited last year by the reports of the committees, and by the language which some noble lords had employed in that house; but after the first report was published, it soon betrayed its own infirmity. It was found to be defective in one material point—that of the existence of a club in London, with which, it was said, all the minor clubs throughout the country kept up a correspondence. The alarm, however, was so great, that a new order of knights was created. With so many Orders already in existence—the Order of the Garter, the Order of St. Patrick, the Order of the Bath, in all its ramifications, the Order of the Thistle, and the prospect of an Order of the Leek, which, being himself half a Welchman, he should not object to—with so many Orders in existence, the new Order of the Knights of Brunswick was created, under the auspices of the noble secretary of state for the home department; and one of the tenets of their political creed was—that Hampden died a traitor to his country. (Hear, hear, hear.) How great must have been the alarm, to stir up such an order! However, the alarm subsided, and it was difficult to find matter for the second report. With regard to the seditious and blasphemous publications, on which so much stress had been laid, he would declare, that he had never heard or seen any thing of them until the trial of Mr. Hone. The jury by whom he was acquitted, looked probably on those productions with the same disgust that was felt towards them in that house; but he thought that it would not be difficult to conjecture the grounds upon which they had brought in their verdict.

The Lord Chancellor requested the noble earl to state them.

Earl Grosvenor said, he had no objection. The jury, probably, saw that the prosecution originated in a political feeling. (Hear.) They recollected that similar publications had, at one period of their lives, received the sanction of some noble lords of that house, and that even if Mr. Hone should fall, he ought not to fall by the hands of ministers: non tali—debuit ense mori. Another reason might be assigned. The jury had heard so much all their lives of the importance of looking at the intention of the offending parties, that they did so in this instance; and they thought that Mr. Hone had no intention to ridicule sacred subjects, but to ridicule his Majesty's ministers; that he had no such intention was evinced by his withdrawing the publication as soon as he found it objected to, and before prosecution. As no law existed against applying sacred subjects to secular purposes, it was very natural that the indecency of such a course should escape the notice of Mr. Hone; and the more so, as the best authority to be found on such a subject (that of eminent divines from the earliest to th latest period) was altogether in support of the practice. He (Earl G.) had been informed, that, in a certain county, where the magistrates took great pains to discover the distributers of blasphemous tracts, the only person whom they detected was a very loyal person, whose politics were known to accord with those of the noble viscount on the other side. Two letters were transmitted to the secretary of state, mentioning this fact, but no answer was returned to either of them. (Hear, hear.) With respect to the spies, he was ready to prove by the oath of persons ten thousand times more respectable than Oliver, that he and others had been at the bottom of all the mischief that took place. (Hear, hear, from Lord Sidmouth.) Would the noble lord deny that Bacon was acquainted with Oliver—Bacon, who was concerned in that transaction for which the unfortunate persons suffered at Derby? After all he had heard last year about the responsibility of ministers, seeing the result to be a bill of indemnity, he was persuaded (however respectable ministers might be) that their wishes were of a most despotic nature. Alarm was excited, and their lordships were told, that it was not from the proceedings of the great, but of the poor, that danger was to be apprehended. Were the indemnities on former occasions accorded from fear of the poor? No! it was the great and opulent, who, in every case, must join to cause any danger to the government. A noble earl had alluded on a former night (see page 589) to the French revolution, for the purpose of shewing the miseries which the lower orders might bring upon a country; but did the noble earl mean to say, that no great persons were concerned in the French revolution? Did he mean to deny that the duke of Orleans was concerned in it? The French revolution was not to be attributed to the violence and power of the lower classes, but to the weakness of a corrupt system of government. (Hear, hear.) Such would ever be the case when oppression compelled society to redress itself. There was not a despotic government in Germany which trampled on the little court of Saxe Weimar, that would not one day or other, if the same system were persevered in, share the same fate. They might flatter themselves that the day-star of liberty had set for ever, but it would reascend, and shed its influence over the oppressed.

> " Fond impious man, think'st thou yon sanguine cloud, > Rais'd by thy breath, has quench'd the orb of day?
> To-morrow he repairs his golden flood,
> And warms the nations with redoubled ray."

It had been a most unfortunate thing for this country to be so closely connected with those despotic governments; it led to despotic ideas, and a most expensive and unnecessary increase of our military force. Being perfectly convinced that the object of the noble earl was to promote the establishment of despotic government, and seeing that no case had been made out for the bill before the house, he cordially supported the motion of his noble friend.

The Bishop of Exeter expressed his surprise at the levity with which the noble earl, who was always considered a serious character, had treated the subject of those productions which had excited the disgust of every well-wisher of the established church. It was not necessary for him to repeat what the noble earl had said respecting blasphemous publications, nor did it appear to be of any importance to consider whether they were intended to ridicule ministers or not. If other publications, possessing more point and wit, were directed to a similar purpose, would it be contended, that therefore the present attempt to bring our sacred book, and our sacred liturgy, into disrepute, was justifiable? It was a serious calamity that such publications should be treated with levity. They had already done great mischief; but he hoped in God that the progress of that mischief was now arrested.

Earl Grosvenor, in explanation, said, that he had expressed his abhorrence of those publications, but he was still of opinion, that the most likely mode of dispersing the parodies throughout the country was that which the ministers had adopted with a view to suppress them.

The Bishop of Exeter declared, that, to his knowledge, many of the parodies had been distributed in his own diocese.

Lord Rolle assured their lordships, that they were also distributed very extensively in Devonshire. With respect to the propriety of employing spies, he could state, that a plan was laid for the purpose of getting at the arms of his regiment, which would probably have succeeded if it had not been for the intelligence of spies. If some strong measure had not been adopted, greater evils would have occurred: and if the ministers were answerable for any fault during the late transactions, it was, in his judgment, the fault of too much mildness.

The Lord Chancellor said, he doubted whether the speech of the noble earl (Grosvenor) contained a single argument that was applicable to the question before the house. He had himself in former periods of trouble endeavoured to do his duty to the country at large, and he had no hesitation in stating to the noble earl, that there were some rich persons of whom he was much more afraid than of the poor. Would the noble earl contend, that blasphemous publications should be permitted not only to disturb the minds of the well-disposed, but to threaten the altar and the throne, merely because there was a chance that their prosecution would have the effect of disseminating them more extensively? He had felt it his duty to say those few words, because he had lived in times when he was under the necessity of counteracting by prosecution, not libels against ministers in their public or private character, but a system of libelling calculated to destroy the whole character of our constitution and laws. That circumstance had led him to consider more minutely the conduct of the present law officer of the crown, who had in the most exemplary and faithful way discharged his duty, and who, if he had abstained from any one of the steps which he was known to have taken, would not have deserved the commendation to which he was now entitled.

The Marquis of Lansdown said, he could not refrain from troubling the house with a few observations to call back its attention, after the digressions into which some noble lords had wandered, to the main point under consideration. He hoped this would be the last time that he should be called upon to discuss measures like those which had been followed last year, and like that which was now before their lordships. He would state the grounds of his opinion as briefly as possible, and without traveling into those subjects which had been introduced into the discussion, but which he thought extraneous to the question. His noble friend behind him (Lord Auckland) had stated the best and only mode of proceeding which the house ought to follow; and he begged to draw back the discussion within the line which he had marked out. He was not then prepared to deny, that, after the measures which were pursued last year; after the legislature, judging from reports of its committees, that the public safety was in danger from conspiracy and treason, had invested ministers with extraordinary powers to prevent the mischiefs apprehended from those sources; a bill of indemnity, with certain limitations, and applying to certain cases, might not upon due inquiry and investigation be found proper and defensible, to protect them from the consequences of having executed their trust. He would not state it as a broad principle, that no indemnity should in any case be granted, or that, in the present instance, facts might not be brought forward to warrant such a proceeding. He allowed, that after such extraordinary powers as last year were conferred by the legislature had been put into the hands of ministers, parliament should strictly watch the manner in which they were exercised; should follow the government, step by step, in the execution of them; and if it found that they had not been abused—that no person had been arrested or imprisoned without a strict necessity—that though illegal acts were committed, they were necessary for the public safety—then it should grant protection to those who, in the discharge of their duty, might have been led to a breach of the law; but though he made this admission, he was not obliged to go all the lengths which the noble secretary of state opposite (Earl Bathurst), his noble friend, if he would allow him to call him so, had proceeded. He could not go to the extent of granting the noble secretary a shield to hold up, not to cover one man, who, in doing his duty, had transgressed the law—not to secure one case from legal investigation, where a suit might lead to the disclosure of information which ought to be concealed—but to protect all men who had acted under the suspension act, to prevent all suits, and to bar all redress without previous examination or inquiry. The language of his noble friend was, that the house should protect all informers; and he had asked, who would give information, except under assurance of protection? But against what were they to be protected? Why, against the taunts and reprobation of his noble friends! It should not, however, have escaped the noble secretary, that, in thus demanding a general protection to all persons of this kind, he was making no distinction between their character or motives, and shielding equally those who gave false, and those who gave true information; those who propagated malicious calumnies, and those who, from a sense of duty, transmitted to government what they thought important evidence. It should not have escaped him, that he was thus endangering government itself, by exposing it to receive falsehoods, and unfounded rumours, as truths: in extending equal impunity to those who abused its confidence, and those who contributed to its safety, he held up a shield, not between the true informer and unjust persecutor, but between the false informer and the laws of the country. He ought to remember, that he was thus allowing groundless aspersions and malignant calumnies to be propagated with impunity—that he was shielding those who acted from the worst motives, as well as those who acted from the best. The danger of this principle was so manifest, that it was found in no precedent before that of 1801. It emboldened informers, and made government itself their dupe. Those who employed them could not judge of their motives; and if the protection of a bill of indemnity was thrown over them, to secure their conduct from legal investigation, there were no means left of detecting their real characters. Hardened in their crimes, they could see their victims suffering under their malignant calumnies, without the means of redress, or without a possibility of giving that publicity to the machinations of their enemies, which was the greatest source of protection to the injured honour of individuals. The laws of this free country required that those who advanced charges should be called upon to support them, and not to shrink from their avowal without suffering the consequences of their secret malice. If protected against this avowal; if secret information was encouraged and acted upon, this country would become like Venice and other states, which acted on a dark and secret policy. The glory of the English law, and the frank character of the English, would entirely disappear, and no security could be expected for the administration of justice, or the enjoyment of freedom. Inconveniences might, in particular cases, result from our present system of publicity, but he was convinced that no man, who had a just sense of the blessings which it conferred, would hazard its existence for the inconveniences with which it might be accompanied, or shrink from the avowal of information which a sense of public duty compelled him to give, whatever might be the consequences of an unreserved disclosure. With these opinions, he could not but implore their lordships to consider what might be the consequences of the present bill, and what successive exceptions they were making in English law. For this reason, he had stated the observations with which he had troubled the house. He did not deny that a bill of indemnity might not be passed in certain cases, but he begged their lordships to consider well the steps by which they proceeded to such a conclusion. He remembered, that a great orator, and an able statesman (Mr. Windham) had, on one occasion, warned the members of the House of Commons to take care, not only that they were convinced, but that they came fairly and honestly by their conviction. He now made the same request to their lordships. He called upon them to refer to the report on which the bill was grounded, and on which, before amended, it was framed; and then to consider the bill in its amended state. It now included a principle, which was not in the report, that it was necessary to indemnify persons for illegal acts; whereas formerly it was said, that no illegal acts had been committed, and that the bill was only intended to protect individuals from suits who, in their defence, might be under the necessity of producing information which the public interest required to remain concealed. He would ask the house, whether a new principle of this kind should be suffered to pass without further inquiry, without knowing what illegal acts were alluded to, without examining what had been done by the magistrates; whether they deserved indemnity or not, and whether their conduct in breaking the law was warranted by the circumstances in which they were placed? Such a sweeping clause, so contrary to the report, should not be allowed by their lordships. If the illegal acts referred to were the dispersing of tumultuous assemblies, or the interruption of meetings of conspirators, what could be the danger of disclosing them to the public, and allowing the fullest investigation? The clause should, therefore, be taken out of the bill, and the acts alluded to made the subject of inquiry as public and notorious as the conduct of the magistrates was, who had dispersed those assemblies. The public mind would be easily satisfied of the propriety of their conduct, as there was no prejudice in favour of meetings by which the tranquillity of the country was threatened. This laid the ground for the proposition of his noble friend (Lord Auckland) who moved the amendment. It was the more necessary to obtain delay for consideration, that the present extraordinary measure might not be drawn into precedent. Believing, as he did, that the suspension act had passed under circumstances never before heard of as warranting such a measure, or rather in the absence of all the circumstances on which it was formerly at any time justified; in the absence of foreign war, or general domestic disaffection; when the great body of the people were confessedly untainted, and when those who were said to be disaffected were without leaders to conduct them to mischief; he thought that the history of the last year laid the house under an additional duty not to establish a precedent like the present, but to guard and fence it round with caution, to pay all due regard to public opinion, and to use every kind of reserve and specialty, that the example might not be resumed on similar occasions. A great political authority had said, that the great danger which threatened the constitution of this country arose from the influence of the executive over the legislative authority: and if, in any case, this influence was dangerous, it was in that, like the present, where the question turned neither upon the army, which was always placed at the disposal of the crown, nor the exercise of any of the ordinary and legitimate privileges of the government; but where the liberty of the subject was placed at its disposal without reserve, and the rights of individuals were invaded without redress. He had freely stated his opinion, and he implored their lordships to consider well the steps which they were pursuing. He was not prepared to say that severe proceedings might not have been necessary, and that a bill of indemnity might not be justified to a certain extent; but he thought that inquiry should precede it. The amended bill contained two principles: one, to protect those who had committed illegal acts, and the other, to shield from disclosure the information which had been transmitted to government. The former had been introduced at a late period, and without any previous investigation. He should, therefore, support the proposition of his noble friend, that time might be obtained for inquiry, that full justice might be done to the subject who was aggrieved, and due protection extended to the magistrates who, in executing what they conceived to be their duty, had transgressed the law.

The Earl of Westmorland said, the noble marquis must have overlooked the earlier clauses of the bill, or he would have been aware that its general tendency, as well as the direct tendency of the clause introduced by his noble and learned friend (the lord chancellor), was to protect persons who might have gone beyond the legal discharge of their duty. The bill of last year, for suspending the habeas corpus, founded on the reports of committees, composed of individuals of every party, was passed by a great majority of both houses. What did the noble lords opposite object to the present measure? They said, that the suspension of the habeas corpus was unnecessary, and that the insurrections and conspiracies which had existed, might have been put down without it. He concurred entirely in that opinion. He fully believed that those conspiracies and insurrections might have been put down by the executive government without the extraordinary powers given to it. But had the noble lords calculated how much murder, bloodshed, and devastation, might in that case have occurred? Had they considered how many brave soldiers might have fallen, or, if that were of little importance, how many of the deluded individuals themselves might have perished on the scaffold? It was mercy, and justice, and wisdom in the legislature to prevent such evils. Who could say to what extent the mischief might have proceeded, even had it been eventually checked, if parliament had not enabled the executive government to make the exertions which it had made? But their lordships had been told, that all the disaffection which had manifested itself in the country was the work of spies and informers. It happened rather unluckily for this assertion, that Castle, one of the persons alluded to, had no communication with the leaders of the party respecting which he had subsequently given information, until three weeks after some of their most violent acts; and, with respect to Oliver, what took place in the country had been distinctly predicted long before he was taken into the service of government. Spies and informers had from the earliest periods of history been the objects of popular dislike. But he believed, that no government had ever existed by which they had not been used, and that hardly any conspiracy or treason had ever been detected and punished without their aid. He would not argue whether or not the nation at large owed gratitude to such persons, but this he knew, that many individuals were greatly indebted to them for opening their eyes, and shewing them that those whom they were protecting under the supposition that they were honourable men, were rank traitors. He was very willing to allow, that a bill of indemnity was not a measure that followed of course the act of last session. But it should be recollected, that when the legislature gave to the executive government extraordinary powers, it was the duty of that government to exercise them. It was the imperative duty of the secretary of state, if he felt the exercise of the extraordinary powers vested in him to be necessary to the security of the country, to put them into execution. But would parliament invest any man with power, and then leave him subject to prosecutions and persecutions for the remainder of his life, for having exercised it? Was it possible to suppose that the legislature of this country would leave a servant of the country in such a state? And if parliament were bound, under such circumstances, to protect the secretary of state, they were equally bound to protect the magistrates, and to protect those from whom information of the designs of the disaffected had been obtained.

The Earl of Carnarvon said, the most extraordinary propositions had been urged on the other side. Was this a country whose constitutional laws enabled the inhabitants of great towns to meet at pleasure, to petition the sovereign, or parliament, or either of them, for the redress of grievances, real or imaginary? If such an assembly were collected, was it illegal? Were the magistrates justified in putting it down? Such a meeting, it appeared, had been called at Manchester, and he did not know whether or not it was an unlawful assembly: but he would suppose it to be unlawful. Here, then, there was an unlawful assembly, which the magistrates had put down: but, as far as respected the indemnity which ministers now proposed, their lordships ought to understand whether those magistrates had not exceeded their powers, and whether they ought to be protected, or punished for the excess. He maintained, that the house had no information on this subject, and that they were not in a situation to proceed on the allegations of the bill. In the committee he endeavoured, when he thought that they might understand the motives of the bill, such as they were represented to be, to limit it to this extent—that no plaintiff should be barred of his right of action, unless the secretary of state, upon due notice being given to him, returned an affidavit upon oath, that the public interest demanded a concealment of the information on which the defendant had acted, or the warrant of arrest was issued. As the bill now stood, with that new proposition interlarded which ministers seemed not to have dreamed of before, he meant that which referred to illegal acts, it would be vain for him to hope, by such an amendment, to make any sense of the clause. He had now only one course to adopt, which was, to give his negative to this bill. He considered it as a precedent more dangerous to the liberties, the happiness, and the security of the nation, than any of those disturbances would have been, which the noble lord said, if suppressed by the ordinary operation of the law, would have deluged the country with blood. In his conscience, he believed, that it was calculated to undermine and destroy the constitution of the country. Whatever the noble lord and his colleagues might be disposed to think of this measure, was it not telling the people, that, on all slight occasions, the constitution of England was inadequate to the protection of the country? This was a subject of grave consideration, and it behoved their lordships to weigh it seriously. In his view of the case, it would be far better to teach the people to love and to cherish that constitution which had been the admiration of the world, and without which we could not hope to preserve our importance abroad, or to secure our happiness at home. When the measures arose which were said to have produced the suspension of the habeas corpus, he was at a distance from the country, and he heard with anxiety and alarm of what was going on. But whether it was, that, being removed from the scene of apprehended danger, he was less alarmed than many of their lordships, or whether it had arisen from something afterwards disclosed in the report itself, he must declare, that he no sooner read the report than he dismissed from his mind all apprehensions with respect to the internal tranquillity of the country. When he read in that report, that there was a systematic plan to undermine morality and religion, and to overturn the constitution of the country, and he was told, that all this was to be done before the 2d of December, he thought it a farrago of absurdity that could alarm those only who did not look deeply into the matter. He then entertained no other fear than that the legislature might be induced to suspend the constitution of the country, and to follow it up by introducing a bill to protect not only ministers, but all the local and subordinate authorities, for acts of violence and oppression. If there were any thing which could make such a suspension of the ordinary laws palatable to him, it must be the responsibility of those who were to exercise such extraordinary powers; for, in his mind at least, in proportion as the power was greater, in equal proportion must the responsibility increase. The report of the committee was the most meagre of any reports that had ever been laid on their table: it did not establish any ground for the measures that had been adopted; but it gave rise to many new principles, which, if sanctioned by the house, would inflict a more fatal wound on the liberties of the country than it would have sustained by any of those dangers which noble lords opposite had painted in such glowing colours. Government had derived little strength or benefit from the suspension of the habeas corpus act. The fact was, that all the persons who had been tried were brought to trial within the period at which they had a right to be tried by the ordinary course of law, and all the advantage that government had enjoyed from the suspension was, the power of detaining thirty-seven persons in custody beyond that period which would otherwise have been legal, an advantage against which was to be set all that the constitution had suffered. Upon the whole, he felt it his duty to vote for the amendment of his noble friend; and if that were rejected, he should move that the bill be read a third time on that day three months. (Hear, hear.)

The amendment was then put, and negatived without a division: after which, their lordships divided on the motion of the noble earl, that the bill be read a third time on that day three months.

The bill was then read a third time and passed.

The following Protest was afterwards entered on the Journals of the House against the Bill.

Dissentient,

Because it is manifest that there has been no widely spread traitorous conspiracy, nor even any extensive disaffection to the government, since the secret committee, whose report is the sole foundation of this proceeding, do themselves express their satisfaction in delivering their decided opinion, "that not only the country in general, but in those districts where the designs of the disaffected were the most actively and unremittingly employed, the great body of the people had remained untainted even during periods of the greatest internal difficulty and distress;" stating further as facts, "that the insurgents were not formidable by their numbers, though actuated by an atrocious spirit, and that though the language used by many persons engaged in this enterprise, and particularly by their leaders, left no room to doubt that their objects were the overthrow of the established government, yet that such objects were extravagant when compared with the inadequate means which they possessed; and that not finding their confederates had arrived, as expected, to their support, and that in the villages through which they passed a strong indisposition being manifested against their cause and project, some of them had thrown away their pikes before the military appeared, and that on the first show of force had dispersed—Their leaders attempting in vain to rally them.

2d—Because in such a state of things so consolingly described by the committee, and so almost ludicrously destructive of every idea of an armed rebellion, or dangerous insurrection, more especially against a government supported by such an untainted people, and such an immense military force, we cannot but think that a different and less alarming course ought in wise policy to have been pursued, and that tranquillity might have been equally restored by a vigorous execution of the ordinary laws and the exertions of a vigilant magistracy, without any suspension of the public freedom, since it is the prompt selection and speedy execution of a few palpable offenders, rather than delayed proceedings against numbers upon doubtful testimony, that invest the courts of justice with a salutary terror and force.

3d—Because the departure from this just and judicious mode of proceeding, gave an indiscriminate importance to the accused, whilst it exposed the administration of the government to a dangerous disrespect.

4th—Because even when the act of habeas corpus is suspended, none on that account ought to be apprehended upon questionable suspicion, or, to use the language of the report, upon "such expectations of evidence as ministers have unavoidably relinquished," but upon such grounds only as would be just warrants for arrests and trials in ordinary times, the only legal effect of the suspension being that it suspends the deliverance of the accused: we think, therefore, that a general indemnity for such numerous and long imprisonments, ought not even to have been proposed to parliament, until an open and impartial investigation had taken place.

5th—Because, from the mistaken principle of this bill, malicious and meritorious illegality are equally protected, on the false and unfounded assumption that informations ought to be indiscriminately and perpetually secret; but even if we could agree that whilst traitorous conspiracies are actually in force, and extraordinary powers in action for their suppression, secrecy could in all cases be justified, yet we never could consent to its continuance after order was restored; the laws being then sufficient to protect good subjects for having honestly discharged their duties, and because holding out such general prospects of indemnity is a dangerous encouragement to mercenary informers, who make an infamous traffic in the lives and liberties of mankind, deceiving and disgracing the government, whilst they betray the innocent whom they accuse.

6th—Because it is not the occasional resort to such secret and impure sources of evidence in cases of obvious necessity, but the systematic encouragement of it, which we conceive is sanctioned by this bill, that we protest against and condemn, since the successful prosecutions of the worst traitors and libellers can bring no security to the government of this country, unless the conduct of its ministers and of its parliament, by a faithful adherence to the free principles of the constitution, shall constantly expose the malignity of their treasons and the falsehood of their libellous complaints.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, March 5.

Persons arrested for Treason.] A return was presented, pursuant to an address of the 25th of February, of persons arrested, committed, or detained on treasonable charges, in the year 1817.—Ordered to lie on the table and to be printed. (See the Appendix.)

Education of the Poor.] Mr. Brougham said, he rose to move the renewal of a committee which had been engaged in a great and laborious investigation, and from which a large body of evidence had already been reported to the house; he alluded to the committee appointed to inquire into the education of the lower orders. The committee had not been enabled to complete their labours before the close of last session; but he had pledged himself to move their renewal at an early period in the present session, that they might lay the result of their labours before the house in sufficient time to admit of some measures being adopted before the close of the session. He had before mentioned some proceedings which the committee were of opinion ought to be taken to remedy the want of education in different parts of the country. They were of opinion, that assistance ought to be given by the public towards the erection of schools in different places where it might be deemed advisable to have them, but that the principle of granting a permanent income either to government or to any society, for the support of schools, ought not to be sanctioned—that where there was a want of school-houses and houses for teachers, means for supplying them ought to be furnished by the public, either by way of loan or otherwise, according to circumstances. It was the opinion of the committee, that a moderate sum of money was all that would be wanted for this purpose. When they considered the great sums which had been distributed in a sister kingdom for education, and that a very large annual grant was given by parliament for this purpose, he hoped they would see the propriety of bestowing some money for a similar object in England. Seldom had less than 40,000*l.* been annually granted, ever since the union, to the Irish Charter schools. How far this money, which was given with so laudable an intention, had been beneficially employed, was very doubtful. Indeed, all the inquiries which he had made into the condition of the Irish Charter schools led him to believe, that, some way or other, either from carelessness or misapplication, those schools were productive of very little good. They received 40,000*l.* from the public, and, from the bequests of individuals, they derived an income of nearly 20,000*l.* more; their whole revenue might, therefore, be taken at nearly 60,000*l.* a year. The house would be very much surprised to learn, that, from this income of between 50 and 60,000*l.* a year, not more than 2,500 children were educated. When he said 2,500 children, he rather thought that he stated the outside of the number educated by these schools. In a report made to the Irish House of Commons, the number of children educated was said to be 2,500, and the Bishop of Raphoe, in a charity sermon, stated them at that number. But when Mr. Howard instituted an inquiry into the subject, he found that the children educated in the Charter schools of Ireland did not amount to one-third of that number. Some reform had been effected since that time, and those schools were now in a better condition; but, he believed, he was stating the outside when he said, that the number of children educated by them was 2,500. To shew the difference between the application of the funds of the Charter schools of Ireland, and the application of a small fund raised by several praiseworthy individuals here, he would state, that with an income of between 5 and 6,000*l.* the Hibernian School Society in London had planted and now kept up 340 schools, while the Charter schools, with an income of 60,000*l.* kept up only 30 schools. The Hibernian School Society educated 27,000 children, while the Charter schools educated only 2,500 children, with nearly six times their income. Again, nothing could exceed the order, and the cleanliness, of the children educated by the Hibernian School Society, whereas it appeared from Mr. Howard's account, though he believed considerable improvement in that respect had since taken place, that the children educated in the Charter schools were in a most wretched state. It would be painful to himself, and disgusting to the house, to repeat the language which Mr. Howard was compelled to use on this subject. He trusted, that whatever assistance parliament might think proper to give for the promotion of education in this country, would be given with great temperance, and with the utmost precaution. This was a subject to which the committee, after their renewal, would, probably, first turn their attention. They would next have to consider the expense which might be requisite in the first instance, and what part of it might ultimately fall on the country. A very small part of the expense would ultimately rest with the public. There existed throughout the country large funds which had been bequeathed by individuals for all purposes of charity, and particularly for the education of the poor. Those funds had, in many cases, been grossly misapplied; often, no doubt, from ignorance of the best method of employing them. In cases beyond the scope of the committee, it had come to their knowledge, that schools richly endowed in many parts of the country had fallen into entire disuse. For the purpose of investigating this subject, another tribunal ought to be instituted, besides a committee of the House of Commons. A committee of the House could not transport itself from place to place; its powers were limited; and to bring witnesses from different places throughout the country to London, would be attended with great inconvenience and expense. If commissioners or agents were appointed for this business, one journey to the different places would do, instead of bringing witnesses from all parts to London. In many places abuses existed, of which no knowledge could be obtained till persons went to the spot. Two years had now elapsed since this matter attracted the public attention, and hardly a day had passed, during that time, in which he had not received, from one place or other an account of some misapplication—of some schools founded, or meant to be founded, two hundred years ago perhaps, for which purpose lands, yielding a considerable revenue, were bequeathed,—while, in one place, only a few children were taught, and, in another, none. These abuses existed very generally throughout the country. It was highly honourable to the character of the people of England, that such vast funds had been settled for charitable purposes, which were little known in other countries, and not sufficiently looked at here. It was not generally known, that the income of the funds bequeathed for education, amounted to between 2 and 300,000*l.* A sum like this, if fairly employed, would go a very great way. Funds had also been bequeathed for various other purposes besides schools. The house would find that they were but entering on their task; for they ought to inquire generally into the misapplication of all charitable funds; this was a matter of absolute necessity. He, therefore, anticipated a recommendation to parliament, to adopt a plan of education for the poor throughout the country; and, 2dly, the appointment of a parliamentary commission, to investigate into the misapplication of the charitable funds destined for the education of the poor; and it would be extremely desirable, that a similar measure should be adopted for inquiring into the general misapplication of all charitable funds. He had on a former occasion (See vol. I. p. 1776.) stated, that, in a neighbouring county, a school had been established, and richly endowed, to the amount of 1500*l.* a year, which sum had been grossly misapplied; that the clergyman of the parish appointed his own brother to be the schoolmaster, and to receive the salary; but this gentleman being very willing to accept the 1500*l.* but unwilling to undertake any trouble, had appointed as his deputy a journeyman carpenter at 40*l.* a-year. This sum, however, that gentleman was not content to allow, and it was in consequence of an attempt to reduce it lower, that the committee became acquainted with the fact; the rector desiring that the curate should undertake the business as a mere matter of form at 20*l.* a year, to which the curate replied, that if it were a mere matter of form, the rector might do it himself. He had received this statement from a gentleman who appeared to be a clergyman, and he first communicated it to the committee, and afterwards to the house. He had not stated names or places. But a clergyman of Essex had complained to a member for that county, supposing it to reflect on him; and his statement of the matter was widely different from what had been represented: he said, that he taught more than he was bound to teach by the foundation of the institution, and that he employed assistants, one of whom was a member of one of the universities. He (Mr. Brougham) could not say that this was the place meant; but he had heard that, even there, there had been a misapplication formerly, though not in the time of the reverend gentleman. The hon. and learned gentleman said, that he wished to make this statement to the house, and concluded by moving "that a select committee be appointed to inquire into the education of the lower orders, and to report their observations thereupon, together with the minutes of the evidence taken before them, from time to time, to the house."

Mr. F. Robinson said, he was well acquainted with the reverend clergyman alluded to; and, on his part, he wished to state, that what had been said by the hon. gentleman was quite correct. This was doing justice to the character and to the feelings of the clergyman, which were naturally hurt; and who, he thought, would feel himself satisfied by this explanation.

Mr. Brougham explained. No injury could be sustained by the reverend gentleman when his conduct must be so well known. He did not see why he should apply the case to himself.

Mr. F. Robinson said, that the circumstance of his holding the living called his attention to the subject.

Mr. Peel wished to notice briefly the observations which the hon. and learned gentleman had made with regard to the protestant Charter schools of Ireland. The observations of the hon. and learned gentleman were probably made in ignorance of the public documents respecting those schools of a later date than the inquiry of Mr. Howard. He knew not whether he was acquainted with the report of the commissioners of education in 1808. The members of the board of education, and their secretary, had examined personally into the state of the protestant schools, which, up to the time of the rebellion, were in a very wretched state. The contrast which their present state afforded was highly honourable to the masters. At the time of the report in question, these schools had not above 30,000*l.* a year from parliament, and 9000*l.* a year from other sources. It was necessary to state also, when a contrast was made between the numbers taught in the Charter schools and the schools of the Hibernian Society, that the children in the Charter schools were clothed, and entirely supported, as well as educated, and the average expense of each child was calculated at 14*l.* a year. Thirty-nine establishments were maintained in different parts of Ireland.

Mr. Brougham agreed that the expense of clothing the children made a great difference, and that some improvements had taken place, but not to the extent that might have been expected. Neither did he think the education so well managed as in the Hibernian Charity schools.

Mr. W. Smith thought there were many cases among these schools in which the expenditure could not be equal to the receipts. The estates of many of them had become much more productive. He had heard of a school of which the trustees scarcely knew how to apply their funds.

Mr. Abercromby said, if a commission of inquiry were appointed, it ought to be authorized to inquire into the state of charitable institutions in general. He believed that, upon due examination, the house would be astonished to find the extent of waste, misapplication, and mismanagement. He hoped that some member would move for a general inquiry, if a commission should be proposed.

General Thornton said, that care ought to be taken to instruct female children in useful work.

The motion was then agreed to, and the committee appointed, with power to send for persons, papers and records. Five to be the quorum; and to sit notwithstanding any adjournment of the house. The reports on education of the two last sessions were ordered to be referred to them.

SALT DUTIES.] Mr. Davenport presented the following petition of the nobility, gentry, clergy, freeholders, and farmers of the county palatine of Chester. "That the petitioners have learnt with great satisfaction that the consideration of the salt duties is to be revived in the house in the course of the present session of parliament; that the petitioners humbly submit that the excessive duties imposed upon salt are very injurious to the agriculture, manufactures, trade, and fisheries of this country, and are particularly oppressive on the occupiers of dairy farms, of which the county of Chester is principally composed, and in which the greater part of the salt used throughout the kingdom is produced; that, from experiments already made, the use of salt for agricultural objects is likely to be attended with the most beneficial effects, but the allowance of salt for those purposes granted in the last session of parliament is charged with so heavy a duty, and clogged with so many perilous restrictions, that farmers cannot avail themselves of the liberty offered; that the burthen of the salt duties on the poor is so heavy as to take from the labourer a great proportion of his weekly earnings; that a tax thirty times greater than the intrinsic value of the article taxed, presents to the minds of the poor and indigent irresistible temptations to fraud and theft, and occasions the prevalence of crimes to an alarming and increasing extent: they therefore prayed, that the house would take their case into serious consideration, and grant such relief as to them should seem fit."

The hon. member implored the Chancellor of the Exchequer to take this subject into his serious consideration, and stated, that he could assure him of the truth of all the allegations in the petition from his own local knowledge.— Ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

The following petition of the Fish-curers at the port of Leith was also ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed. "That the petitioners have learnt with pleasure that the repeal of the salt duties is again to come under the consideration of the house in the course of the present session; that the numerous provisions and restrictions necessary to render any law effectual for levying a duty on salt, are utterly incompatible with that free and unrestrained use of salt, which is indispensably requisite to the prosperity of the British fisheries; that the grievous prosecutions and exactions to which fish-curers are liable for irregularities unavoidable in the course of their business, have become intolerable, and deter people of respectability from embarking in the trade; that the present is, beyond all former salt laws, inimical to the fisheries, and that unless relief be speedily granted, it must operate the ruin of the British fisheries; that the duty on salt, by holding out temptations to fraud and theft, is extremely injurious to the morals of the common people at large, and more particularly of the numerous class employed in the fisheries; and that a repeal of the salt duties would have the effect of extending the fisheries, and improving the sea-coasts of these kingdoms in an incalculable degree: they, therefore, prayed the house to take their case into consideration, and to grant such relief as to them might seem meet."

MUTINY BILL.] This bill was considered in a committee, and ordered to be reported to-morrow.

MUTINY ACT MISTAKE BILL.] This bill was read a second time, and committed for to-morow.

LEATHER TAX.] Accounts were presented (pursuant to an order of the 12th of February) of the number of ox hides on which drawback has been allowed, and also which have paid the import duty in England. (See the Appendix.)

PROMISSORY NOTES.] An account was presented (pursuant to an order of the 11th of February) of the number of stamps of promissory notes re-issuable. (See the Appendix.)

SPIES AND INFORMERS.] Mr. Philips rose, and said, that before he entered upon his motion on the subject of an inquiry into the transactions that occurred under the suspension act, he wished that the petition of certain inhabitants of Manchester and Salford, (presented to the house on the 9th of February,) the petitions of Benjamin Scholes, and of Joseph Mitchell, (presented on the 17th of February), the petition of George Bradbury, (presented on the 23d of February), and the petition of Samuel Bamford, (presented on the 27th of February), should be entered as read. This being done, the hon. member observed, that before he proceeded to recommend the house to adopt the motion with which he should conclude, it was his wish to guard himself from the suspicion of being inclined to encourage, or to appear as the advocate of, itinerant orators, who prefer living by talking rather than by working, and who journey from place to place lecturing on political subjects. He had no hope of any public benefit being derived from such proceedings; but was convinced that their tendency was to produce directly opposite effects. His sentiments on this subject might be inferred from the advice which he gave to a person of that description who had called on him since he came to town. His advice, though not offered in the form of paternal and correctional admonition, a phrase with which the house was well acquainted, (see page 319.) was such as he had no doubt the government itself would approve. He had recommended to the person alluded to, now that he was liberated from prison, to desist from attempting to reform the state, and to attend to his own business, and the interests of his family. This advice met with the fate which unsolicited advice generally meets with. The man thanked him for it, but shewed at the same time by his manner, that he was quite determined not to follow it. The hon. member said, he was aware, that, from peculiar causes, a great ferment had arisen in the minds of people during the last year, particularly in the manufacturing districts. He was also ready to admit, that the mere agitation of political questions of great importance and difficulty, by large bodies of unemployed and half-starved labourers, was of itself a sufficient reason for the exercise of vigilance, but such vigilance ought to have been united with great prudence and discretion: and if spies and informers were to be employed at all, their proceedings should have been most carefully watched, and their representations received with distrust. (Hear, hear.) Indeed, to have accepted the office of a spy should be such a presumption against any man's character, that he ought from that moment to be suspected. His information should be received with great distrust, and little or no credit given to it, unless corroborated by coincident circumstances, and supported by the evidence of less exceptionable men. "Every person knows," said the hon. member, "how liable such characters are to misrepresent, exaggerate, and even to create mischief, if they do not find it, in order to magnify the value of their services, and to claim from their employers a greater reward. It has been most justly observed in another place, that spies are much more dangerous when employed in the lower than in the higher classes of society. Among the latter, the only mischief they can do is by making false and exaggerated reports of the conduct and designs of the persons whom they are appointed to watch. With men of station and education, they can have comparatively little chance of influencing their conduct, and engaging them in criminal designs, which they had not themselves before meditated. But the case is very different with the lower classes. If spies are appointed to watch them, it is because they are supposed to be persons of superior intelligence and sagacity. Over ignorant and uneducated men they may easily acquire such an influence as to become their leaders. They may begin by suggesting to them schemes of mischief which they had never before contemplated, may gradually reconcile their minds to such schemes, and, at length, drive them on to the actual perpetration of them." (Hear, hear.) On this part of the subject, the hon. member observed, that he had great satisfaction in being authorized by Sir John Byng (whose name, in consequence of the command which he held, had been a good deal connected with the proceedings of the disturbed districts) to state, that no spy or informer had ever been in any carriage belonging to him, that he had never had any such character in his service or employ, nor ever had any communication, either directly or indirectly, with persons of that description, up to the 28th of March, the day on which the individuals in Manchester, accused of traitorous designs, were arrested. Whoever was acquainted with Sir John Byng, or had any knowledge whatever of his character, would do him the justice to admit, that he was not less conspicuous for humanity, than for the courage which impelled him to be the foremost in danger. Though fully sensible of the relation in which he stood to the government that employed him, and of the duties resulting from it, that gallant officer did not forget that he was the subject of a free state, nor would he ever divest himself of the constitutional feelings of an Englishman. Under the influence of those feelings, the government knew that he had occasionally incurred the displeasure of magistrates, for repressing their eagerness to have recourse to military assistance. It was unnecessary to remark, that, in a season of general agitation like that of last year, the command of the manufacturing districts could not have been entrusted to an officer who would exercise it with more judgment, and more humane forbearance.—Returning from this digression, the hon. member said, that he did not see on what ground ministers could refuse to inquire into the proceedings of the spies and informers employed in those districts, without rejecting the conclusions of their own secret committee. The report of that committee stated, that the language and conduct of hired spies and informers might have had the effect of encouraging the designs which it was intended they should only be the instruments of detecting. Their improper language and conduct appeared to be admitted on both sides of the house. Why should they not, then, inquire into the effect which they had produced? The question between the two sides was only as to the extent of the mischievous consequences of their proceedings. Various petitions had been offered to the house, and the petitioners said, "we engage to furnish evidence of the proceedings of those men. We will, if you will examine us, shew that the evil, whatever might be its nature, was principally, if not entirely, the work of spies and informers. We will give proof of their guilt, and of the innocence of many of the persons whom they have accused. We will shew you, that they, and their emissaries, were frequently proposing schemes of violence, and endeavouring to reconcile people's minds to the perpetration of them; that they were most anxious to appoint public and secret meetings, and used all the means in their power to prevail on others to attend them, in the hope of being able at last to make them the dupes of their own villanies, to have them arrested as traitors, and to reap the reward of their condemnation." Several of the petitioners were persons who had been arrested and imprisoned on the secret accusation of those spies and informers, and had been since discharged without trial. Others, such as the petitioners from Manchester, had never been suspected of being at all implicated in criminal proceedings. Those persons said, "we have diligently inquired into facts, and pledge ourselves to prove the allegations in our petition." And what was the answer to this? The mode of proceeding (reasoning he could not call it) adopted by the noble lord (Castlereagh) was this. If the noble lord found that a petitioner had a bad character, or that a mistake had been made in any fact stated in the petition, he drew a general inference against the character of all petitioners, and against all the facts stated in every other petition. It was unnecessary to say, that such an inference was not less illogical than it was ungenerous and unfair. It was a strong presumption against the case of the noble lord, that he found it convenient to have recourse to such an expedient. But if this sophistry were to be used on one side, let it be used also on the other. Was the noble lord prepared to say, that spies, and informers, and police agents, for on their representations the communications made to government had been generally founded,—that those men were such pure and virtuous characters, that their testimony was above suspicion? What spies and informers generally are, he had already stated. Were police agents often much better? This question would be best answered by a reference to facts which had lately appeared in evidence, shewing the activity of those persons in enticing others into crimes, that they might profit by their condemnation. The house would judge of the extent of the temptation to wickedness offered to these men, a temptation that few of them had virtue enough to withstand, when they were informed, that a gentleman in Manchester lately gave, to his knowledge, 300*l.* for a Tyburn ticket. Was the noble lord prepared also to say, that no information communicated to government had been proved to be incorrect? Did he not know, that the dread of incendiaries and assassins, and the first public declaration against reformers in Manchester, were in a great measure caused by a report spread by an individual, that the reformers had burnt his house because he had spoken against their proceedings? Was not the fact communicated to the government as evidence of their mischievous intentions, and would it not have been found in the first green bag, if strong suspicion had not in the mean time arisen that the individual was himself the incendiary, and that, in destroying his own property, he had also destroyed, by invalidating, a most valuable communication for government?—The hon. member said, he was by no means inclined to assert that the spies and informers in Lancashire, whose population was about 900,000 persons, did not meet with some men who listened with pleasure to their villainous proposals, and would have had no objection, if occasion had offered, to assist in executing them. He believed he could himself point out one, of whom the spies and informers hoped to have made another Brandreth. The facts, however, appeared to him to shew, that the number of such persons was very small, and not sufficient of itself to justify the alarm which had been excited, and excited principally, as he most conscientiously believed, by the agency of spies and informers. He could not regard ministers as quite disinterested parties in this discussion. He did not believe them capable of making a plot entirely themselves, when none of the elements of one were previously in existence. But he could not help remarking, that the plot had been most useful to them in withdrawing the attention of the public, and of some of their wavering friends in that house, from the demand so loudly and generally made at that time for economy and retrenchment. He would not say that ministers had made the plot, but he would say, that they had made the most of it, and no instruments could be found so convenient for their purpose as spies and informers, by whose means the dread of violence and treason was kept alive, and the attention both of parliament and the public effectually diverted from those questions of public economy and retrenchment which had been so peculiarly harassing to the government. Ministers having profited by the labours of these men, it was natural enough that they should wish to screen them from inquiry. But what interest had the house in screening them? And why should the house object to inquiry, when so many powerful considerations urged them to go into it? "We may dispute in this house (said the hon. member) day after day about particular facts stated in petitions, as well as upon the characters of the petitioners, without coming any nearer to a just conclusion. The noble lord may take one view of a case, I may take another, and a still different view may be taken by a third person. But how are we to discover whose view is right, and whose wrong, without an exact and rigid inquiry? If the noble lord says that the petitioners are either rogues who are not to be believed, or dupes whom those rogues have deluded, have we not just as much reason, before the facts are investigated, to retort the same charge on their accusers? Let the house consider for a moment the relation in which the accused and the accusers stand towards each other. The former say, 'we entreat the house to go into an inquiry, and we undertake to prove our own innocence, and the guilt of those who have accused us, after vainly attempting to betray us into their mischievous projects.' The ministers reply, 'we will not permit you, who are accused, to defend yourselves: we will not suffer you to say a word against your accusers, or to prove that the character which they have given of you belongs to themselves.' I ask, Sir, whether the house are prepared to sanction such a proceeding as this? Are they ready, in compliment to his Majesty's ministers, to express their disbelief of maxims founded on universal experience, and to say, that the unanimous feelings and sentiments of mankind are mere prejudice and delusion? Will they declare by their votes, that it is conscious guilt which demands inquiry, and conscious innocence which shrinks from it? Sir, I trust that the house will not incur the disgrace of acting so as to make itself liable to such an imputation. I trust, that they will satisfy both themselves and the public, by entering into a full, a rigid, and impartial inquiry, on a subject which has occasioned great anxiety and agitation, and upon which it is quite evident that no just conclusion can be formed, without such an inquiry as it is the object of my motion to recommend." —The honourable member then moved, "that this house, taking into consideration the report of the committee of secrecy presented on the 20th of June last, together with the report of the committee of secrecy of the lords, communicated to this house on the 23rd of June last, so far as the same refer to instances in which the language and conduct of persons, said to be employed for the purpose of detecting, may have had the effect of encouraging, criminal designs; and taking also into consideration the allegations contained in certain petitions, with respect to practices of so alarming a tendency, is of opinion that it is the duty of this house fully to investigate the nature and extent of the same.

Mr. F. Robinson said, that since he had had the honour of a seat in that house, he never remembered such a mode of proceeding as that of the hon. gentleman. The house would recollect the petition from Manchester, the vast importance with which it had been introduced, and the very detailed and circumstantial speech with which the hon. gentleman had accompanied it. (Hear, hear.) The petition itself was couched in vague, loose, and general terms. It assumed, indeed, an important air, as if it represented the sense of the whole town and neighbourhood of Manchester, whereas it was signed by twenty-six persons. (Hear, hear.) It condescended to inform the house, that the petitioners had entered into a rigorous investigation of all the circumstances that had occurred last year, and it did them the favour of declaring, that the result had been a positive and irrefragable conviction on their part, that no treasonable designs had been harboured at Manchester, and that no atrocious and outrageous proceedings had taken place amongst the people, except such as had been produced by the hired spies and informers of government. (Hear, hear.) That was the general way in which they made their statement: but they did not deign to state the mode and form of their inquiry, nor did they give the house any clue respecting the nature of the evidence which they were prepared to adduce in support of their allegations. The hon. gentleman was sensible of the defects of that petition, he knew how unsatisfactory was the matter it contained; and, therefore, when he came to bring it before the house, he opened the case of the petitioners, he entered into a detail of circumstances, he stated a variety of events, and charged particular acts on particular individuals. But what was the hon. member's conduct that night? It looked as if something remarkable had happened, for his proceeding went literally to contradict his former statement. The hon. member had abandoned his former grounds (hear); and why had he abandoned them? Because he knew that they could not be maintained. What did he state on a former occasion? He entered into a long story of a man of the name of Dewhurst, who was said to have been carried by Sir John Byng in his gig; but it now turned out that he had never been in any carriage belonging to that gallant officer. The hon. member had that evening told them, from the mouth of Sir John Byng himself, that the story about Dewhurst was a complete fabrication, that there was not a syllable of truth in it. (Hear.) The fact was, that no man of the name of Dewhurst was known to Sir John Byng, or to the government. The hon. gentleman had then told a story of a person of the name of Lomax, whom he called a hired spy. The whole of that story was untrue; it was a fable; it was a falsehood: not a word of it was correct. The hon. gentleman knew from Sir John Byng that Lomax had never been a spy; and if he did not know it, he would tell it him then. (Hear, hear, from the opposition.) Lomax, he repeated, had never been a spy: whatever he had been guilty of—whatever schemes he had arranged—whatever projects he had set on foot—whatever he had done, had been done by him in the character of a conspirator, and not in the character of a spy. It was true, that on the 17th of March that man wrote to Lord Sidmouth, offering to give information, but his letter was not answered. On the 28th of March he was arrested, with many others, and examined, as every man must be, in a similar situation, and afterwards released; but, in that examination, the whole of the operations that had taken place, and which were intended to take place, were stated, and, therefore, he thought himself justified in declaring, that it was as a conspirator, and not as a spy, that Lomax had done whatever had been committed by him; a spy he had never been. He thought that, after what he had stated, unless they could disprove it, the case of gentlemen opposite would break down under them. They might contradict it, because, contradiction was very easy, when proof was impossible. (Hear, and a laugh from the opposition.) He was convinced that they could not disprove what he had said of the two cases which were the main support of the Manchester petition, and, therefore, the whole fabric would fall to the ground, with the rigid investigation which the petitioners professed to have made. But their petition, far from proving that spies and informers had done mischief, had proved something else. The petitioners said, that no atrocities had been committed, or suggested, except by hired spies; but they admitted the conduct of Lomax, who, as he had already shewn, was not a spy. It was said, indeed, that Lomax was viewed with scorn and horror: but when he was so viewed, it was very singular that they should not denounce him. The very circumstance of his non-denunciation was an irreconcileable contradiction to the hon. gentleman. The man, however, was dead; he could not answer; he could not be forthcoming; but, unless they could prove something worse than they had done, it was needless that he should be alive: dead or alive, his statement was not to be disproved.—Then there was a petitioner of the name of Bamford, who, it was said, was apprehended on the information of Lomax. That could not be, for he was taken up on the 29th of March: the warrant must have been signed some time before, and Lomax was not arrested till the 27th. Then there were two other persons, Mitchell, and a man of the name of Scholes. Mitchell pretended to give a short account of his communication with Oliver, and endeavoured to impress, though he did not distinctly assert, that what he had done was at the instigation of Oliver. He had sunk what had happened in Yorkshire; but that omission Mr. Scholes, another petitioner, supplied; for he stated, that Oliver had been introduced to him by Mitchell, and that Mitchell and Oliver appointed meetings at his house. Now, either Scholes' petition was false, or Mitchell had culpably concealed the truth, to make a false impression, he cared not which, so no credit was due to their assertions.—They had already heard of Francis Ward, the religious and pious man; there was another person who had presented a petition couched in the same style, and apparently written by the same hand. The name of that man was Haynes. (See p. 170.) He knew not what information might have been derived from him, but he had been guilty of perjury. In 1816, he had been a witness at the trial of two persons, Towle and Slater, for shooting at a man, in a frame-breaking transaction. Slater was acquitted on an alibi, as Haynes and some others swore, that he was at the time 17 miles from the place where the crime was committed. Additional information was obtained, and Slater was indicted for the minor crime of frame-breaking, at the same time and place, at the following sessions, and pleaded guilty, thus proving the perjury of Haynes and the others. This was an additional proof of the nature of the character of these petitioners. Thus, as the allegations of the petitions were many of them totally false—as the stories respecting Dewhurst and Lomax were false—as the allegations of Bamford could not be true—as the petitions of Scholes and Mitchell could not be both true, or could not both contain the whole truth—he hoped that the house would reject the motion. On this evidence only was it founded. (Hear, from the opposition.) The whole of the motion was founded on those petitions. (No, no, no.) But the petitions must make the groundwork of the motion. He allowed that the motion referred to the report of the secret committee, but it added, " taking also into consideration the allegations in certain petitions." He should not trespass longer on the time of the house; he believed, in his honour and conscience, that the petitions were false, and he begged the house, on behalf of a calumniated government, of a calumniated magistracy, and in the sacred names of truth and justice, to reject the motion for inquiry on such grounds.

Mr. F. Douglas said, all that the right hon. gentleman had proved amounted to these two facts—that no person of the name of Dewhurst was in Sir John Byng's gig, and that Lomax was dead. He had told them, that contradiction was not proof. Yet his speech was a tissue of unproved contradictions, which he had begged the house to receive instead of the proof which it was the object of the motion to elicit. It was to be remarked, too, on the right hon. gentleman's own statement, that Lomax had written to Lord Sidmouth, offering to give information —that he had afterwards been apprehended, and almost immediately released. It was unfortunate that the hon. mover had not made a long speech on the Manchester petition, as the right hon. gentleman's speech seemed to have been prepared to refer to it. But the petition had very properly been made by the hon. mover accessary to his proofs;—he rested on the general knowledge of the country—on the general avowal of the ministers themselves through their committees. But how did the right hon. gentleman answer the allegations of the other petitions?—By saying, that one Haynes was a perjured man. But who was Haynes? His petition had not that day been read. He said nothing of Oliver, nor had any information that he knew of been derived from him. The right hon. gentleman wondered why the present motion had been made. Did he not remember, that, on the motion of the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Fazakerley), half of the speech, and more than half of the argument of the speech of a right hon. gentleman (Mr. Canning) turned on the incompetency of the secret committee to carry on the investigation which was demanded? (see page 344.) Did he not remember that the hon. member for Bramber (Mr. Wilberforce) had pledged himself (the word was not too strong) to agree to an investigation, if it were to be conducted by a committee differently chosen? The present motion was brought forward to give him an opportunity to support inquiry. (A laugh.) It was framed almost on the suggestion of the gentlemen opposite: and for the plain and manly object, that this question, important in every moral and political view, should be brought to a satisfactory issue. (Hear, hear.) This was the more necessary, as, in a few days, they would be debarred from obtaining any farther information respecting the proceedings of last year. Before they took any step which would have such an effect, they ought to be fully convinced of the merits of government. He understood that, to-morrow, a bill of indemnity would be proposed for their sanction. They should, therefore, embrace this as the only opportunity of parliamentary inquiry. Indemnity was not a necessary consequence of the suspension of the habeas corpus act. This was admitted on the other side, and its necessity was justified on the ground, that the disclosure of evidence which might otherwise take place would be highly dangerous to the interests of the country. He did not wish to take a narrow or uncandid view of the conduct of ministers. The house ought not in justice to take the responsibility from their own shoulders to place it upon those of ministers. They had granted them the extraordinary powers upon which they acted, and they ought not to expose them, and those connected with them, to the immense inconvenience of a multitude of actions, which might be brought by individuals who considered themselves aggrieved. But indemnity was demanded as a measure of confidence, upon the grounds that it was dangerous to disclose evidence, and that ministers had, in general, discreetly and conscientiously administered the law. Before the house granted the greatest indulgence which could be granted, it was their duty to inquire into those questions, both of them, he thought, of paramount importance. It was admitted by ministers, that spies had been employed; it could not be denied by them, that the employment of spies might produce mischievous effects; the committee had said, they had reason to believe it might have produced those effects; twenty-six persons at Manchester asserted, that it had produced mischief, and they, and many others, pledged themselves to produce proofs, and prayed the house to receive them. There were in the house gentlemen who could adduce proofs on this subject; who could prove the effect of the appearance of spies in the West Riding of Yorkshire—the dismay of the magistracy, the encouragement of the disaffected, and the combination which was thus created, much superior to that which the efforts of orators could bring about. There was that paragraph, too, extorted by the force of truth from a reluctant committee, proceeding on garbled and prepared evidence. (Hear.) What, then, was to be reasonably expected from a fair committee, having no private interests to consult, receiving the evidence which might be offered on both sides, and having no limit to its investigation? There was upon the table that miserable collection of newspaper paragraphs, which a committee had chosen to dignify by the name of a report. In that production two facts were stated. The insurrection in Derbyshire, which was then represented in its proper light, as not important in itself, but merely as connected with disturbances in other parts. The importance, therefore, of the disturbance in Derbyshire rested on the disturbance in other parts. And what was the other place referred to? The south-western corner of Yorkshire, which was the peculiar field of the employment of spies. It had been stated to the house, and by the most unexceptionable authority, that the appearance of the London delegate was there a cause of joy: that assemblies were held to meet the London delegate; and, with the knowledge of this, and the allegations of the petitioners, would they not at least inquire before they granted an indemnity? It would perhaps be said, that the evil was admitted, but that the amount of the evil was the question.

This was the very subject for inquiry. It had been said, that no information procured by the means of spies had been acted upon, unless it was corroborated by more respectable evidence, or confirmed by other facts and circumstances. It was not contended that they alone had given evidence. The mischief imputed to them was, that they had created the facts of which evidence was given by others. (Hear, hear.) Those men, perhaps, in acting so, had transgressed the instructions which they had received: but it was the duty of ministers to watch over them, and they were responsible for not having brought them to punishment. That honour and fidelity were not to be found in such men, they must have been fully aware: they must have known, that such detestable characters lived entirely by treachery and falsehood; why, then, if such was the case—why employ them at all? It was said, that the critical situation of the country required the intervention of such agents. Whether such support were necessary or not, the house should always remember, that they could not suspend the constitution of the country, without sanctioning the agency of spies. A certain right hon. gentleman (Mr. Canning) had said, that that man must have lived quite abstracted from all the concerns of life, who thought it possible to conduct the affairs of a country without spies or informers. There was much art in this confusion of terms. He would admit, that it was impossible, in some circumstances, to dispense with the aid of informers. But they were persons already concerned as accomplices. The case, however, was quite different with spies. A spy was a person employed to bring a false and flattering story, to assume a character which did not belong to him, in order to delude and entrap the unwary, for the purpose of betraying them. Such was the very nature of the qualities required, that he knew of no circumstances that could justify an expedient so atrocious as the employment of spies. The mischief of their employment by a government that rested on moral opinion, outweighed any advantage that could be derived from them. His hon. friend, the member for Shrewsbury, (Mr. Bennet) had exposed the vices and crimes of Oliver; (see page 321.) yet that man had been represented by some in that house as unimpeachable in his moral character! When the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Robinson) spoke of the moral character of the petitioners, and concluded, that their associates were equally vicious, what would those think, who saw the Secretary of State in constant communication and close union with persons, who, by the nature of their profession, were devoid of honesty or honour; (hear.) when they saw him bound to such persons by a reciprocation of good offices, prostituting his moral and religious character to a connexion with men who were guilty of that flagitious baseness at which professed villains revolted—treachery towards friends and associates? (Hear.) What an effect must such an example have on those individuals in the lowest ranks of life, who were exposed to constant temptation, and hardened and deadened by their professions? What effect must it have on police officers? (Hear.) It was easy to perceive that they would justify themselves by the practice of the home office, the source of all morality, legality, and sanctity. (Hear.) Every police officer would have his Oliver, careless, so he procured offenders, how offences were created. He might argue, that the persons by whose destruction he profited, had indeed been tempted and urged on, but that, if they had not been worthless fellows, they would not have fallen into the snare. (Hear, hear.) This was precisely the reasoning which the hon. gentlemen opposite had employed in defence of the spies. (Hear.) The house had been told, that the system which ministers had adopted was for prevention, and not for punishment. Could it be pretended, that it was for the purpose of prevention, that individuals were employed, who, for their own ends, would go far to encourage crimes, the knowledge of which must depend upon themselves? (Hear, hear.) He did not say, that ministers had employed those men designedly for such a purpose. This would be, to accuse them of the highest crime of which they could be guilty. They were chargeable, however, with a public crime next in gradation—that of casting firebrands into a heap of combustibles, and spreading alarm at the explosion. They were guilty of conjuring up plots and conspiracies for the sake of alarm; they were guilty of calling that revolution and treason which was no more than sedition and riot; they were guilty of misrepresentation to serve their own purposes. They had received evidence on one side, and excluded evidence on the other—they had read one letter, (see page 356.) and kept back another—because it was thought convenient to communicate the one, and it was not thought convenient to communicate the other—the one, they imagined, told for themselves, but the other, they knew, would throw a light on the state of the country,—it would shew that the suspension of the habeas corpus was unnecessary. (Hear, hear, hear.) The hon. member concluded by imploring the house to enter into that full investigation of the subject by which alone the minds of the public would be satisfied.

Mr. Blackburne (member for Lancashire) said, that the petition which the hon. mover had presented to the house on a former evening, was signed by a very small number of persons, not more than 26 inhabitants of Manchester, whereas a counter declaration, deprecating inquiry, had been signed by 276 of the most respectable inhabitants of that town.—The hon. member then read a letter from the gentlemen who officiated as boroughreeve and constables at the time of the alleged conspiracy. According to that letter, the utmost alarm prevailed in Manchester at the early part of the last year, through the distress of the people, which was operated upon by inflammatory pamphlets, with a view to produce riot and disorder. Applications were then made to the magistrates, by some of the lower orders, to convene public meetings, which applications they refused; but, notwithstanding such refusal, several meetings were held in the open air. The magistrates, however, did not interfere until the meeting of the 10th of March, when they felt that their duty required them to preserve the public tranquillity. The writers alleged, that all the information which they had transmitted to government, on the subject of the disturbances at Manchester, was derived from authentic sources, and added, that the hon. member (Mr. Philips) had sent them a message, declaring, that he would do them justice, whenever the subject of those disturbances should be brought before the house. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. W. Courtenay said, the object of the motion was, as had been properly observed before, not to obtain any information as to spies and informers, but to catch the vote of the hon. member for Bramber (Mr. Wilberforce). For this purpose was the ten times told tale, and the ten times refuted calumny, repeated to-night, under the cover of this motion. They were now drawing near to the close of transactions, disastrous he would admit; but whose issue was more favourable than could have been expected; and they would not be diverted by a motion like the present. When the petitions brought forward failed to make out a case for them, the gentlemen on the other side appealed to the general feeling of the country. Their opinion was, that the general feeling of the country required, that some inquiry should be made. To opinion, opinion only could be opposed; and he would assert it as his opinion, that the feeling of the country was not such as they had represented it to be. Of this the letter just read by the hon. member who spoke last might be offered as proof; for, if the greater part of the people of Manchester thought differently from the petitioners, although they lived on the very scene of the alleged misconduct, it was reasonable to suppose that a still larger proportion of the people throughout the country were of the same opinion. With respect to the distinction made between spies and informers, he hoped he should have credit for disliking spies as much as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Douglas); but the hon. gentleman had not stated the case fairly as to the noble secretary for the home department. Was it to be supposed, that spies had been fitted out for the country at the home office? (Loud cheering from the opposition.) He was glad of that cheer, as it indicated that some gentleman could reply to him when he denied that assertion. He had seen no proof of such a fitting-out. An individual who had been often mentioned (Oliver), was not in that situation. (Much and vehement cheering from the opposition.) He understood their cheers. Would any of them undertake to prove—(great confusion and cheering)—would any of them undertake to prove that he was not a voluntary informer in the first instance? At Derby, the learned counsel for the prisoners did not think it proper to call him as a witness. Mr. Denman asked one witness, whether Oliver had been in any manner connected with the conspirators, and having been answered in the negative, he did not repeat his question, and no appeal was made to the jury on the subject. A strong case ought to have been made out before the house were called upon to appoint a committee, whose powers should be without limits, and the scope of their investigation without an object. The representations on which the motion was founded were contrary to fact. (A cry of where? from the opposition.) He referred to the letter now read. The hon. mover had not made out a case to reconcile the house to his motion; he had failed in his proof; he had, indeed, abandoned the grounds of his original case: he had called up evidence on the other side which completely contradicted his assertions, and, therefore, the house were in duty bound to reject a motion, which, in his view of the subject, was altogether unnecessary.

Lord Lascelles rose to bear testimony to the character of a person for whom he entertained the highest respect. It was impossible for any person to conduct himself better than Sir John Byng had done. Any person who knew him must be satisfied that he combined the conduct of the general with that of the citizen. Thanks were due to Sir John Byng for his conduct, in the opinion of the country: in his own opinion, great thanks were due to him, not only from the protected country, but from the deluded men themselves: from the country, for the vigilance with which he had exercised his commands; from the deluded, for the vigilance with which he prevented their designs. With respect to the subject itself, he had no predilection for spies; he abhorred them as much as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Douglas.) They ought not to have been employed to inflame combustible materials. By the way, this expression was rather against the argument of the hon. gentleman, inasmuch as it admitted the great danger of the country. But ought they not to be employed to prevent the explosion of those materials? As to Oliver, he firmly believed that a great deal of what had been said respecting his conduct, was mere talk and idle clamour. He could never concur in the opinion, that ministers had employed that person for the purpose of excitement. On the contrary, he would deny that such was ever the intention of government. The hon. mover had stated, that, according to the general opinion of the country, ministers had abused the powers with which they were invested under the suspension of the habeas corpus; but from what quarter had the hon. member collected the information upon which he grounded that statement? For himself, he could say, that he had not heard of such an opinion, unless from the allegations of some of the petitioners to that house, who were themselves implicated in the transactions which gave rise to the proposition for suspending the habeas corpus. [" Others have so alleged," exclaimed several members on the opposition side.] He was not aware of such allegations, and as to the allegations of the petitioners from Manchester, it was remarkable that the hon. mover himself had entirely abandoned their case. He therefore felt it his duty to oppose the motion.

Mr. Philips said, he had not uttered one disrespectful word of Sir John Byng. He had only mentioned that Dewhurst had been seen in his carriage. He denied that he had abandoned the case of the petitioners.

Lord Milton said, that while he felt every respect, esteem, and affection for General Byng, he considered all that the hon. gentleman and his noble colleague had said of him to be quite beside the question. As to what the learned gentleman (Mr. Courtenay) had said of Oliver's not having been called as a witness on the trials at Derby, it had been repeatedly and unanswerably replied, that if Oliver had done all the mischief imputed to him, his evidence could have been of no service to the prisoners, but, on the contrary, it would at once have established their guilt. How could any inference be drawn from the perfect ignorance of him manifested by witnesses who had only seen the insurrection, but who had known nothing of its origin? (Hear, hear.) But all this did not signify a straw in the present question. The question really was, whether the extraordinary circumstance of spies having excited disturbances, as stated in the report of the secret committee, and complained of in the petitions, should be allowed to pass without any inquiry? (Hear, hear, hear.) He thought, that inquiry was loudly called for, and that, in point of consistency, his noble colleague ought to have acceded to the motion, with a view to afford ministers an opportunity of explaining their conduct, especially in the employment of those spies and informers, for whom, he said, he had no predilection. (Hear, hear.) But his noble colleague appeared to be in a dilemma between the abhorrence of spies and the necessity of detecting conspiracy. The means of obtaining detection was the ground of difference. He sincerely acquitted ministers of the intention to excite disturbances through the medium of spies: but they were not, therefore, acquitted of the consequence of having employed them. The house had heard statements of Oliver having been in different parts of the country, entrapping the unwary, holding meetings, using violent and inflammatory language, and inciting to the wildest acts of rebellion. Not one word of this had yet been denied. Some denial, however, ought to be given before the present motion was rejected. (Hear, hear.) The conduct of government was rather singular; they felt an abhorrence of the conduct of spies, but no inquiry must be instituted into this abhorred conduct! All other subjects were investigated in that house: the civil list was overhauled; the army estimates were examined; but espionage was not for the profane eyes of the House of Commons! (Much cheering.) He believed that all who were employed as spies were, like Castle, infamous characters. In the outset, ministers ought to have regarded them as suspicious. They were chargeable, therefore, with having improvidently sent such persons into the country, although, as he conscientiously believed, they had not contemplated the consequences. It had been triumphantly retorted, that the country was admitted to have been in a combustible state. Undoubtedly, great distress had existed, and consequently great discontent prevailed in the country. These were the combustible materials, and to this admission the other side was undoubtedly entitled. (Great cheering from the Opposition.) To these materials the ministers had applied a firebrand, when they sent Oliver into the country. Did he not every where appear as the London delegate? (Hear). Was not the fact well known to the government? And was not that enough to open their eyes as to the transactions with which he was connected? In law, he believed, it was no excuse, that rioters or rebels had been told of disturbances in other parts; but, in point of moral turpitude, it made a very wide difference. It was a trite but a true remark, that success or failure constituted the difference between a traitor and a hero. If, then, an ignorant person were insidiously persuaded that the co-operation of multitudes would infallibly make him a hero instead of being a traitor, would not his case be different from that of a common traitor? (Hear, hear). He was not justifying the conduct of the deluded. Even the circumstances of their delusion did not justify them; but surely they formed a strong palliation of their crimes. He believed that ministers opposed the inquiry, because they were afraid to have the subject inquired into; and because they felt that, if probed to the bottom, the result would be, to discover the facility and improvidence with which they had listened to every tale-bearer who was seeking to curry favour. The great danger of such a policy was, that it went to establish a system of espionage, which must finally produce universal suspicion and jealousy, and wholly alienate the affections of the people from the government. (Loud cheering.)

Lord Stanley declared, that he should support the motion for an inquiry, without meaning to impute to ministers any criminal connivance at the alleged practices of the spies and informers whom they had employed. He feared, however, that they had shewn a blameable negligence in giving credit to representations, which, considering from what sources they were derived, it was natural to suppose were highly coloured. They ought to have taken more pains to ascertain what were the feelings of the people in general. (Hear.)

Mr. Bennet contended that his hon. friend (Mr. Philips) had not given up one iota of his case. The statement which he had made was, that an informer, who passed by the name of Dewhurst, but whose real name was Michael Hall, and who was, in plain truth, a returned transport, had, after getting the populace into a net, suddenly disappeared, and been heard of no more. He was arrested on one day, and, on the next, was discharged by the magistrates of Manchester. Of the life and character of that person, he had heard many particulars; and he believed him to be a very fit instrument in the hands of Messrs. Nadin and Co. (See pages 372, 383.) If, as was asserted in the report of the Lords, some persons employed by ministers had excited disturbances in the country, why had they not been apprehended and brought to punishment? Was not this a fair subject for inquiry? (Hear, hear.) He believed that most of the pretended plots had been fabricated in the forge at Bolton, under the auspices of Mr. Fletcher, a magistrate, who ought not to be suffered to remain for one moment in the commission of the peace. The right hon. gentleman (Mr. Robinson) had thought proper to cast reflections on the sources from which his hon. friend and himself had derived their information. Such reflections well became those who had fitted out Castle, in the absence of all other evidence, as a witness, to enable them to magnify tumult and riot into rebellion and treason. He would now repeat, that he was prepared to support all the statements which he had formerly made (see page 326.) respecting the conduct of Oliver, not by suspicious or polluted evidence, but on the testimony of men in no way connected with the acts of the conspirators. (Hear, hear.) It was not his intention to come down to the house, like the noble lord (Castlereagh,) and with a collection of dead men's tales (see page 438.) to take away the character of the living. (Hear, hear.) He dared his Majesty's ministers to the inquiry, and if they did not face it, there would be but one opinion in the country—that their guilt alone prevented them. (Hear.) The noble lord had, it seemed, with his usual candour in professing one thing whilst he meant another, proposed to examine Oliver before the secret committee, but he took care to get the motion negatived. As an illustration of the candour which marked all the noble lord's proceedings, why, he asked, had not Earl Fitzwilliam's letter of the 17th of June last been laid before the secret committee, sitting at that time? Why had it likewise been kept back from the late committee, but because it was felt that that letter would open the eyes of the country to the real truth of these transactions? His information, he repeated, was drawn, not from persons implicated in the charges preferred by Oliver and his coadjutors, but from those whom they had in vain attempted to delude. With regard to the assertion that no man had been arrested on the oath of Oliver, he should be glad to know, upon what other evidence were the persons arrested who had attended the meeting at Thornhill-Lees? It was Oliver himself who invited them to it. Oliver not only sent letters of invitation, but also his coadjutor, Crabtree, to Birmingham, to stimulate persons, by every means in his power, to attend that meeting. (Hear, hear.) He had in his possession a copy, in Oliver's hand-writing, of one of those letters of invitation. He had also the written memoranda of a conversation between him and another person, at Liverpool, in which he insisted that it was useless to look for relief either to the Lords or Commons: that the people must depend on their physical force alone, and that a great crash might be soon expected. (Hear, hear.) The person to whom this language was addressed refused to attend the meeting at Thornhill-Lees. Had he been examined before the committee? No. The course pursued by his Majesty's ministers was, first to pack a committee, then to garble, and finally to suppress evidence. (Hear, hear, hear.) He knew that Mr. Parker, a magistrate at Sheffield, had written to Lord Sidmouth, acquainting him, that he greatest danger which he apprehended was, the arrival of the deputies from London; that the men in his district were anxiously asking for work but could not obtain any, and that, in such a situation, like drowning men, they would catch at straws. At this period it was, that Oliver was sent down among them with his story of 70,000 men being ready to rise in London, and to act in conjunction with them. This was the manner in which the distemper was treated: a blister was applied to the sore place, and the effects that followed might have been easily foreseen. Instead of being surprised that a hundred men rose at Nottingham, or fifty in another place, or that the mayor and a few old women at Leeds were thrown into a state of alarm, it was rather a matter of astonishment that more serious mischief, and a much more formidable explosion, had not been created, by the artifices with which discontent was thus inflamed and fomented. He implored the house to recollect, that, as soon as Oliver was withdrawn, tranquillity was restored as by a charm, and that from one end of the country to the other there was one universal desire of investigation. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Bathurst contended, that the hon. mover had entirely abandoned the Manchester case, and, instead of confining himself to the matter of the petition, had indulged in general charges against his Majesty's ministers. He gave credit to the hon. member who had just sat down for much laudable zeal, although it frequently outran his discretion; and he thought him bound, after the strong assertions he had made, to mention the names of those on whose information he placed such implicit reliance. The hon. gentleman had stated, that they were not parties implicated with the conspirators. How, then, did they obtain their knowledge? They must have been present at their meetings, without communicating the information to the magistrates. (Hear, hear.) They were, therefore, not the spies and informers of government, but the spies and informers of the hon. gentleman. They were, he presumed, an innocent part of the combustible matter of which the house had heard so much. An attempt had been made to draw a distinction between spies and informers. (Hear, hear, from Sir S. Romilly.) The hon. and learned gentleman appeared to support this distinction, and he was ready to admit his authority to be great; but he would oppose to it other great law authorities, those of lord chief justice Holt, and chief justice Eyre, who had held, that accomplices, whilst their credit was to be judged of by circumstances, were often the best witnesses, and ought to be encouraged by all governments, as otherwise the most heinous crimes would go unpunished. Suppose a man were to come to government, and confess that he had gone a certain way in the commission of treasonable acts, but that he repented of the proceeding, and was desirous of making atonement; would it be the duty of government to dismiss him immediately, instead of employing him as a means of detecting and defeating the schemes of the conspirators? In the very first place he was an informer, and the next step turned him into a spy. (Hear, hear.) Men, to whose care and vigilance the preservation of the public peace was intrusted, had an anxious and difficult duty to discharge. As to the dark surmises of the hon. gentleman, as far as they respected the employment of Oliver, he was prepared to give them a full contradiction. Government knew nothing of his private character previous to his journey in company with Mitchell; but they had reason to believe that he had ever since conducted himself as a respectable individual. He represented to government that he had fallen into what he feared was a dangerous society—one formed or the purpose of secreting persons charged with treasonable practices. It was deemed necessary to encourage him to afford information, and he was sent down to the north with Mitchell, who was a principal conspirator, and against whom a warrant had been previously issued. Sir John Byng had borne testimony to the character of Oliver in a public newspaper. The magistrate (Mr. Fletcher) whom the hon. gentleman had thought proper to stigmatize, and mix with spies and informers, had exerted himself most zealously and meritoriously in preserving the public peace, and protecting the property of his neighbours. Let the hon. gentleman attack government with as much vehemence as he pleased; but let him not act unjustly in assailing the character of a private individual. (Hear.) An inquiry had taken place before Mr. Parker at Sheffield, at which Oliver was confronted with Bradley, a person employed by the magistrates; and the result was, that the language imputed to Oliver was proved to have been used by Mitchell, for whom Oliver had been mistaken. With respect to the letter of Earl Fitzwilliam, it did not arrive till after the lords' committee had broken up, nor until a day or two before the rising of their own committee, which had already decided upon the view which they should take of the evidence. The noble lord opposite had, however, read a letter from Earl Fitzwilliam to himself of the same import, and it amounted only to this—that the state of the country was more tranquil than he had expected to find it, and that, if ministers would certify that London was equally so, there would be no necessity for the suspension act. This opinion was at variance with that of all the magistrates in that part of the country, and it had not been thought necessary, therefore, to open again a question, upon which the deliberation of the committee had been already employed.

Mr. W. Smith said, he should not have risen had it not been for the challenge thrown out on the other side respecting the private character of Oliver. Only the day before the report of the last secret committee was presented, evidence had been offered and produced to him which charged that avowed agent of government with acts of great criminality; the testimony was as credible as that of any gentleman in parliament; and it convinced him, that Oliver had been guilty of a series of frauds upon his employers for a number of years. (Hear, hear.) The witnesses who could prove this fact were ready to come forward, should an inquiry into the subject be instituted; and that their evidence might be taken, was one principal reason why he should vote for the appointment of a committee: it would distinctly establish, that Oliver was completely unworthy of the least credit, but that he was a person well calculated for the purpose for which he had been employed, being possessed of talents and plausibility, but wholly destitute of truth and principle. (Hear, hear.) With two of the witnesses to substantiate this position he had long been acquainted, one being a partner in an extensive commercial establishment, in which an hon. baronet, a member of the house, was also concerned, and the other an attorney of high respectability. A third witness was the employer of Oliver, whom he had defrauded, and who, in the year 1812, had actually preferred against him no less than four bills of indictment in the county of Middlesex, which, however, were not tried, because the prosecutor, yielding his public duty to his private interest, thought that, by abandoning them, he had a better chance of recovering the money of which Oliver had criminally possessed himself. The name of this person was Restall, a carpenter of London; and the matter being referred to arbitration, it was found that, during the space of ten years, Oliver had defrauded his master of a sum amounting to nearly 300*l.* (Hear, hear.) In addition to this, Oliver had sold for his own advantage a large quantity of old building materials which belonged to Restall, and of which he had not rendered any account. Completely to blacken his character, he had only to state, that, during the arbitration, the daughter of Oliver was examined, and she afterwards confessed, that what she had sworn was untrue, and that she had been persuaded by her father to commit the crime of perjury. (Hear.)

Mr. Bathurst admitted that the hon. member had communicated to him the nature of the charge which he had to bring against Oliver: at the same time, he (Mr. B.) had cautioned him not to give too easy credit to the ex-parte statement of a transaction of twenty years' standing. On inquiry he had found, that it was true that Mr. Restall had preferred four bills of indictment against Oliver, but it was no less true that he had abandoned them, and that the matter being referred to a gentleman at the bar, it had been awarded that the prosecutor should pay all the costs incurred. (Hear.) It was also found on investigation, that the intelligent and upright gentleman who was the referee, did not attribute any degree of criminality to Oliver, considering the transaction as a mere matter of account disputed by both parties. No doubt, in the end Oliver was directed to pay a sum of money; but, having himself previously given security, it was deducted from the amount of a bond he held from Restall. Next, as to the atrocious charge of having induced his daughter to forswear herself, it was perfectly evident that the hon. member had been imposed upon; for the minutes of evidence before the arbitrator shewed distinctly, that Jane Oliver had spoken to nothing that affected the interests of her father. The amount of damages would not be increased or diminished by her evidence a single shilling. [The right hon. gentleman read the testimony of the girl until he was stopped by the impatience of the house.] Oliver had threatened an action for a malicious prosecution, and, as Restall refused to obey the award, the whole subject came before the Court of King's-Bench, and there a rule obtained by Restall was discharged with costs, on the undertaking of Oliver not to proceed for a malicious prosecution. (Hear, hear.) It was quite evident, therefore, that there was no foundation for the assertion endeavoured to be cast upon an injured individual; the inquiry originated in a paragraph in a newspaper, and the result had been worthy of its origin. The right hon. gentleman concluded by recommending the hon. member to be more cautious for the future how he brought forward accusations of so serious a nature.

Mr. W. Smith still adhered to his belief of the story which had been related to him, and required, that the subject should be investigated before a committee. As to the testimony of Jane Oliver, it related to the obtaining of papers by Restall, during the absence of Oliver, and formed one of the grounds of set-off before the arbitrator, so that, in fact, her evidence was extremely material. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Tierney rose. The right hon. gentleman said, that, before he entered upon the question, he begged that the motion might be read from the chair, that gentlemen might judge for themselves, whether it had or had not been fairly represented on the other side, when they hinted at a supposed conspiracy against the character of a private and 'much injured individual,' Mr. Oliver. [Mr. Speaker read the question accordingly.] The right hon. gentleman then proceeded. The house would perceive that the conspiracy, if it existed at all, was composed of two sets of persons—those who petitioned parliament for this inquiry, and the two secret committees that had been appointed. (Hear, hear.) This circumstance had been entirely overlooked, and by no person more than by the noble lord who spoke from under the gallery, who forgot that he was himself one of the persons forming the body which had made assertions similar to those in the petition from Manchester, which led to the proposition now under discussion. (Hear, hear.) The fate of the motion was of the utmost importance, not merely to 'the much-injured individual,' Mr. Oliver, and his coadjutors in fomenting treason, but to the whole country; for the question was, whether the house should give its sanction to a system which had no parallel in the history of Great Britain? The question was not whether, under certain circumstances, spies and informers might sometimes be innocently employed, but whether the regular organization of them into an effective body, effective for the worst purposes, was to receive the verdict and warrant of that house? The answers yet attempted to the motion had completely failed: one hon. gentleman had affected to sneer at it; another had caught hold of an accidental expression, falling from one of its supporters; and a third had vainly endeavoured to raise a clamour against all those who wished to inquire how far innocent persons had been charged with the foulest crimes. Surely the other side must have been hard pressed indeed for an argument, when they snatched so greedily at a casual and hasty phrase, that the motion was framed to catch the vote of the hon. member for Bramber. It should never be forgotten, too, that the ridicule of that expression came from those who had not scrupled to practise trick after trick to catch the vote of that hon. member, (hear, hear)—from those who had spared no expense to catch it; not, indeed, to the profit of the hon. member himself, that was out of the question, but to the great loss of the public, whose money had been spent, time after time, in inquiries intended to satisfy the scrupulousness of his conscience. He did not wish to speak disrespectfully of the hon. member for Bramber, and, certainly, there was no individual more capable of giving effective support to ministers and their measures in the house; or more willing to do so when he happened, by accident, to be out of it. (Cheers and laughter.) What his vote would be upon the present occasion it was not, perhaps, easy to prophesy. If he had given a distinct and unequivocal pledge upon any question, he would doubtless redeem it; but here it was impossible to speak from experience, the case was of such rare occurrence; generally, his phraseology was happily adapted to suit either party; and if now and then he lost the balance of his argument, and tended a little to one side, he quickly recovered himself, and deviated as much in an opposite direction as would make a fair division of his speech on both sides of the question. (Continued cheers.) The speech of the hon. mover had been attacked because he had confined himself merely to Manchester; and a complaint had been made against another hon. gentleman that he had spoken only of Yorkshire; but not one of the adherents of ministers had ventured to touch the real merits of the motion, which did not rest upon argument merely, but upon the reports of committees, and upon the petition of twenty-six inhabitants of Manchester, of irreproachable character, against whom it had only been objected, that they were not the whole population of the place: the authority of the borough-reeve was not necessary to convince the house that 26 individuals were not the whole population of Manchester. Three spies were principally referred to. The first was named Lomax, and all that the other side could state with regard to him was, that he could not have been a spy, because he had been taken up with the rest. But what could they say to his singular discharge, while the rest continued in custody? Nothing; and the unavoidable inference was, that he was a spy, and that, as a spy, he received favour at the hands of government. The next was named Dewhurst, and of him the right hon. gentleman had stated, that he was a nonentity—that no person of the name of Dewhurst was known. But what would he say if it were shewn that this Dewhurst was, in truth, no other than Michael Hall, who had passed under an assumed name—had taken advantage of an alias to carry on his plot against the lives of innocent men? Yet such was the undoubted fact; and it was equally true, that this 'much injured individual,' had enjoyed the advantage of having passed a considerable time on board one of his Majesty's hulks. (Hear, hear.) As to Waddington, the third spy, not a syllable had been urged by his friends: he was left to his fate, and, on that account, might well be styled 'a much injured individual.' Against all these evidence was offered, and from the respectability of the individuals tendering it, it was fair to presume that the testimony was deserving of credit. But then it was said, that two men of the names of Mitchell and Scholes had presented petitions; and that, as they were men of bad character, their evidence was incredible: those who used this argument seemed to forget that they had put forward Mr. Castle, (not a gentleman of the most irreproachable reputation), as a witness, and had expected that, upon his testimony, five men should be deprived of life. Admitting, therefore, that Mitchell was a man of bad character, in favour of Scholes there was strong evidence, as a magistrate upon the spot, in a letter which he (Mr. Tierney) had seen, had spoken highly of the regularity and sobriety of his deportment. Lord chief justice Holt and lord chief justice Eyre had wisely observed, that there were some transactions which could not be proved by ordinary witnesses, and the house should recollect that the intrigues of these spies were in the dark; they wormed themselves in among men not always of the best reputation, even in the rank in which they moved; and it was impossible, therefore, that the evidence against them should be in all respects unexceptionable: the witnesses were, however, to speak to facts capable of confirmation—namely, of the employment of spies and informers, not to check crime, but to promote it—not to discover treason, but to foment it. If one thing more than another required the immediate investigation of parliament, it was the rapid increase of spies of all kinds in this country. (Hear, hear.) It was no answer to say, that Lord Sidmouth was himself a man of good character; that the secretary for the home department could not in any way be attacked, when the proposal was, that an inquiry should be instituted into an odious system, which had been growing up from year to year, and had now arrived at a height disgraceful to the character, and injurious to the constitution of the country. (Hear, hear.) Assessed taxes were, perhaps, unavoidable in the present burthened condition of the empire, but the very collection of the revenue promoted the increase of spies and informers, who intruded themselves even into the private circles of domestic life: they insinuated themselves among the servants, creeping into the confidence of the groom and the footman, hanging about livery-stables or mews, and sneaking into halls and kitchens. To put a case, in illustration of the subject under debate: suppose one of these artful informers persuaded a gentleman who kept five horses, to return only four, and afterwards, not only made the fact known to the commissioners, but participated in the reward: if the matter were brought before parliament, would not every gentleman start from his seat, and demand an immediate and a strict inquiry? Yet where was the distinction, excepting that here the lives of poor men, and not the pockets of rich men, were concerned? (Hear, hear.) It was the duty of the house to take some steps upon this subject; and if it were asked, as it had been, what steps were to be taken for the punishment of Oliver and his nefarious associates, the answer was short and plain—that the committee were merely to inquire into facts, and when the facts were ascertained, it would be early enough to arrange what criminal proceedings ought to be instituted. In Yorkshire, Oliver appeared to have played the principal part; and it was asserted on the other side, that government gave him instructions only to send them information. Yet, how did the case stand? It was notorious, that in the north great distress and disaffection prevailed, and that a rising was contemplated by a few of the more hasty, as soon as they were assured of the co-operation of the London delegates. Oliver knew that this was the match that would produce the explosion, and he immediately assumed the character of a London delegate. It was sincerely to be hoped, that neither Lord Sidmouth, nor the executive, knew of this detestable expedient; that they were unacquainted with the base disguise of their spy—this informer—this Oliver, who had been so bespattered with praise, for it deserved no other term, by his employers. Had he represented himself merely as a delegate from the north, it would have been comparatively harmless and innocent: but he went down from London to assure the discontented, that 70,000 men would rise at the waving of his hand, and thus the north and the south at once blazed with a co-operating flame. Was it possible to imagine a blacker villain than a man, who, with such a lie in his mouth, seduced the wavering, and entrapped the unwary? (Loud cheers.) What was the answer given by ministers? The right hon. gentleman (Mr. Bathurst) had merely said, "We deny the truth of what you assert. You may have a thousand credible witnesses to prove it, but unless you give us their names, we will deny the truth of your assertion." Of course this was refused, for if any name were given, "rogue and rascal!" was the instant exclamation; "he has been at police offices a hundred times, and he is down in our books as the greatest scoundrel that ever the sun shone upon." Immediately the friends of ministers in the back rows throw up their hats, and "down with the rascal—down with the villain!" was the general whoop. What pretence had those to require names, who themselves had refused all information? (Hear, hear.) If the other side would consent to give the names of their witnesses, the hon. mover of this question would not object to communicate the names of his, but there must be some reciprocity. A doubt had been expressed as to the accuracy of the information of one hon. gentleman, (Mr. Bennet) but his authority was the last that ought to be questioned, when it was recollected that all his statements respecting gaols and madhouses, though pronounced to be exaggerations or falsehoods, had turned out to be founded on authentic intelligence. Why, then, in this instance was he not to be allowed an opportunity of making good his case? The only true reason was to be found in the fear on the other side, lest they should be personally implicated, and that their political importance would be endangered. Whatever might be the vote of the house, in the country there had been, and would be, but one opinion. Considering the diffusion of education among the lower classes, and the consequent facility of acquiring some evil knowledge among much good; considering the severe distress which had prevailed through many parts of the country, and the liability to complain, which distress and starvation necessarily engendered, was it to be wondered at, that some were easily inflamed to dangerous designs and desperate acts? Was it not rather to be wondered at that so few had been infected? But if this was natural, what could be more diabolical than that the delusion so spread should have arisen from deluders employed by government? (Hear, hear.) It was fair to suppose that all the spies employed were not the immediate agents of government; indeed, he believed that government were not aware of half their numbers. Perhaps, Lord Sidmouth had communicated only with the notorious Oliver; and really that was quite enough for one secretary to have done. (A laugh.) Yet, the subordinate spies were innumerable, and though their information came refined through the strainers of constables and magistrates, (for every magistrate, every constable, had his little corps of spies and informers,) yet the system was all one: it was an open and avowed adoption of the odious method of espionage, and not a whit preferable to the French police. This country had hitherto been content to be without those advantages which were supposed to flow from the rigorous and vigilant exertions of the French police, because at the same time we enjoyed those free privileges, and that general happy security, which constituted the great and envied characteristics of our peculiar government. But this was now at an end; we had as many spies as France herself; we had ministers as minutely inquisitorial as their prefect of police, and all the boasted peculiarities of our constitution had been voted as useless for the preservation of the country. He was sure that no Englishman could view such a state of things with indifference: nay, he believed that every gentleman present must feel indignant that this country should be reduced to such a state of degradation as to sanction a regular system of espionage: he was sure that every gentleman would be anxious for an investigation into every allegation of the existence of such an evil, if he could be persuaded that no danger would accrue to the state or to the administration. Now, what danger could accrue to the state? The question was too absurd to be asked. What danger could accrue to the administration? If government, as they asserted, had given merely a few simple directions to their agents, and, instead of doing what would foment disaffection, had exerted themselves to check it as soon as possible, then, surely, government would gain by the inquiry; for they would thereby have the fullest opportunity of disavowing, and disproving, any connexion with those odious spies. Whence, then, was it that they refused to do themselves so much honour? Surely, not from modesty. No, he feared it was because they knew that there was something rotten in their proceedings, which would not bear to be brought to light. If a negative should be put on the present question, what would be the consequence? What would foreign nations think of us? It would give a sanction to a new principle of administration—to a melancholy innovation on our constitution, which would alarm our own country, and astonish all Europe. And the reason, forsooth, why British privileges were to be overthrown, and British prejudices disregarded, was, that nothing but strong measures could keep the country tranquil. This was sad news after so many years of hard and expensive fighting; when we had been told, too, that the peace of the world was fixed, and that we had nothing to do but to sit down and enjoy ourselves in ease and quietness all the rest of our days. Could ministers believe that such a declaration, coming from them, would not tend to irritate rather than to allay disaffection? Oh! then, they exclaim, if that should be the case, there must be another suspension of the habeas corpus act, then another secret committee, then another indemnity bill! And so the odious wheel was to go round for ever! He implored the house to do what they could to prevent such a result: no inconvenience could arise from the adoption of the motion, and much might result from rejecting it. For instance, he was, and ever should be, a friend to an extensive reform in our parliamentary representation; but, at the same time, he was an utter enemy to those wild and senseless schemes which had been broached in many quarters. But were the wild designs of the foolish or the desperate to be checked by imprisoning the innocent, and ruining their families? He said the innocent, for they had not been proved to be otherwise; and it was, at least, a sign of grace in them, that, in their anxiety to be declared so, they had demanded to be tried by their country. What would those men say on being sent back to their impoverished families, to their ruined trades, without redress, nay, without a hearing? Would they not say, "we have been imprisoned without cause, we have been discharged without trial, or the means of asserting our innocence: government spies were sent to irritate us to desperation in the hour of our distress, and, having failed in that object, they made us their victims because we would not be their dupes; and yet you see, when we apply to parliament, it will not assist us; it turns a deaf ear to our petitions, and shuts the avenue to all redress." Would not this be their language, and who could gainsay it? And yet what a dangerous argument it would be in the mouth of a disaffected reformer. Some motions were opposed on the ground that they were brought forward merely to serve the purposes of party: that objection could not be raised in the present case. Here the simple question was, whether the house would recognise the detestable employment of spies—whether they would sanction a practice which poisoned the sources of confidence between man and man, and was destructive of the freedom and happiness of the whole community. He saw a right hon. gentleman (Mr. Canning) making himself ready to engage (a laugh), but that right hon. gentleman would find it hard to convince the house, or the country, that the system of espionage was not at once fatal to the honour of the government, fatal to the freedom of the nation, fatal to the comfort of every branch of society. (Loud cheering.)

Mr. Wilberforce rose. He began by saying, that he should not have offered himself to the attention of the house, if he had not been called upon in so marked a manner. He was not the more disposed to agree to the present motion on account of the tone of easy confidence assumed by the right hon. gentleman who had just sat down, for he had known that gentleman too long, and too well, not to know that he always appeared most confident when his cause was desperate. The fact was, that nothing could be more loose, vague, and indefinite than the present motion. When a motion had been formerly brought forward concerning the persons supposed to be alluded to in the report of the secret committee, as having instigated the insurrection which they were sent to detect, he had objected to that motion, because he did not think that the committee had referred to any specific case which had come to their notice. Indeed, he knew that the meaning of the committee was very different; for they distinctly saw, and directly asserted, that a general rising had been determined upon before that man, Oliver, had appeared upon the scene at all. The committee, at the same time, had fairly avowed what had come to their knowledge, as to the existence somewhere of instigators to mischief, who had been employed for a different purpose; but no specific instance had come before them, nor was it their intention to say that any had. He had, therefore, opposed the motion so founded. (See page 835.) But the present motion was even less founded, and the inquiry suggested would be laborious, nay, endless. Besides, how did it appear that the very first thing essential to an inquiry would be found in this case—he meant, the veracity of witnesses. Was it improbable that the persons who professed a readiness to come forward against Oliver and the rest, would be persons whose designs might have been prematurely revealed by Oliver, and who, therefore, would be anxious, from revenge alone, to appear against their detector? He felt convinced, that if the strictest investigation were to take place, all parties would come out of it with disgrace. (A loud laugh from the opposition.) His right hon. friend and himself were old soldiers in parliamentary warfare, and he certainly felt no anger at any observations which had dropped from him that night, because he felt that his right hon. friend had done no more than became his place as leader of the opposition. (Loud laughter from the ministerial benches.) But he would do what he conceived to be his duty, whatever might be the opinions, or whatever the sneers, of his right hon. friend. As to the question more immediately before the house, if his hon. friend behind him (Mr. Bennet), or any hon. gentleman, would pledge himself to bring forward any credible witness, who would prove that Oliver, or any other person, had instigated others to commit treason, he, for one, would give his vote for an instruction to the attorney-general to prosecute such a wretch. That he could be prosecuted, he had no doubt; for, on the common principle of our law, that there was no evil without a remedy, there must be a remedy for so monstrous an evil. Let such a motion be made, and he pledged himself to support it. The system of espionage he execrated, and he considered it as not one of the least evils resulting from it, that those who, from circumstances, might be able to furnish information, and who would be willing to do it from motives of pure patriotism, might nevertheless be deterred from rendering such an essential service, lest they should be suspected of vile and mercenary motives; while, on the other hand, the hired spy, from anxiety to please his employer, and to do himself credit, would irritate instead of appeasing discontent, and would make a plot if he did not find one. (Hear, hear, from the opposition.) He was convinced that there was no man whose nature was more abhorrent from the employment of such agents than the noble secretary of state for the home department; and the truth was, that Oliver had not been, in the first instance, employed by him. Oliver went to his lordship, saying, that certain things had accidentally come to his knowledge, and offered to accompany an officer who was then going down to the disturbed districts. His offer was accepted, and, certainly, he must condemn that act; for he felt it to be as unnecessary and impolitic, as it was contrary to the principles of morality and religion, to employ the arts of depraved and mercenary falsehood for the discovery of truth. A country which had more morality and more religion than any other country in the world, ought not to be degraded by the employment of such wretched means of producing even useful results. For his own part, he saw so much good in the country, that he was not at all disposed to adopt the desponding tone of the right hon. gentleman, especially when he saw that the great hopes of the disaffected had been built on the distress of the country, while the most distressed districts had, to their great honour, remained untainted.—One word more, though on a subject on which it could not be pleasant for him to speak. He would ask, to what length must party feeling have reached in that house, when it was asserted, that because a person was not systematically opposed to government, he could not form an honest opinion on any subject presented to him in parliament. (Cries of no, no, from the opposition.) Well, if gentlemen were anxious to disclaim such injustice, he hoped that himself and an hon. friend of his would in future be treated with somewhat more respect. He would repeat, that when he contemplated the moral and religious habits of the people, he could not despair of the country, though he was sure that to revile, as some did, and to depreciate, as others did, our civil institutions, was not at all calculated to generate a feeling of content or patriotism. His right hon. friend had asked what foreign countries would think of our proceedings. As far as he was acquainted with the subject, there was a singular contrast between the judgments formed of our institutions abroad and at home. The wisest and best foreigners expressed the utmost admiration of our liberty and integrity, while, according to our declaimers at home, all was slavery—all corruption. He had been drawn in to say more than he had intended; but let a definite motion be made, and he would support it. That the present motion was of a different character was evident from the extraneous matter into which an hon. friend near him (Mr. W. Smith) had wandered. He would merely repeat, that if Oliver, or any other person, had acted in the way which had been imputed, it was a serious crime against the country, and he ought to be prosecuted; and if his hon. friend, (Mr. Bennet) or any other member, could produce evidence to shew that he had acted in that manner, he would support a motion for instructing the law officers of the crown to prosecute him. But, as to the present motion, he felt himself bound to oppose it.

Lord Archibald Hamilton said, that nothing could be more destructive of domestic happiness and public liberty than the employment of spies. It could not be denied that ministers had employed such persons—men of the most infamous and detestable character—who had instigated the people to commit acts of riot and sedition. They had appeared in all parts of the country. The proceedings of Richmond, the government spy in Scotland, were an exact counterpart of those of Oliver in England. He held in his hand the affidavit of one M'Lachlan, which stated, that Richmond had attended one of the meetings at Glasgow, as a friend to reform, and had stimulated all present to excess, by declaring that "no good was to be expected from petitions, but that parliament must be moved by fear." He held also in his hand a letter, signed by Richmond himself, stating, that "Utility was the criterion of his morality, and that he would justify, upon occasions, even direct falsehoods upon that principle." The noble lord said, he feared that Richmond, and his associates, had made a free use of this principle, and of these falsehoods, in the late transactions. He concluded by observing on the inconsistency of the last hon. member, who took merit to himself for detesting spies, yet opposed the present motion for detecting and exposing their conduct.

Mr. Philips rose to reply. He began by expressing the surprise and regret which he had felt on hearing the hon. member for Bramber declare his intention of giving a vote in direct opposition to the principles of his speech. No person could reason more justly and eloquently than that hon. gentleman had done on the evils of employing spies and informers. He had shewn that the practice was equally inconsistent with morals, religion, good government, and the genius of our free constitution. After the rea : not natural to expect, that to be should be solicitous for in- ga of proceedings which he obated? His only reason s, that inquiry, he believed, d he could see no end of it. would exercise his recollection for a moment, he would easily call to mind cases much more intricate, and difficult, in which the house had, with great public benefit, entered into inquiries, and completed them within a moderate time. His hon. friend, the member for Lancashire (Mr. Blackburne) had said, that those who had signed the declaration at Manchester, deprecating inquiry, were more numerous than the petitioners from the same place who had prayed for inquiry. He had no doubt, that the assertion of his hon. friend on that subject was perfectly correct. But there was a material difference between the two cases, which he had omitted to point out. The petitioners for inquiry declared, that they signed the petition after having investigated the facts referred to, and of which they pledged themselves to prove the truth: while the persons who were against inquiry did not even pretend, that they had investigated any facts whatever.—They merely offered their tribute of praise to the conduct of the magistrates and municipal officers. It would be extraordinary indeed, particularly in a town like Manchester, where party prejudice was so violent, if magistrates and municipal officers should not have a number of friends and supporters ready on all occasions to panegyrise them, and to cast reflections on those who questioned the wisdom of their proceedings. His hon. friend had read a letter from the gentlemen who officiated as borough-reeve and constables at the time of the alleged conspiracy. In that letter they stated, that he (Mr. Philips) had sent them a message, declaring his intention to do them justice, whenever the subject of those disturbances should be brought before parliament.—He had before done, and was still ready to do justice to their intentions, by declaring his persuasion that those gentlemen had made no representations but what they sincerely believed to be correct, and that they were anxious to use the influence of their stations to preserve the public tranquillity. He did not hesitate to say, that his own mind had, at the time referred to, been a good deal affected by the confident assurances made to him, particularly by one magistrate, of there being abundant evidence to prove the existence of a traitorous, and widely extended conspiracy, and to convict several of the conspirators. The same gentleman, from whom he had received very candid communications, was persuaded that a special commission would be appointed to try the conspirators. Though he (Mr. Philips) saw no signs of such a conspiracy in his own neighbourhood, where the people were bearing great privations with exemplary patience and fortitude, and though he did not discover that the magistrate himself had any evidence of the fact, beyond what was derived from general rumour, or the testimony of spies and informers, yet he could scarcely conceive it possible for that gentleman and his colleagues to have so firm and decided a conviction on the subject, without being able to produce satisfactory proof of the guilt of the parties accused. It was to be observed, that he had then heard representations only on one side of the question. He was not then informed of the mischievous activity of the spies and informers employed by the magistrates and the government. He was ignorant of the measures pursued by them to entice the poor people into the commission of crimes, and to excite public alarm by successive and obscure rumours of secret plots and conspiracies. The conduct of those miscreants had since been fully explained to him. Of the persons who had been accused by them, and whose guilt had been represented as admitting of no doubt, not one had been convicted, or even brought to trial, and all were now liberated. What was the inference, but that the alleged conspiracy did not in fact exist, and that the magistrates were imposed upon by hired spies and informers? He had heard with surprise the assertion of the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Robinson), and which a noble lord (Lascelles) had since repeated, that he had abandoned the case of the petitioners for inquiry from Manchester. He asserted, on the contrary, that he had not abandoned any one part of it. He had corrected an immaterial mistake respecting Sir John Byng, into which he had been led, not by the petitioners, but by a communication made to his hon. friend the member for Shrewsbury (Mr. Bennet) by a person to whose testimony he should not have referred, if certain facts had not been stated by him, with which he (Mr. Philips) had been previously acquainted. The representations of the petitioners themselves had been found, in the main, to be perfectly correct. The right hon. gentleman had not, indeed, been able to disprove any one of them. Though he began his speech with a loftiness of tone, and a vehemence of gesture, which promised an easy and triumphant refutation of their case, there was by no means, as he proceeded, a corresponding vigour in his performance. The right hon. gentleman seemed to have expected, that he should repeat the facts that had been stated to him by some of the petitioners, and on which their case was founded, though he had detailed them at great length on presenting their petition. If he had acted this part, would not the house have had great cause to complain of his tediousness and presumption in occupying their time twice with the same narrative? The right hon. gentleman had said, that Lomax was not a spy, and that he (Mr. P.) was aware of the fact, because Sir John Byng had told him so. But how was he to know that Sir John Byng might not himself have been mistaken? He could not be supposed to be acquainted with all the spies and informers, employed by all the magistrates, and all the police agents, in all the different towns in Lancashire. The principal spies and informers seemed to have had subordinate spies and informers, whom they might be willing to sacrifice at any time for their own advantage, or convenience. But what was the proof given by the right hon. gentleman, that Lomax was not a spy, or an informer? He (Mr. P.) began with him on the 10th of March. On the 17th of March, (said the right hon. gentleman) he wrote to Lord Sidmouth, offering to disclose to him all the facts with which he was acquainted. He still went on proposing schemes of violence and crime, and using all the means in his power to excite others to the perpetration of them. Did not all this prove, that his object from the beginning was to be an informer? He would refer it to the right hon. gentleman, whether his conduct was explicable on any other supposition? The right hon. gentleman seemed to be but very ill informed himself of the facts respecting which he had undertaken to offer information to the house. He had given him every advantage, by detailing the case of the petitioners, and stating dates and names when he presented the petition; yet, after all the time for examination and inquiry which had since passed, the right hon. gentleman was still ignorant who the person was that called himself Dewhurst, though he (Mr. P.) had mentioned various facts and circumstances by which he might have been identified. The real name of that man, as had been stated by his hon. friend (Mr. Bennet), was Michael Hall, who was in the pay of the police, or the government, and had formerly been sentenced to transportation. He would beg the house just to consider the prudence and judgment displayed in sending such a wretch, in a season of general anxiety and alarm, among unemployed and half starved workmen, anxious to discover any means of relieving themselves from their unexampled privations and sufferings. Must it not be obvious to any man of common sense, that if mischief did not exist already, such a villain would exert all the efforts in his power to create it? What better evidence, he would ask, could be given in favour of the disposition of the people generally, than that miscreants, like these, had not been able, with all their arts of misrepresentation and fraud, to betray them into a single breach of the peace? The right hon. gentleman had not even referred to another spy, of whose infamous endeavours to deceive and mislead the poor people so many instances had been given upon the presentation of the petition from Manchester. The real name of that man was Robert Waddington, as was stated at the time, though he too, like his worthy colleague, bore another name, viz. Warren. He was the man, who, at the meeting of the 28th of March, declared that he had received a letter that morning from London, stating, that "all the people in that neighbourhood were up: that there were 80,000 of them at Chalk Farm, 100,000 at another place, and 60,000, or 70,000, elsewhere."—After the facts which he had referred to, and those stated in the petitions, which had been entered as read, he had no hesitation in asserting, that a case demanding inquiry had been sufficiently established. He would add only one remark. His friends and himself were solicitous for inquiry, while those opposed to them were anxious to shun all inquiry. The house, and the public, would from thence decide, with which of the parties the conviction was the deepest of having truth on its side. (Hear, hear, hear.)

The house then divided.	Ayes	69

NETHERLANDS.] The report of the committee of supply being brought up,

Lord Castlereagh rose, and said, he felt it necessary to give some explanations respecting the vote for the fortifications in the Netherlands, in consequence of doubts expressed by an hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Warre). He had since referred to the treaty, and he found, that there was no sort of ambiguity in the article which related to the fortifications. In no case could the charge for them exceed 2,000,000*l.* There was 1,000,000*l.*, besides, to be paid to Sweden in consideration of giving up Guadaloupe. The third article referred to the Russian loan to the government of the Netherlands, which had not been finally adjusted.

Mr. Warre said, if he had erred, it appeared that he had done so in common with the noble lord. Two millions, it now appeared, was the ultimatum of charge for the fortifications.—The report was then agreed to by the house.

TELLERS—Hon. F. S. Douglas and George Philips.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday, March 6.

POOR LAWS.] The Earl of Rosslyn presented a petition of the Proprietors and Occupiers of the township of Grinton, in the North Riding of the county of York, complaining of their sufferings under the present system of the poor laws, and praying that the law might be so amended, that occupiers of lead mines might be rated. (See the Commons.)—Ordered to lie on the table.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, March 6.

FINANCE COMMITTEE.] Mr. D. Gilbert brought up the eighth report of the committee appointed to inquire into the public income and expenditure.—It was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

POOR LAWS.] The following petition of the Proprietors and Occupiers of the township of Grinton, in the North Riding of the county of York, was presented, ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed. "That the petitioners have to express their reluctance in again approaching the house with their complaints of those sufferings which they continue to experience under the present system of the poor laws; if they may be permitted to draw an inference from what has taken place in their circumstances within the last three years, as to what is to be their fate in future, they cannot close their eyes upon the evident but mournful conviction that their total ruin must be as certain as it will be rapid; the rate on their best lands in this year exceeding the heavy sum of 1*l.* 10*s.* per acre, the want of that relief which they have for many years past been accustomed to receive from rating the duty lead raised from the mines within the township of Grinton is severely felt at the present moment; the petitioners most earnestly intreat, therefore, that the house will be pleased particularly to recommend this circumstance to the committee now deliberating on the subject of the poor laws; and they pray, that the law may be so amended that occupiers may be rated in respect of the duty lead; in a matter of such vital importance to the kingdom in general much deliberation and much inquiry must be undoubtedly requisite, and temporary remedies must be thankfully received; but in an evil so colossal, so pregnant with ruin as the present system, they will endeavour to hope that it will never cease to occupy the most serious consideration of the house until such measures are devised as shall gradually lead to its total abolition."

CONVEYANCERS.] The following petition of Nicholas Pearce, of Saint Mellion, near Callington, in the county of Cornwall, conveyancer, was presented, ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed. "That the petitioner, amongst others, has exercised, and continues to exercise, the profession and business of a conveyancer, having been long a member of one of the inns of court, as required by an act of parliament passed in the 44th year of the reign of his present Majesty, and having regularly taken out a certificate annually, pursuant to that and subsequent stamp acts; that he has been informed, and believes, that certain attempts have been and are now being made by many attornies and solicitors, by petition to the house, under an affected zeal for the public interest, and with the ostensible pretext of preventing ignorant and incompetent persons from exercising the business of a conveyancer, to pass one or more acts of parliament that may, without regard to ability or competency, disable from practising as conveyancers those persons who, relying on the faith of an act of parliament, have with great assiduity and labour, and at great expense, qualified themselves to perform the duties of such profession, and have practised to the benefit and satisfaction of their employers, and with credit and reputation to themselves; that the petitioner has been informed, and believes, that it has been objected by the said attornies and solicitors that conveyancers exercise certain businesses, and amongst others that of land agent, or land surveyor, together with conveyancing; the petitioner most humbly submits to the house, that the business of a land surveyor is highly respectable, and that there is nothing disreputable or degrading to the profession of a conveyancer in uniting with it that of land surveying; and he further submits to the house, that this objection ought not to have any weight, because many attornies and solicitors are land agents and stewards, and many of them exercise other businesses inferior to that of land surveying, and because all attornies and solicitors may act as land surveyors if they are qualified so to do; that the petitioner humbly represents to the house, that conveyancers are, with perhaps very few excepted instances, men of acknowledged respectability, integrity, and ability, and that their practice is evidence thereof; that such practice is considerable and desirable is plainly declared by the efforts of the attornies and solicitors to wrest it from the hands of the present possessors, that it may be divided among themselves; that the petitioner humbly submits to the house, that it would be unjust to disqualify the whole body of conveyancers because some one or two might be found who are incompetent to practise as such, or who may have forfeited their claim to respectability; that, on the same principle, the whole body of attornies and solicitors would be subject to the same rule of disqualification, as instances are not uncommon of the want of ability and integrity among the practitioners of that branch of the law being brought under the cognizance of the courts at Westminster; that the petitioner further submits to the house, that the attornies and solicitors ought not to object against (at least) the established conveyancers continuing the exercise of their profession, because the said attornies and solicitors must have had full knowledge, at the time they were articled, that conveyancers had been and were a distinct and separate body; that the petitioner frankly acknowledges to the house, that, in addition to the business of a conveyancer, he also acts as land agent and surveyor, and he submits that he has always conducted himself in the exercise thereof with integrity and uprightness, and to the satisfaction of his respectable employers, that he ought not to be deprived of either of the means whereby he obtains a livelihood for himself and his family; that the petitioner further submits to the house, that no benefit is likely to arise to the public by vesting in attornies and solicitors the exclusive right and privilege of conveyancing, seeing that the number of competitors will be lessened, and the public be necessarily more dependent on them than at present; that the petitioner begs to inform the house, that at an early age he was placed under and instructed by a conveyancer for more than eight years, that he has practised as such from that time, as well before as after he was admitted a member of the honourable society of Gray's Inn, in compliance with the above-mentioned act; and that he has hitherto given satisfaction to his employers; and he therefore humbly prays the house to take his case into their serious and impartial consideration, and to extend their protection to him in the exercise of his undoubted and just rights, since, if the petitioner should be deprived thereof, his family and himself would be greatly and irremediably injured and distressed: that if it shall seem meet to the wisdom of the house to make any alteration in the existing laws respecting the future practice of conveyancing by persons not being attornies or solicitors, the petitioner prays that it may not have a retrospective operation, or be calculated to oppress or injure the conveyancers already established, who have paid their fees and annual duties so long, and maintained a reputable and respectable rank in society."

TITHE LAWS AMENDMENT BILL.] Lord Palmerston presented the following petition of the Chancellor, Masters, and Scholars of the University of Cambridge. "That the petitioners have seen with the greatest anxiety and alarm, a bill introduced into the house, intituled, 'a Bill for the Amendment of the Law in respect of Tithes;' that they view in the provisions of this bill an attempt to overturn those principles upon which for centuries the wisest lawyers have founded their decisions respecting the right of tithes; that the petitioners humbly submit to the house, that the law of tithes is interwoven with the constitution no less of the state than of the church, and has been guarantied by every charter of our civil liberties: that it would be inconsistent with the principles of impartial justice, to make it imperative on courts of equity, to grant at the suit of the party defending under any prescription or exemption from tithe, an issue to try the same by jury, as there are, and ever must be, many local interests and prejudices which would essentially obstruct, and, in many cases, defeat the impartial trial by jury of such causes, which prejudices are greatly strengthened and extended by the introduction into the house of bills professedly intended to interfere with ecclesiastical property; that there is no proof before the house of real grievances, arising from the existing practice of courts of equity, in granting or refusing issues to try such causes by jury, that should induce the house to pass the proposed bill; that the petitioners view that clause in the bill, which proposes to alter the nature of the evidence at present required to establish a composition real, as an attempt to subvert every established rule of evidence, as mere usage, without the production either of the deed or instrument of such composition, or of the slightest evidence to shew that such deed or instrument ever existed, can never afford conclusive evidence that such composition was legally made; that the real object of that clause appears to the petitioners to be, to convert every bad modus into a good composition real; that to presume from mere usage, going back only as far as living memory, that lands belonged to monasteries or religious houses dissolved by the 32d of king Henry the Eighth, without producing any evidence of the fact, although such evidence might, if the fact were so, in all cases be easily obtained, and that such lands are entitled to be held, discharged, and acquitted of payment of tithes in as ample manner as they were when it is presumed that they were in the possession of such religious houses, is contrary to every principle of evidence and of justice; that to establish in such cases a discharge or exemption from the payment of tithes, because it appears that such discharge or exemption has, as far back as living memory can go, been enjoyed, and been reputed to be lawfully enjoyed, is, first, to deprive the church for ever of such tithes as by law belong to it, and might be recovered by an incumbent who was able and willing to sustain the expense of an action; secondly, to create an inducement to the corrupt disposal of benefices, by making it possible in certain cases for a family possessing an estate in a parish, and the advowson of the benefice, to originate and establish in the course of two or three generations, a perpetual exemption of their own estate from payment of tithes; that to legalize all conveyances, exchanges, compositions, and agreements, that have been made between the 13th of Elizabeth, and the year 1766, unless proved to have been originally fraudulently obtained, is to legalize what the law has declared to be illegal, and what the statute of the 13th of Elizabeth was expressly enacted to prevent; and to require from the incumbent of a living positive proof that such conveyances, exchanges, compositions, and agreements, were originally fraudulently obtained, at the same time that it is proposed to make mere usage, going back only as far as living memory, conclusive evidence of the existence of an exemption from payment of tithe, is utterly repugnant to every principle of justice; that the appointment of commissioners to set out lands for a particular modus, is open to very serious abuse, for if the modus is too rank to suit the land for which it is claimed to be paid, the quantity of land may be extended to suit the modus; the petitioners therefore humbly pray the house, that no such bill may pass into a law."

On the motion that the petition do lie on the table,

Mr. Curwen rose, and said, that he hoped between this and the second reading of the bill, many groundless prejudices would be removed. It was not his intention to urge the first part of the bill, relative to moduses, and he regretted that the learned body, whose petition had been just presented, had not been aware of that circumstance. He now gave notice, that he should move the second reading on the 16th instant.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

COPY RIGHT BILL.] The following petition of the Chancellor, Masters, and Scholars, of the University of Oxford, was ordered to be printed. "That the petitioners, being informed that a bill is now in progress through the house for securing the copies and copyright of printed books to the authors of such books and their assigns, by certain provisions of which the interests of the university are likely to be affected, humbly beg leave to represent, that by an indenture or deed of grant from the Stationers' Company, bearing date the 12th day of December 1610, the University of Oxford is entitled to one copy of every book printed by the said company, which grant was in the following year confirmed and extended by the authority of the same; the petitioners therefore humbly pray, that parliament in its wisdom will be pleased to advert to the fact, that the University of Oxford does not originally derive its privilege from the act of the 8th year of her Majesty Queen Anne, but was in possession of it for a century before that act passed, and that the house will on that account, as well as in consideration of the right having been enjoyed by authority of parliament, be induced to maintain and preserve the privileges of the university with respect to its claim of copies of books, in such manner as shall seem most fit and reasonable."

INDEMNITY BILL.] A message was received from the lords, which announced, that their lordships had passed a bill, intituled "an act for indemnifying persons, who, since the 26th day of January, 1817, have acted in apprehending, imprisoning, or detaining in custody, persons suspected of High Treason or treasonable practices, and in the suppression of tumultuous and unlawful assemblies." At the same time, their lordships communicated the report of their committee on the secret papers, as requested by a message from the commons.

The messengers having withdrawn,

The Attorney-General rose, and said, that as he understood that an hon. member (Mr. Lambton) had expressed his intention to oppose the indemnity bill in every stage, he should not move the first reading of it that night, but would do so on Monday next. At present, he should merely move that the bill be printed.

Mr. Lushington moved, that the bill be read a first time on Monday next.

Lord Folkestone thought, that the conduct of the Attorney-General, in desiring to move the first reading on Monday, was quite fair. But the motion of the hon. gentleman would make it an order of the day. He hoped, that he would not persist in such a motion: if he did, he trusted that the Attorney-General would vote against it.

The Attorney-General explained: after what he had heard of the intended opposition to the bill, he had thought it right that time should be given to print it, (Hear, hear,) so that it might be understood in all its parts, and not considered and debated upon prematurely.

Lord Folkestone said, he did not at all complain of the proceedings of the learned gentleman respecting the bill, but of the motion of the hon. gentleman, which seemed to be in the teeth of the learned gentleman's proposition.

Mr. Lushington said, there had been no inconsistency in his conduct. All that he had desired was, to secure the discussion in the first stage on Monday.

Mr. Lambton said, it was his intention to oppose the bill on the question for its being read a first time; indeed, to oppose its earliest stage.

Mr. Speaker said, he apprehended that the course would be, that if the order of the day was made for Monday, that question would come on first; and after that, the question on the first reading must be put.

The motion for the order of the day on Monday was then agreed to, and the bill, together with the report of the lords' committee, ordered to be printed.

PRIVATELY STEALING BILL.] Sir S. Romilly moved the second reading of this bill.

Sir F. Flood thought, that the bill should be made to extend to Ireland, as it was very desirable to assimilate the laws in both islands. At present, he knew that the same inconveniences existed in Ireland with respect to laws of this description. Juries were smitten with compassion, and the feelings of judges were actuated, in cases where the laws awarded severe punishment. The punishment of crimes should be proportioned, but rendered more certain. He trusted that the learned gentleman would persevere, and that, after that house had passed the bill over and over again, the other house would not be obstinate, and reject it.

Sir S. Romilly thought it desirable to extend the operation of the bill to Ireland. Humanity in that country counteracted the effect of such laws in the same way that it did here. But it was possible, that his interfering in the laws of Ireland might operate in another place against the bill, and occasion more objections. Some gentleman connected with Ireland might take up the matter with a better prospect of success.

Sir F. Flood said, that if no other member took up the subject, he would himself move for leave to bring in a similar bill for Ireland.

Mr. Peel said, that the same laws should certainly exist in both countries.

The bill was then read a second time, and committed for Monday the 16th instant.

SALT DUTIES.] The following petition of several salt proprietors, and other inhabitants of the county of Chester, was presented, ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed. "That at a public meeting, lately convened by the sheriff of Cheshire, on the requisition of certain dairy farmers, it was resolved to petition the house, that the duties on salt should be totally abolished, as burthensome to the dairy farmers of Cheshire in particular, and the poor in general; that the petitioners see no good reason why the dairy farmer should consider himself burthened with the duty on salt, as the salt necessarily used by him in cheese and butter, is sold again in those articles at a much higher rate than he pays for the salt; that the salt used by the poor, is in very small quantities, and so little felt by them, that the petitioners believe they never entertained an idea of the duty being oppressive, until it was suggested by the Cheshire dairy farmers; that the petitioners are of opinion that no tax can be substituted for that on salt, which will be less oppressive, or bear so equally on all his Majesty's subjects; that the stamps used in respect of salt, and the payments connected therewith, add very materially to the public revenue; that the petitioners are of opinion that salt will not be found beneficial as a manure, or for cattle, or other agricultural purposes, and that little, if any, will be used, for although brine mixed with ashes and rock salt were, by an act of the last session of parliament, allowed to be used, yet only one application has been made, which was abandoned, for brine, and only two or three applications have been made, as the petitioners believe, for rock salt for cattle; that such of the petitioners as are proprietors of salt works have expended large sums of money in the erection of such works, and in making warehouses and buildings so as to secure the duty to the revenue, which will become in a great measure unnecessary and useless if the duty on salt should be abolished, by which the property of the petitioners will be much deteriorated; that if the duty on salt should be wholly abolished, and foreign salt allowed to be imported without being liable to any duty, the trade of the petitioners, the salt proprietors, would be much injured, as foreign salt may be imported into different parts of the kingdom at a lower rate than the petitioners could supply it; that the petitioners feel confident that the use of salt on land would be destructive to fences and exceedingly prejudicial to timber, it being known to them that many timber trees have been destroyed by cinders from the salt works having been used in repairing roads; they therefore humble pray the house to take these their humble representations into their consideration, on any application which may be made for taking off the duty on salt, and rather permit the present duty to continue than substitute taxes which may be less equal and more burthensome."

MUTINY BILL—ARMY ESTIMATES.] The report of the mutiny bill being brought up,

Lord Althorp rose to move an amendment in the preamble. He observed, that when the question of the amount of force to be maintained was before agitated, the house was so thin, that he thought it his duty to bring it again before them. In the present condition of the country, when the finances were in so low a state, when we were involved in so many difficulties, he could not but think that the army was larger than it ought to be. There scarcely ever had been a time when the country had been so distressed. Last year the income had been 51,000,000*l.* and the expenditure 65,000,000*l.*; that was, there had been a deficiency in the income when compared with the expenditure of 14,000,000*l.* Without any great knowledge of finance, it might be obvious to every man, that it would be impossible to preserve the situation which we had held, or to resist any aggression that might be made upon us, unless by some means our income and expenditure could be brought nearly to an equality. (Hear.) Either the expenditure should be lowered to the income, or the income should be raised to the expenditure. It would be obvious to every one, that, whether the deficiency should be supplied by loans or exchequer bills, it would be still money borrowed. The outstanding exchequer bills amounted now to 56,000,000*l.* Whether the military establishment or any other were under discussion, it was plain that they were considering the question—whether any new tax should be laid upon the people, or any reduction should take place. The question was, whether they would make that reduction, or would keep up the same establishment with which they were overrun so much last year, or what reduction they would make that might diminish the burdens of the country. (Hear, hear.) In order to meet the great deficiency, the only reduction was, in reality, less than 3000 men—3000 men, or less, was the only reduction that had been proposed by government. He did not mean to trouble the house by entering into any of the details of the forces; to that, indeed, he felt himself unequal. He did not possess any information on the question whether more or less might be necessary in any particular department. His hon. friend, the member for Rochester, had compared the establishment of this year with that of 1792; he thought that comparison perfectly just: being the last period of permanent peace, it was certainly the best criterion to go by; but the noble lord (Palmerston) had objected to that. He should have not the least objection, however, to allow the noble lord to choose any year between the American war and the war with France. (Hear, hear.) As this was the third year, however, after the present peace, he should take the third year after the American war—the year 1786. Before he entered on the comparison, it was necessary that he should state what part of the estimates of the year he would put entirely out of the question. He should leave out of the comparison, 1. the colonies acquired since that time; 2. Ireland, which, it was admitted by gentlemen from that country, required a larger force, though the responsibility for the conduct which brought about that necessity, was on the shoulders of the ministers, and especially of the noble lord (Castlereagh), who consented to compromise a measure which he had himself declared to be essential to its tranquillity; 3. the troops required under the new system of reliefs. The noble lord (Palmerston) had calculated 12,000 men for the newly acquired colonies. He should allow 13,620. Thus 24,000 remained for the colonies which we possessed in 1786. Now, the difference between the estimates for the year 1786 and the present year was as follows:

In 1786, the numbers for Great Britain were	17,638
for the Colonies,	9,546
Irish regiments serving abroad,	2,490
Total	29,674

n 1818, the numbers for Great Britain were	29,780
for the Colonies,	24,000
Total	53,780

'he whole difference then, taking the numbers as he had stated them, would be upwards of 24,000 men. The noble lord had accounted for part of the difference from the alteration of the mode of relief. He had set apart upwards of 6,000 men for the purposes of relief. Such a number could not have been required upon his principle of excluding the new possessions, and therefore he would take that part at 2,000 men. That accounted, then, for an increase of 4,000 men since the American war. There remained still, however, upwards of 20,000 men unaccounted for. He should not enter into the detail, but ministers were bound to shew a necessity for every one augmented item of the estimates. The increased population of the country had been adduced as an argument for an increase of force. He had been really surprised to hear such an argument employed. It had been our pride and triumph, that when despotic governments were obliged to maintain themselves by a military force, we, with all our privileges, were not molested in their enjoyment by an army. He could not allow of that argument at all; but if he could allow that a large army was a necessary consequence of a great population, he should be very far from approving of our present force. In 1786 the British force was 17,000 men, and now it was 29,000; so that there was a difference of nearly 12,000 men. But taking that argument to have its full weight, he did not suppose it would be available in considering the forces for the West-Indies. (Hear, hear.) In 1786, we had concluded a war which was very different from the last in which we had been engaged. We had then to guard against both foreign enemies and domestic danger. Now, we had borne the conquest of Europe, and had an immense army in France, ready to preserve us from any sudden aggression. It appeared, indeed, that any argument on the subject would tend rather towards a reduction of the estimates than an augmentation. We had no occasion for such a force in the colonies. The only possible danger to the old colonies was to be apprehended from America, and that country had a standing army of 8,000 men, to oppose which, it seemed necessary to have an army of 24,000 men. That number of men was so much beyond any calculation to which he might refer, that he could not for a moment think it was proper. His arguments, he might observe, went considerably farther than the reduction which he intended to propose, namely, a reduction of 5,000 men. His reason for limiting it to that number was, that a motion for a greater reduction had been negatived by a large majority. If his motion were carried, there would still be an increase of 15,000 men, after full allowance made for the reliefs. In point of economy, the reduction he proposed would certainly be a saving to the country. He was speaking as far as he had been able to calculate the expense of the force, and, by his own estimate, the reduction would be a diminution of expenditure of 180,000*l.* That was a sum of considerable importance to the country at the present moment. It had always been an argument with him, that a large standing army was a dangerous thing for this country. Indeed, it appeared that the policy of the country was very much changed of late years. It had been formerly the practice to keep up the force of the navy; but that was not the case now. (Hear, hear.) At no previous period had there been voted for Great Britain a larger force for the army than for the navy. Between 1786 and 1792, there had been voted for the army 17,000 men, and for the navy 19,000. Now, there were for the army 29,000 men, and for the navy 20,000. We had attained great honour as a military nation, but could any man believe that we should ever have attained that honour, if we had not been a great naval power? (Hear.) In former times every success depended on our navy, but the navy was becoming so much neglected, that, he feared, it would be difficult for us to maintain the high station we had hitherto claimed, in case of any future contest. If the army increased, it should be narrowly observed, as it augmented the interest and influence of the crown. Many families in England had more or less influence by their connexion with the army. That was an influence which had, without doubt, increased by the extent of taxation, by the number of revenue officers, and in a variety of ways: and that influence they ought to do all in their power to contract. In the West Indies there was one circumstance which would reduce the number of men considerably —he meant the abolition of the slave-trade. As long as great numbers of those most wretched creatures, who, in many instances, had been torn by force from their homes, were to be found in the colonies, much danger, at least internal danger, existed, which would now no longer remain. The acquisitions that we had attained had certainly required the employment of additional force. But it was said, that some of the colonies maintained a number of native troops; and surely it could never be asserted, that, in consequence of having these black regiments, it was necessary to increase the number of whites. There was another circumstance that would make a considerable alteration in the forces, and that was, the great increase of fortifications. These had increased considerably, and, he thought, without any necessity. We had now 100 battalions, which, in 1786, consisted of 400 men each, but at present of 800. In his opinion, if the battalion were reduced to 750 men, it would be sufficiently strong; and, therefore, he should propose to take 50 men from each of the 100 battalions, which would amount to 5000 men in the whole. He wished the house to remember the necessity there was for this reduction, and he hoped, that they would not reject a motion which left a force more than was necessary of 15,000 men. The noble lord then moved an amendment to the bill, by leaving out "113,640 men," and inserting "108,640 men," instead thereof.

Mr. Wynn said, he had to state a difficulty in his mind relative to the proceeding of the noble lord, which was, whether, supposing the house should agree to his motion, it would be productive of any effect whatever. A similar amendment had been moved in more instances than one, and carried, but it made no diminution in the number of troops maintained. The number of troops was never an effective part of the mutiny bill; its principal object was to make provisions, according to which the conduct of the army was to be regulated. Indeed, if the house looked back into the history of mutiny bills, they would find that they frequently stated no numbers whatever. In the year 1715, 9,956 men had been voted, which the house of lords diminished to 8,500. In the year 1724, the number 12,434 men had been inserted in the mutiny bill, though the supply had been voted at 14,294. The army continued at that number. In another year the supply had been voted for 18,000 men. The house of lords made a reduction: but if the estimates were examined, the numbers would be found to continue at upwards of 18,000. With these instances before him, he did not know in what way the noble lord's amendment could operate. He agreed most cordially with most of his statements, particularly with that part which related to the colonies; but he disapproved of the mode in which his proposition was to be carried into effect. He had no objection to the maintenance of the number of troops voted for the colonies, but he thought that the colonies should bear the expense. Jamaica had once maintained two battalions, and a regiment of cavalry.

Mr. Bankes said, that the motion of the noble lord was strictly conformable to order. That house, and that house alone, had the proper control over the mutiny bill. In certain instances, it was true, the other house, when they considered the grants made by that house as extravagant, thought proper to make a seasonable reduction, and the house of commons acceded; having granted too much by a hasty vote, they thought proper, upon reconsideration, to concur in its reduction. He hoped, that if they now agreed to the reduction of 5,000 men, as proposed by the motion of the noble lord, it would not be competent for the government to go beyond it. In time of peace it behoved them to look at every possible mode of reduction which was safe and warrantable. He admitted, however, that a large establishment, such as ours had been for years, could not be suddenly reduced. This could only be done gradually and regularly. He differed much from the opinion of the minister at war. The noble lord had stated, that Mr. Pitt was greatly mistaken in proposing a peace establishment which was too low; because in the war which broke out shortly afterwards, the country was put to very serious expense in raising the army to a proper standard. But the maintenance of a large standing army, when of no use, in order to be prepared for exertions which might possibly be required afterwards, was improper in every view, and utterly repugnant to the spirit of our happy constitution. Last year, perhaps, it might have been maintained, that a considerable force was necessary to restrain the turbulent and disaffected; but the case was now happily changed, and we could do with a smaller force. He thought that a reduction should be made of three regiments, or 2,400 men in Great Britain, and the same proportion in the colonial force.

Lord Palmerston maintained, that the precedents of the peace establishment of 1786 and 1792, could not be consistently urged upon the present occasion, as the circumstances of the country had since those periods so materially altered. With respect to the first period, the year 1786, the noble lord (Althorp) had omitted to mention the 10,000 Hessians whom we had at that time in our pay by means of a subsidiary treaty, and who ought, therefore, in fairness, to be added to the establishment of that year. But Mr. Pitt was confessedly deceived in the calculations upon which he founded the military establishment in 1792; for when he proposed, in the February of that year, to reduce our military force, he said, that there was never a period in the history of this country, when, from the situation of Europe, we might more reasonably expect fifteen years of peace than at that moment. And yet, a few months only had elapsed from that time, when internal commotions took place, the militia was embodied, parliament assembled, war declared, and augmented military establishments proposed. Whether any difference in the amount of our military force at the beginning of the war which then broke out would have brought the struggle to an earlier and different termination, it would be presumptuous to say; but this at least must be admitted, that the very low and reduced state of our army at the commencement of the contest, greatly tended to cripple and paralize our military efforts for many years of the war, and compelled us to have recourse to most expensive methods of supplying the deficiency under which we laboured. But the question now was not, whether the force kept up in 1792 was too great, or too little; it was, whether the circumstances of the country, and the state of our colonies, required the establishment which had been proposed. He did not mean to assert, that a numerous population ought to be governed by the sword; but, when gentlemen remembered the vast increase of population, particularly in the manufacturing districts, and how liable the people were to be excited to tumult, in case of any interruption of commercial prosperity, or any scarcity of provisions arising from unfavourable seasons, or any other cause of popular discontent, it was obviously necessary that a much larger military force should be maintained for the preservation of the public tranquillity than could have been required twenty-six years ago. Most of the gentlemen present had seen the necessity of keeping a large force in the metropolis, to restrain turbulent spirits from acts of disorder and outrage, when, in the debates on the corn laws, members were not safe in their passage to and from the house. It was necessary, however, to look at the way in which the troops were to be distributed. He had observed before, (see page 653.) and he was sorry to be obliged to trouble the house with repeating it, that the amount of 26,000 men, taken in the estimates for Great Britain, could not be considered as wholly applicable to the home service; a portion must be applied to the relief of foreign garrisons. Those garrisons consisted of a force of 33,000 men, to which must be added the 17,000 men in India, making a total of 50,000 men. Ten years, as he had stated on that occasion, were considered to be the fair limit of service abroad. Now, allowing that the reliefs would amount to one-tenth of that force, or 5000 men, this would reduce the number to 21,000. But, it must be remembered, that of regiments which were sent abroad with their full complement, frequently only the skeletons returned home, owing to the nature of the service, and the destructive effects of the climate, and of those who returned, it was often found necessary to discharge a great number, as unfit for further service. The amount of these might be fairly stated at 2000 men. This would reduce the whole number to 19,000; and then, if a further force of 1000, for Guernsey and Jersey, were deducted, it would appear that the army for home service would not exceed 18,000 men, being, in fact, only 5000 more than the establishment of 1792. (Hear, hear.) How, then, could 18,000 men be deemed too large a force, when gentlemen considered the number necessary to protect the metropolis, to guard the dock-yards, and preserve the peace of the interior of the country?—With respect to the establishment proposed for Ireland, the necessity of keeping up 20,000 men had been fully shewn by his right hon. friend (Mr. Peel), and he was glad to find, that the gentlemen who were best acquainted with the state of that country had not considered the number unreasonable. As to the Old Colonies, the fact was, that the increase of force for that service, beyond the establishment of 1792, was very trifling, with the exception of that for the Canadas, in which the military establishment, and means of defence, were materially advanced, for reasons which it was unnecessary to state, and which implied no undue suspicion of the amicable spirit of the United States. In Jamaica and the Bahamas, the force in 1792 was 2,200; at present it did not exceed 3,000. In the Leeward Islands, there were 3,200 men in 1792; at present, there were only 3,400. In short, the whole increase in the old colonies over the establishment of 1792 was only 5,000 men, and this increase was fully justified on their altered circumstances.—The establishment for the New Colonies had been framed upon the most considerate grounds. But the house must be aware, that such places as the Cape of Good Hope and Malta, which had been conquered as points of military possession, would be no acquisition to this country, if they were not adequately garrisoned, and the same might be said of others of our new colonies. Upon the whole, he was confident, that a greater force was not kept up, either at home or abroad, than was absolutely necessary, and, therefore, he should vote against the noble lord's motion.

Mr. Ord said, that although he seldom offered himself to the attention of the house, he felt himself bound, on this occasion, to raise his voice, however feeble, against the system of ministers, because it appeared to him calculated to reduce the country to a military government. (Hear, hear.) They were told that they ought not to refer to the year 1792 for a precedent, because the small establishment of that year proved a serious inconvenience when war broke out, and thus it was attempted to justify a large establishment in time of peace: but he would deprecate the approach to a standing army, at any period, as dangerous in itself, and contrary to the principles of our constitution. The want of it might be one means of preserving that peace which was so valuable. It had happened, he believed, not unfrequently, that the command of such a fatal engine had proved an encouragement to a war which might have been otherwise avoided. (Hear, hear.) With respect to the alleged necessity of a large military force for the defence of the metropolis, he could not see that any increase had taken place in the extent or population of this city since 1792, which could call for the augmentation of force proposed by the noble lord. But even admitting an increase of population in the metropolis, according to the noble lord's statement, how could such increase form any argument for the increase of our military force, unless it were argued that the police of London should be managed by the same means as those resorted to in Berlin or Petersburgh, or the other capitals of military and arbitrary governments? (Hear, hear.) The taste of such governments had, no doubt, become very prevalent of late years in this country; for there was no levee now without a crowd of soldiers parading the streets, and, with naked swords, guarding all the avenues to the royal residence, to the terror of the people. (Loud cries of hear.) If our ancestors had witnessed such military exhibitions, they would have been apt to imagine that the French, or some foreign enemy, were actually approaching the metropolis. There was obviously no necessity for such exhibitions, and it was only to gratify a foolish, foppish taste for pomp and parade, that ministers proposed, in the present state of our finances, to maintain a larger peace establishment than was ever known before. There was a time, when his Majesty held his levees without any military to parade the streets, and such practice was more suitable to the character, and real dignity, of the monarch of a free people, than the practice which had obtained of late years. (Hear, hear.) But, it seemed that the enemies of reform and innovation thought an increased military force necessary at present to preserve the peace of an increased population. But would the ministers generally adopt the noble lord's doctrine, that the mass of the people were so discontented, that nothing but the terror of a military force could prevent an explosion and revolution? If so, what a reflection upon the conduct and character of the government. But the fact was not so, for the British people were not so insensible of the value of their constitution, with all its defects, especially in modern practice, as to desire its overthrow. But, from the noble lord's language, that constitution was not so very reverently to be regarded: for, the good old constitutional objection to a standing army was, it appeared, deemed quite frivolous and inapplicable to our present condition. When such language was employed by his Majesty's ministers, it could hardly be imagined how soon some other constitutional point of great value, in the estimation of the country, might be deemed equally inapplicable or inexpedient. There was no part of our constitution so valuable, that might not be ridiculed and sneered at by designing men, for the purpose of smoothing the approaches to arbitrary power. Even the trial by jury, or the habeas corpus act, or any other sacred characteristic of our free constitution, might be represented as tedious and inconvenient, when compared with the summary expedition of despotism. He had no hesitation in declaring, that, in his view of the subject, the whole career of those ministers was calculated to alarm the friends of constitutional liberty, if not to produce absolute despair. (Hear, hear.)

Lord Nugent said, that he had seldom heard a speech more honourable to the person himself, or more useful to the house, than that of the hon. gentleman who had just sat down. It was replete with sentiments of good old English liberty, and must make a deep impression on every gentleman who recalled to mind the alarms and jealousies which our forefathers, in the best times of our history, had entertained of a standing army. (Hear, hear.) For his own part, he had stated last year, when the army estimates were under discussion, (see vol. I. p. 1068) and he would now repeat, that he knew of no instance in which a free constitution had been ever finally overthrown, or public liberty permanently subdued, through any other agency than that of a standing army. (Hear, hear.) It was not his intention to detain the house long on the present occasion; but there was one topic on which he could not but animadvert—he meant the employment of foreign mercenaries. (Hear.) We had now in our service one regiment, the 60th, consisting of five battalions, composed entirely of foreigners. This was a most exceptionable measure. Those men, of all others, had the least claim upon the country, and, he understood, that their continued employment had occasioned very great disapprobation. The only difficulty that could be felt in disbanding any regiment was the reluctance to deprive so many of our gallant countrymen of their usual subsistence; but no such difficulty could be felt with regard to the 60th regiment; and why, then, should it be retained upon our peace establishment, especially while so many of our native regiments were disbanded? (Hear, hear.) There was another point upon which he felt himself bound to make a few observations, and that was, with regard to the army of occupation. He felt a strong objection, and it must occasion the greatest and most serious alarm in the breast of every reflecting Englishman, that so many of our countrymen should be kept among such scenes, and in such society, as they were exposed to under a military government. Nothing could be more improper, or dangerous, than that British soldiers should be fixed in a situation where they were but too liable to imbibe notions and sentiments which it would be treason to support upon their return to their native land. He was aware that, by that treaty which ministers had concluded, and which some gentlemen approved, but which he thought the very worst to be found in the history of our diplomacy, we were pledged to maintain a certain contingent in France. That treaty ought, he admitted, to be sacredly observed, as the honour of the country was pledged upon the subject; but he would much rather vote for the supply and support of that contingent by a body of Russians, or any other mercenaries, than have his countrymen placed in the disgusting, odious, and un-English office of maintaining a military despotism. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Warre said, he could not see the necessity for any larger military force at present than existed in 1792. If the manner in which the army was generally employed were considered, it would be evident to every rational being that no such necessity could be pleaded, unless it were deemed material to have soldiers stationed as sentinels upon Chinese bridges, to guard French mortars, or to attend public shows.—It was extraordinary with what facility ministers could get rid of the authority of Mr. Pitt when it suited their purpose, while they held up that authority as an object of the highest reverence, on other occasions. Because Mr. Pitt had proposed a moderate military establishment in 1792, in consequence of the probable duration of peace and the embarrassed state of our finances, that minister was truly deceived, and destitute of political foresight! It was said, that a large military force was necessary to restrain turbulent spirits from acts of disorder and outrage. But, let the house remember, that the late insurrection in the Isle of Ely was put down by a cornet of dragoons, a relative of the hon. member for Wiltshire, and the more recent disturbance in Spafields was suppressed by the exertions of a few civil officers. If the French revolution, with its desolating principles, were yet in operation —if the victories of 1814 and 1815 had not been gained—if the treaties of the noble lord (Castlereagh) had not been signed, then, indeed, he could understand the arguments of the secretary at war, in support of such an extensive military force. One would suppose there was still the fear of some convulsion. Indeed, from the round-about manner in which the noble lord (Castlereagh) had expressed himself as to a tranquillity not yet consolidated, it would seem that the advocates for the present establishment thought so. It was with regret that he saw in the great states of the continent a determination to uphold what the noble lord had so justly described—a great military monster. But with what consistency could Great Britain interpose to obtain its extinction, unless she herself first came forward to set the example? (Hear, hear, hear.) Considering that the reduction which the noble lord (Althorp) had proposed might be easily effected, without any danger to the public tranquillity, he should give his support to the motion.

The house then divided on the question, "that 113,640 men stand part of the bill."

These numbers were announced amidst loud cheerings from the opposition.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed, and to be read a third time on Monday next.

MUTINY ACT MISTAKE BILL.] This bill was considered in a committee, reported, and ordered to be read a third time on Monday.

MARINE MUTINY BILL.] This bill was considered in a committee, and ordered to be reported on Monday.

SCOTCH BURGHS.] Lord Castlereagh seeing a noble lord (Lord A. Hamilton) in his place, begged to inform him, that the Lord Advocate of Scotland had prepared a bill relative to the auditing of the accounts of the Royal Burghs, but, as he was anxious to have the opinion of the law authorities in Scotland, on its nature and probable operation, he could not hold out the hope of its being subjected to the consideration of parliament before the recess.

Lord A. Hamilton expressed his dissatisfaction, conceiving, that from what had fallen from the Lord Advocate on a former occasion, the measure ought now to be before parliament.

Sir J. Newport said, he could not avoid protesting against the principle, now for the first avowed, that those, whose province it was to execute the law, should have an initiatory judgment on a measure intended for the consideration of parliament. It was an invasion of the prerogative of one branch of the legislature. (Hear, hear.)

BANK TOKENS BILL.] This bill was considered in a committee, and ordered to be reported on Monday.

DISCOVERY OF THE LONGITUDE.] Mr. Croker, in rising to move for leave to bring in a bill "for more effectually discovering the Longitude at Sea, and encouraging attempts to find a Northern Passage between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, and to approach the Northern Pole," desired, in the first place, that the several acts relative to the Longitude, the Northern Passages, and the Greenland Fishery, should be entered as read. [This was accordingly done.] The hon. gentleman then said, that the acts which had been passed, from time to time, for appointing commissioners for the discovery of the longitude at sea, and for examining, trying, and judging all proposals, experiments, and improvements relating to the same, were so numerous, and, in many respects, so contradictory, that it was extremely difficult to know the real state of the law on that subject. Some of the provisions of those acts had been repealed, and others had expired; and, therefore, it had been deemed expedient, that the whole of them should be repealed, for the purpose of re-enacting and conferring upon new commissioners such of the powers, authorities, and duties, at present vested in the old commissioners, as were fit to be continued. The longitude had been ascertained within certain of the limits and conditions specified in the said acts, and certain other of the limits and conditions still subsisting were considered as impracticable, and had never been tried. It might therefore conduce to the advancement of science, and to the honour and interests of this country, that fit and proportionate rewards should be provided for persons who should ascertain the longitude within certain new limits and conditions. At the same time, it had been considered expedient, that such limits and conditions should not be immutably fixed by parliament, but should be regulated on scientific principles by the commissioners for the discovery of the longitude, and should be varied, from time to time, according to the progress of discoveries, and the advancement of science.—With the leave of the house, he would shortly state what had been already accomplished on this important and interesting subject. The early navigators had no other means of estimating their longitude than by the computed run of the ship. It was scarcely necessary to observe, that great dangers were incurred by that inaccurate method of calculation. The speculations of astronomers were of no practical utility in those times. In the 16th century, attention to eclipses of the moon was strongly recommended; but they happened very seldom, and were too inaccurately computed to be of any use. When Philip II. of Spain was laying the foundation, as he supposed, of the maritime glory of his nation, which was afterwards completely destroyed by British skill and prowess, he conceived it necessary to offer a large reward for the discovery of the longitude. The experiments of that time, however, were not attended with any success. In 1598, Philip III. of Spain offered 100,000 crowns; and the states of Holland, at the beginning of the 17th century, proposed a reward of 30,000 florins to the person who should be fortunate enough to solve this difficult and important problem. In 1635, John Morin, professor of mathematics at Paris, proposed a method of resolving it to cardinal Richelieu, extremely similar to the lunar method now in use; but it was rejected as of no practical utility: and indeed, at that period, the lunar tables were not sufficiently accurate, nor the nautical instruments sufficiently delicate, to render the lunar method very promising. However, though the commissioners, who were appointed to examine this method, judged it insufficient, on account of the imperfection of the lunar tables, cardinal Mazarin, in 1645, procured for him a pension of 2000 livres.—In 1675, King Charles II. erected the Observatory at Greenwich, and appointed Mr. Flamsteed his astronomical observer, desiring him to employ the whole of his time in rectifying the tables of the motions of the heavens, and the places of the fixed stars, in order to find out that great desideratum, the longitude at sea, for perfecting the art of navigation. Mr. Flamsteed executed his commission with great fidelity; and to his labours we were indebted for that curious theory of the moon, which was afterwards formed by the immortal Newton. That incomparable philosopher made the best use which human sagacity could make of the observations with which he was furnished; but, to use the words of the poet,

"So vast is art, so narrow human wit," the difference of Sir Isaac's theory from the heavens would sometimes amount at least to five minutes. Another great man, Dr. Halley, the learned Savilian professor of geometry at Oxford, also devoted much time to this subject. A starry zodiac was published under his direction, containing all the stars to which the moon's appulse could be observed: but, for want of proper instruments, and correct tables, he could not proceed in making the necessary observations. At last, in the year 1714, parliament began to consider this question as an object of national concern, in consequence of the loss of Sir Cloudesley Shovel's fleet, owing to a mis-reckoning during a tremendous gale of wind. That fatal event led to the enactment of a bill, which, with true munificence, provided rewards for the discovery of the longitude. That act, the 12th of Anne, c. 15. appointed certain commissioners, and empowered them to expend a sum not exceeding 2000*l.* towards making necessary experiments; and it also granted a reward to the person, who should discover the longitude at sea, proportioned to the degree of accuracy that might be attained: viz. a reward of 10,000*l.* if it determined the longitude to one degree of a great circle, or sixty geographical miles; 15,000*l.* if it determined the same to two-thirds of that distance; and 20,000*l.* if it determined it to half that distance. It also provided, that one moiety, or half part of such rewards should be due and paid when the said commissioners, or the major part of them, agreed that any such method extended to the security of ships, within eighty geographical miles from the shores, which are places of the greatest danger; and the other moiety, or half part, when a ship, by the appointment of the said commissioners, or the major part of them, should thereby actually sail over the ocean, from Great Britain to any such port in the West Indies as those commissioners, or the major part of them, should chuse or nominate for the experiment, without losing her longitude beyond the limits above mentioned*. In the year 1726, a very ingenious mechanic, of the

* The following document, signed by those well known persons, William Whiston and Humphrey Ditton, was one of the many petitions presented to the House of Commons on this occasion.

Reasons for a Bill, proposing a Reward for the Discovery of the Longitude.

I. This bill is unexceptionable, because it is general, and not confined to any one project, person, or method; but gives equal hopes to all judicious proposers whatsoever.

II. Because in this bill no money is insisted on, before any method for the discovery of the longitude is, upon trial, actually found practicable and useful.

III. Because Sir Isaac Newton's own paper, delivered into the committee, gives hopes that the known method by the theory of the moon, which is hitherto not exact enough, may, upon due encouragement, in time be brought to perfection.

IV. Because the method now proposed is owned by all, to whom it has been communicated, to be certainly true in theory: it cannot, therefore, be fit to have it concealed, even though it were not yet known to be practicable; because, in that case, future improvements might still make it so.

V. Because its great use at land and in geography is indisputable, and was distinctly observed by Sir Isaac Newton and Dr. Halley, upon the first proposal of this method to them: and we beg leave to say, that this use alone is so great and extensive, that if there were no other, it would highly deserve the encouragement of the public.

VI. Because another great use is also undoubted, viz. for all places in the narrow seas, and within about 100 miles of all shores and islands, that is, for all places where ships are in the greatest danger, as Sir Isaac Newton owned to the committee; so that if this method extended no farther, yet it would highly deserve the public encouragement.

VII. Because there is little or no reason to doubt of its use at any place at sea, even where ships are allowed to be in the least danger; since, in the most doubtful case of all, Sir Isaac Newton has, in his paper delivered to the committee, proposed an effectual remedy, as will be clearly understood, when the method itself is known to the world.

VIII. Because this method will save the nation great sums of money, which the want of it does now occasion, as will appear upon trial.

IX. Because the charges of it will be inconsiderable, in comparison of the advantage, as will also fully appear upon trial.

X. Because it will prevent the loss of abundance of ships and lives of men; as it would certainly have name of Harrison, made a time-keeper, which, Dr. Hutton asserts, did not err a second in a month for ten years together; but the first time that one was publicly tried, was in a voyage to Lisbon, in the year 1736, which answered his expectation, and corrected the dead reckoning about a degree and a half; in consequence of which, the board of longitude granted him a gratuity, and desired him to prosecute his labours*. In 1739, he finished a second piece more perfect than the first, and, in 1749, a third, which was pronounced more simple in its construction than either of the former. But his labours did not stop here: in 1761, his fourth piece was produced for trial, and Mr. William Harrison, his son, offered to take charge of it, in a voyage to and from Jamaica, which was accordingly performed in that and the following year. Mr. Robertson, master of the academy at Portsmouth, was fixed upon to take the rate of this piece, which he did, and, from his report, it appeared, that from November 6th, 1761, to April 2nd, 1762, though the piece had experienced many violent agitations at sea, and had been exposed to great changes of temperature, the whole error amounted to only 1*m*. 53*s*. 5, or 28½ of longitude on the equator, which quantity is not quite 18 nautical miles in the parallel of Portsmouth. Though various objections were made to this trial, principally arising from the observations by which the longitude of Portsmouth and Jamaica had been ascertained, yet, Mr. Harrison obtained a reward upon it, from parliament, of 5000*l*. and was ordered to make a second trial to Barbadoes. But previously to the second trial to the West Indies, the board of longitude, on the 17th of August, 1762, wished to place Harrison's piece in the hands of the astronomer royal, at that time Mr. Bliss, for trial at the observatory, which wish was not complied with, by reason of some alteration to be made: the same wish was repeated by the board, at their sitting, on the 4th of August of the year 1763, which was again not complied with by the younger Harrison, by reason of his not being yet sufficiently rewarded: however, on being desired to send the rate of going of his time-keeper, sealed up, to the secretary of the admiralty, previously to his sailing, he consented to that request, and proposed to abide by the sealed rate on the trial to Barbadoes, which had been proposed. On the 26th of March, 1764, Mr. W. Harrison sent the following declaration of the rate of going, or, more properly speaking, of the daily error of the time-keeper, to the board of longitude. "When the thermometer† is at 42°, it will gain 3 seconds in every 24 hours. When the thermometer is at 52°, it will gain 2 seconds in every 24 hours. When the thermometer is at 62°, it will gain 1 second in every 24 hours. When the thermometer is at 72°, it will neither gain nor lose. When the thermometer is at 82°, it will lose 1 second in every 24 hours." Mr. Harrison then added as follows. "Since my last voyage, we have made some improvement in the time-saved all Sir Cloudesley Shovel's fleet, had it then been put in practice.

XI. Because it is easy to be understood and practised by ordinary seamen, without the necessity of any puzzling calculations in astronomy.

And we take leave to recommend the learned Savilian professor of geometry at Oxford, Dr. Halley, as the fittest person in the world for the trial, and practice, and improvement of this method; and do hereby declare, that we are willing that he go equal shares with us in the reward, if he please to undertake so useful a work, and the public please to make that reward equivalent to the great dignity and importance of the discovery.

WILLIAM WHISTON.
HUMPHREY DITTON.

June 10, 1714.

* The first person who proposed to ascertain the relative longitude of any place or ship at sea, by means of an horological machine for indicating the time of the first meridian, was, as has been asserted, Gemma Frisius, about the year 1530; but the state in which horological machines was, at that time, prevented his accomplishing the design. Lord Kincardine tried a marine pendulum clock by Dr. Hooke in the year 1662; and Christian Huygens, the celebrated Dutch mathematician and mechanician, contrived a time-keeper, actuated by a spring, and regulated by a pendulum, which was tried at sea by major Holmes in 1664, and spoken of by him in favourable terms.—In 1720, the Academy of Sciences, at Paris, proposed the following question to be determined for a public reward: "What is the most perfect method of preserving on the sea the equable motion of a pendulum, either by the construction of the machine, or by the suspension?" A memoir written by Massy, a Dutch clock maker, obtained the prize, but he had not the satisfaction of seeing his plan executed. In 1724, Henry Sully, an English clock-maker, who had settled at Paris about eight years previously, presented the same Academy with a marine time-keeper, made in 1721, and published a description of it in French, by the title of "Description abregée d'une horloge de nouvelle invention pour la juste mesure du temps en mer." Besides the above, Sully made a second marine time-keeper, which was tried at sea in 1726, but the inventor died two years afterwards, a martyr to his horological studies, before he had brought his machines to that state of perfection which their object demanded. In 1747, the Academy of Sciences again proposed a reward: the subject was, "The best method of finding the hour at sea, whether by day, by twilight, or at night, when the horizon cannot be distinguished." The reward was obtained by Daniel Bernouilly, but the author's want of skill in mechanical operations prevented his labours from being attended with complete success.—In the meantime, Harrison, stimulated by the British parliamentary reward, devoted his labours to the subject, and he is now considered as the parent of modern chronometry.

†The thermometer was not invented till 1590, by the celebrated Sanctorio; nor was that valuable instrument reduced to a correct standard before the year 1724, by the skill of Fahrenheit.

keeper; in consequence of which, the provision to counterbalance the effects of heat and cold has been made anew; and for the want of a little more time, we could not get it quite adjusted; for which reason, the above allowances are necessary. This is its present state; and as the inequalities are so small, I will abide by the rate of its gaining, on a mean, one second a day for the voyage. I would not be understood, that it will always require so long time to bring those machines to perfection; for it is well known to be much harder to beat out a new road, than it is to follow that road when made. During the time of this experiment, the mean height of the thermometer shall be each day carefully noted down, and certified, which I will lay before the board at my return." On the 13th of February, 1764, Mr. Harrison went on board the Tartar, and proceeded to Portsmouth; and, on the 18th of July, he returned to England, when it was found, that the whole gain in the 156 days was only 54*s.* allowing the sealed rate, of one second per day, as a correction: and if the allowances had been moreover made for the state of the thermometer, as mentioned in the declaration, the piece in that case would have been found to have been about 15*s.* only at variance with mean time, and that in the opposite extreme. In consequence of this very satisfactory trial, Mr. Harrison had another 5,000*l.* ordered him, with a promise, that the residue of the parliamentary reward should be given him when a proper person could be found to execute his plan with equal success. Mr. Larcum Kendal undertook the task, and finished a time-piece on the same construction, or at least on the same principles, which was approved by Mr. Wales, in his voyage in company with captain Cook, in the years 1772, 1773, &c. and which performed even better than Harrison's, allowing for an acceleration in its rate. In consequence of this success, parliament ordered the residue of the reward to be paid; in addition to which, the East India company, and others, contributed a large sum of money.—The hon. gentleman then stated, that, in the reign of Geo. 2, an act was passed (26 Geo. 2, c. 25.) for rendering more effectual the act of Anne; and, in the present reign, (in the year 1774) an act was passed, offering separate rewards to any person who should invent a practical method of determining, within certain circumscribed limits, the longitude of a ship at sea: for a time-keeper the reward held forth to the public was 5,000*l.* for determining the longitude to or within one degree; 7,500*l.* for determining the same to forty geographical miles, and 10,000*l.* for a determination at or within half of a degree. This act, notwithstanding its abridged limits and diminished rewards, had produced several candidates, since Mr. Harrison, for parliamentary remuneration, of whom Mudge, the two Arnolds, and Earnshaw, had had their labours crowned with partial success.—Having thus shewn what had been effected by chronometers, the hon. gentleman begged to revert to the lunar method. From the very considerable improvements made by Sir Isaac Newton in the theory of the moon, and more lately by M. Euler, and others, on his principles, Mr. Mayer, professor of Gottingen, was enabled to calculate lunar tables more correct than any that had been previously published. Those tables, for which the widow of Mr. Mayer was rewarded by parliament with the sum of 3,000*l.*, were published in 1770, by Dr. Maskelyne, who, from observations made at Greenwich, found that the error scarce ever exceeded one minute at the most, and seldom amounted to twenty seconds; and, therefore, the uncertainty thence arising in the determination of the longitude, could scarcely exceed half a degree, and generally would not exceed ten miles. In order to facilitate their general use, that learned astronomer afterwards published a nautical ephemeris, by the help of which the calculations relating to the longitude, which before could not be performed by the most expert mathematician in less than four hours, might now be completed by an ordinary mariner in half an hour. He had now troubled the house at some length, on a subject which might not be deemed very interesting by some who had heard him, (hear, hear) but which certainly was very important to the honour and interests of the nation (hear, hear). He had stated, as concisely as the nature of the subject would permit, the progress which had been made in determining the longitude at sea, by the two only methods in use at present, the one by the means of a chronometer, the other by the lunar method, which had been gradually improved by the labour of succeeding astronomers, from the time it was first suggested by the immortal Newton. He had shewn, that the calculations had been brought so near the truth, that the longitude might be almost said to be discovered. It was possible, however, that some improvements might be yet made in mechanical instruments, and that the lunar method might be carried still nearer to perfection. What had been already done shewed the advantage of having an efficient board of longitude, and the great utility of offering rewards. By the act of Anne, persons holding certain public offices therein stated, for the time being, and certain other persons therein mentioned by name, were appointed commissioners for the discovery of the longitude; but all the persons mentioned by name in that act were long since dead, and, by reason of the residence at the Universities of certain professors who, by that and subsequent statutes, were constituted members of the board, and by there not being a power of electing into the board any persons but the said official commissioners and professors, it often happened that there were no persons, particularly versed in mathematics and astronomy, resident in London, belonging to the board. The first object of his bill, therefore, if the house should permit him to bring it in, would be to repeal all the former acts that had been passed on this subject, and to appoint new commissioners for discovering the longitude, and for rewarding persons who should make useful discoveries and improvements in navigation. And, in order that the objects of the board might be constantly attended to, he should propose, that, besides certain great officers of state, and others, there should be appointed, as commissioners, three persons well versed in mathematics, astronomy, or navigation, who should be generally resident in or near London, and capable of attending at the board. To each of these commissioners, he proposed, should be paid the sum of 100*l.* per annum, for their services and exertions.—The next object of the bill would be, to enable the commissioners to propose three scales of reward to persons who should make discoveries regarding the longitude, and also to pay rewards to persons who should make improvements in former inventions. And he should propose also, that the commissioners might be allowed to expend a certain sum annually in making experiments, and a like sum in ascertaining the latitude and longitude of places.—The next object would be, to make provision for constructing, printing, and publishing the Nautical Almanack. The Nautical Almanack, constructed by proper persons, was of great importance to the safety of ships and lives, and highly conducive to the general interests of commerce and navigation. It was, as he had before observed, projected by the late astronomer royal, Dr. Maskelyne, and during his life, it was a most accurate and useful publication. He was sorry to say, that it had not of late maintained that character. In the number for the present year there were no less than nineteen grave errors, and in the number for 1819, for it was published in anticipation, no less than forty—a circumstance highly discreditable to the scientific reputation of the country, and pregnant with the most dangerous consequences to navigators. In fact, he should not discharge his duty, or act in a way becoming of himself, if he did not state, that "The Nautical Almanack" was now a by-word among the literati of Europe. He would state a curious fact on this subject, which he had lately read in a daily paper. A captain of a vessel, bound to the West Indies, resolved, for the sake of curiosity, to try the tables on leaving Chatham. In a short time he found himself in a longitude, shewn by the tables, which he certainly thought could not be true; fortunately he made Portsmouth, and went to a vender of the almanacks, who told him, it was only a typographical error, and corrected it by a stroke of his pen, sending him out to the West Indies with the almanack and all its other mistakes. The truth was, the errors were typographical, not scientific. He mentioned this to exculpate the literary men connected with the work. They were professional men, having other important avocations; and it could not be expected that they could either make the computations, or examine them. The method pursued was this: the astronomer royal made the observations—he furnished them to persons called computers, who performed the operation imported by their name—and the computations then passed through the hands of an individual called a comparer. It was this last person who ought to be responsible for whatever imperfections might be found in the almanack. But he was a person not recognised by the acts—his office was not legally known. Hence it followed, that errors abounded in what ought to be especially, and above all other productions, void of error. It was absolutely necessary, therefore, that a proper person should be selected to superintend, under the directions of the board of longitude in general, and the astronomer royal in particular, the due and correct publication of the nautical almanack, and that he should be paid a moderate, but adequate salary for his trouble. And, inasmuch as it was necessary to continue the appointment of a secretary to the board of commissioners for discovering the longitude, he should propose, that the secretary to be appointed should be the person to superintend the publication of the almanack.—He came now to the only remaining object of his bill. It was known, that, for nearly a century past, the discovery of a Northern Passage between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, had been most anxiously desired by the scientific world, and more particularly by commercial men. It had been also considered a matter of great importance, both to commerce and science, that attempts should be made to approach the Northern Pole. Both of those points had engaged the attention of parliament. But the legislature had been most inconsistent on this subject; for, by one act, it had assigned a reward to the master or chief officer of any vessel, employed in the fisheries carried on in the Greenland seas and Davis's streights, which should discover a communication between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, or approach within one degree of the northern pole: and, by a subsequent act, it had required, that captains of whalers should take an oath, that, in the progress of their voyages, they had not been actuated by any other motive, or prospect of advantage, than the interests of their owners, namely, the catching of whales. This enactment was obviously at variance with the offer of a reward, and prevented it from being pursued or claimed. On a future day, therefore, he should move for leave to bring in a bill, to repeal so much of the last mentioned act as related to the oaths to be taken by the masters of such vessels.—But, with respect to the remaining object of the bill which he now proposed to introduce. By the 18 Geo. II. c. 17. intituled "an act for giving a public reward to such person or persons, being his majesty's subject or subjects, as shall discover a north-west passage through Hudson's streights to the western and southern oceans of America," a sum of 20,000*l.* was provided for the owner of any vessel which should first find out and sail through such passage; and the persons holding certain offices therein named, for the time being, appointed commissioners for the said discovery. By another act, the 16 Geo. III. c. 6. 'an act for giving a public reward to such person or persons, being his Majesty's subject or subjects, as shall discover a Northern Passage for vessels by sea between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, and also unto such as shall first approach by sea within one degree of the Northern Pole;" the reward in the former act was extended to the commander or commanders, officers and seamen, of any of his Majesty's ships or vessels, and to the owner or owners of any private ship or vessel which should find out and sail through any passage by sea between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, in any direction or parallel of the northern hemisphere to the north of the fifty-second degree of north latitude; and it further assigned a reward of 5000*l.* to the commander or commanders, officers and seamen, of any of his Majesty's ships or vessels, or the owner of any private ship or vessel, which should first approach within one degree of the northern pole. Now, he begged to observe, that many advantages, both to commerce and science, might be expected from granting such proportionate rewards as well to such persons as might accomplish the objects of the said two acts, as to such other persons as might approach thereto within certain limits or conditions; and it was expedient, that the regulation of such limits and conditions, and the decision, whether and how far such object might have been accomplished, should be confided to the commissioners for the discovery of the longitude at sea. It would be the object of his bill, therefore, to repeal the two last-mentioned acts, and to enact, first, that the person who should first find out and sail through any passage between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, in any direction or parallel of the northern hemisphere, should receive a reward of 20,000l. and secondly, that the person who should first approach within one degree of the northern pole, should be entitled to a reward of 5000*l.* And for the encouragement of persons who might attempt the said passage, or approach to the northern pole, but not wholly accomplish the same, he proposed further to enact, that the commissioners for discovering the longitude at sea might, by their memorial, propose to his Majesty in council to direct and establish proportionate rewards to be paid to the person who should first have accomplished certain proportions of the said passage or approach; and if his Majesty in council should be pleased to sanction and approve the said proposal, then, that the same should be published in the London Gazette; and any person or persons accomplishing such passages, or the specified proportions of them, should be entitled, on the award of the commissioners, to receive such total or proportionate sums as might have been offered for the object which he or they might have then accomplished. This, he conceived, would maintain the continuity of science, and act as a perpetual stimulus to discoveries. (Hear, hear.) He had now detailed the several objects of the bill which he intended, with the permission of the house, to introduce. He thanked them for the kind and patient attention with which they had listened to his long details, (hear, hear, hear,) and concluded with moving, that leave be given to bring in the bill.

Mr. D. Gilbert said, that after the very luminous explanation which the hon. gentleman had given respecting the objects of his bill, and the benefits which might be expected from it, he considered it unnecessary to detain the house by any observations of his own. He most heartily concurred in the motion, and thought it highly desirable that some measures should be taken for improving and perfecting time-keepers, and the construction of lunar tables. Nothing, he believed, had come nearer to perfection than the astronomical instruments now in use. With respect to the nautical almanack, he begged to inform the house, that the reputation which that work had acquired was owing to the unremitting care and attention of the Rev. Mr. Hitchins, a gentleman whose name had not been sufficiently known, nor his labours duly rewarded. Since his death, the publication had fallen into other hands, and was not so well conducted. Another clergyman, the Rev. Mr. Edwards, had greatly distinguished himself by his calculations on these subjects, in which his wife and daughter frequently assisted; but Mr. Edwards was now dead, and his widow and daughter had not met with that degree of attention which they deserved. In point of fact, they were no longer employed.

Mr. Brougham said, that he did not rise for the purpose of opposing this measure, but he wished to be informed, whether any difference of opinion had arisen among the members of the board of longitude? No one, he believed, would object to the salary of 100*l.* a-year for each of the additional members, if they were found to be necessary; but there was one point connected with that measure which deserved the most serious consideration—he meant the additional patronage which the appointment would confer on some persons.

Mr. Croker stated, that he had never heard of any disagreement in the board of longitude: such disagreement was, indeed, hardly probable, as there were only two or three meetings in a year, and they sat for a very few hours. He found by the act of Queen Anne that nine acting commissioners were appointed; but it was now proposed that there should be only six, of whom three only were to receive any salary. The patronage would be certainly very little felt, and learned men would look more to the honour, than to the emolument of the office. The salaries would be annually placed on the ordinary estimates of the navy, and be subject to the control and revision of parliament. (Hear.) It was because he was anxious that no imputations of a wish for paltry patronage should be cast on this measure, that he would at once state to the house, that appointments had been offered to Doctor William Hyde Wollaston, Doctor Thomas Young, and Captain Henry Kater. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Smyth said, he felt great satisfaction at the disposition which the house had shewn to listen with interest, not to plans of destruction, not to the false glories of war, but to subjects calculated to promote the powers and happiness of man. He wished, however, to make some inquiries into the plan proposed, and he did not see how a lord of the admiralty should necessarily be a judge of scientific merit. When it was admitted, that every thing in this department had hitherto gone on so well, why was it necessary to make any alteration? He feared that the present plan might only have the effect of increasing patronage to no purpose.

Mr. Wilberforce said, no person could possibly object to the three gentlemen who had been mentioned: their celebrity justly entitled them to hold the important situation for which they had been selected. If any vacancy should occur, by death, or resignation, he sincerely hoped that the lords of the admiralty would not appoint any persons to the office who were not well versed in mathematics, astronomy, or navigation. (Hear, hear.)

A short conversation followed, in which Mr. Forbes, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Mr Croker participated. Mr. Croker then stated, that it was intended to relieve the nautical almanack from the stamp duty, and to impose a penalty on any person who should print, publish, or vend the same, without being first licensed by the commissioners.

Leave was then given to bring in the bill.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, March 9.

RIGHT OF PETITIONING.] Earl Grosvenor presented the following petition of William Paul Rogers. "That the petitioner is a householder and shopkeeper, living in the parish of Saint Luke, Chelsea; that in the year 1814 he was appointed to the office of receiver of letters to the neighbourhood of Sloane-street, and that from the latter end of August 1814, until the 7th of July 1817, he held and discharged the duties of that situation without blame or imputation of blame from any individual whatsoever; that on the 7th of July last the petitioner received a letter from Mr. Johnson, comptroller of the two-penny post-office, requiring him to give up the stamps of his office, and to close his receiving box, and that after several ineffectual applications both to Mr. Johnson and the post-masters general for inquiring into his conduct, and information as to the nature of his offence, the said office was taken from him without explanation or redress; that although no motive or reason has been assigned to him for this stretch of authority, the petitioner imputes it to the part which he took in signing and forwarding two petitions for a redress of national grievances, and a reform in the commons house of parliament, in the months of June and July last, to the house of lords and the house of commons; and that he is justified in this imputation, not only by the obstructions and obloquy which the petitioner, in common with the other subscribers of the said petitions, experienced in the exercise of this their ancient and undoubted right, and by his removal from the said office of receiver of letters having immediately succeeded the presentment of the said petitions to the two houses of parliament, but also by the threats of the reverend Weeden Butler, alternate preacher at Brompton chapel, and at Charlotte chapel, Buckingham gate, who expressly told the petitioner that he knew many of his customers, and would do all in his power to deprive him of them, and that the post office should be taken away from a jacobin like him; wherefore the petitioner, feeling that the loss of reputation is the loss of bread to himself and his family, and fully sensible that their lordships never did, and never will sanction such oppression or persecution for political opinions, throws himself upon their protection, humbly and earnestly imploring, that their lordships will not suffer him to be condemned and punished unheard, but will institute such inquiry into his conduct as a servant of the public, and take such measures with respect to the facts alleged, as in the wisdom of their lordships shall seem best calculated, not only for the vindication of the character of the petitioner, but for the maintenance of public justice and public liberty, which are threatened by the obstructions and persecutions which have been opposed to the exercise of that fundamental right of Englishmen, the right of petition."

Ordered to lie upon the table.

CHIMNEY SWEEPERS.] On the motion of Lord Auckland, the chimney sweepers' regulation bill was ordered to be read a second time to-morrow, and the lords to be summoned.

The Marquis of Lansdown presented a petition in favour of the bill, from Wakefield, in Yorkshire.—Ordered to lie upon the table.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, March 9.

LEATHER TAX.] Petitions were presented of the tanners, curriers, manufacturers, and others, of Warrington; also of Halifax; also of the town of Bedford; also of Peterborough; also of Alnwick; also of the West of Scotland; also of the town of Northampton; also of Machynlleth; also of the borough of Carnarvon; also of New Malton, against the leather tax.—Ordered to lie on the table.

LUNATIC ASYLUMS (SCOTLAND.)] Mr. Boswell presented a petition of the magistrates and council of the royal burgh of Ayr, against the lunatic asylum bill.

Lord Binning said, that, in consequence of the communication which he had had with gentlemen who felt an interest respecting the bill, he should postpone the second reading, which stood for the 31st of March, to a later period. He wished to allow ample time for the consideration of the subject. The object of the bill was, not to confine mere idiots, but lunatics. The word fatuous which had been introduced into the bill, had given rise to the mistake, but he had no objection to adopt any other form of words that might express what he meant, namely, that asylums should be erected for the reception of insane paupers, whose freedom was dangerous to others, or mischievous to themselves, and who might be restored by care and attention. The bill was merely a municipal regulation: it did not introduce the principle of compulsory charity.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

BRITISH MUSEUM.] On the motion of Sir E. Brydges a return was ordered "of all sums of money granted by parliament during the last ten years in aid of the annual grant to the British Museum, for the purpose of buying any library of books, or collection of manuscripts; distinguishing the amount and date of each separate grant, and the name of the library or collection for which each sum was granted."

MUTINY BILL.] Lord Palmerston moved the third reading of this bill.

Mr. Wynn said, he wished to take that opportunity of correcting an error which he had made on a former occasion. In 1715, and 1724, the difference between the numbers mentioned in the mutiny act, and those for which the supply was granted, arose from the circumstance, that, in the mutiny bill, in the first case, the soldiers serving in the plantations, and in the latter, the marines, were omitted. He still thought, that as the numbers in the mutiny bill were a mere recital, the most regular way to reduce the number of troops would be, by rescinding the former vote, or by an address to the crown for a further reduction.

Lord Folkestone begged to ask the noble lord, whether he had made any inquiry respecting the Foreign General Officers, whose names were still kept in the Army List? (See page 631.)

Lord Palmerston said, the names of all officers who had reached a certain rank were kept in the army list, as a compliment, after they had left the service. It would not, on that account, be competent for his Majesty to employ the officers in question.

Sir M. Ridley alluded to the intended measure respecting widows' pensions, and said, he had received communications respecting the hardships which would be suffered, if it were carried into effect. Many lieutenants, and other officers, had sunk a great part of their incomes in insuring their lives, and it was extremely unjust that their widows should lose the benefit of the pensions, because an income had thus been purchased for them.

Mr. Calcraft said, he understood that several officers who had served in the German legion were receiving half-pay from this country, while they were receiving whole pay in Hanover. This was an advantage which our own officers were deprived of.

Lord Palmerston said, that, when the legion was disbanded, it was deemed necessary to have an army in Hanover. The officers who had served in the legion were the only officers of experience who could be procured: but their half-pay from this country was greater than their full pay would be in Hanover. It was, therefore, deemed necessary to allow them to retain their half-pay, to induce them to serve.

General Gascoigne said, the regulation respecting the widows' pensions was most impolitic, and if it were persisted in, he should bring forward a motion on the subject.

The bill was then read a third time and passed.

MUTINY ACT MISTAKE BILL.] This bill was read a third time, and passed.

MARINE MUTINY BILL.] This bill was reported, and ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

BANK TOKENS BILL.] This Bill was reported, and ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

LONGITUDE BILL.] Mr. Croker brought in his bill "for more effectually discovering the longitude at sea, and encouraging attempts to find a northern passage between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, and to approach the Northern Pole."—Read a first time.

SURGERY REGULATION BILL.] The second

dicted? (Here a pause of a few moments occurred.) He understood then, from the Attorney-General's manner, that Nadin, if indicted, could not plead this bill in bar of the prosecution. He hoped this public acknowledgment would go far to effect the end which the amendment had in view, but, at the same time, he could not receive this admission as a substitute for the clause. His belief was, that although ministers themselves had been guilty of no unnecessary cruelty, many gaolers and other underlings, from a want of sense or feeling, might have imagined that there was no surer way of recommending themselves to favour.

Lord Castlereagh contended, that, if unnecessary, the proposed clause must also be inconvenient. His hon. and learned friend the Attorney-General had laid down the law in the most decided and explicit terms, and the same doctrine had been maintained by a former Attorney-General (Lord Ellenborough) now at the head of the justice of the country. In prosecutions of the nature alluded to, the defendant might plead the general issue, and offer the indemnity act in evidence, so that the particular merits and circumstances of the case might be fully investigated. He apprehended there was no judge on the bench, who, if acts of inhumanity or excessive rigour were proved, would not state to the jury that the defendant was responsible. He must repeat, that it was dangerous to the principle of the bill to introduce too much qualification. Its object was fourfold—to indemnify for arresting and for detaining persons, as well as for seizing arms and papers; and a special proviso of this nature could only serve to give a latitude of construction to the act in cases which were within its scope or application.

Mr. Smyth declared that he was not satisfied with the explanation of the noble lord: he thought that the object and principle of the bill would be made clearer and less disputable by the adoption of the clause. The words of the bill were at present extremely general, and applied the indemnity to "all acts or proceedings" under the suspension act.

Mr. Bathurst observed, that in 1801 the same point had been mooted, but had been determined. The Attorney-General of that day, who was at present at the head of the court in which any actions for redress would be brought, had expressly declared his opinion, that the bill of indemnity would not protect acts of unnecessary rigour. Hon. gentlemen had chosen to let the bill pass through the committee without stating their objections; and now they wanted to make it a totally new measure. Before he sat down, he wished to say a few words respecting a right hon. friend of his, who had just left the house (Mr. Canning), who had been censured for treating with levity a subject of a serious nature. But what were the circumstances to which his right hon. friend had adverted? One, that the individual in question had had for twenty years the disorder which it was said had been brought on by the duress he had sustained; the other, that [illegible] it to London, he was placed within the reach of abler professional assistance than he could receive in the country; and that, by means of that assistance, he returned home totally cured, and as he himself expressed it "a new man."

Mr. Lyttelton observed, that the recent allusions in the speech of a right hon. gentleman to the case of the petitioner, Ogden, violated every rule of decency and public decorum. Not to dwell, however, on so disgusting a subject, he thought this question an extremely fair test of the sincerity of those who introduced the measure under consideration. The proposed amendment was extremely simple, and could only operate to render the principle of the bill more plain and indubitable. Why should it not be generally understood, that, if cruelty or oppression had been exercised under the powers of the late unhappy suspension act, the authors of it were liable to be brought to condign punishment? In answer to the observation of the right hon. gentleman, that any objections to the bill ought to have been brought forward in the committee, he had merely to say, that the bill had been pressed through its various stages with extreme and indecent haste. For his own part, business of great importance had detained him for some days in the country from his parliamentary duties, and, on his return, he found that the bill had been most rapidly advancing. Other members were probably in the same predicament; and now that an opportunity offered for making the observations which occurred to them, their mouths, forsooth, were to be closed! If the bill came out of the committee radically erroneous, the present was the time to correct it. It was not the opinion of an Attorney-General, given in the house of commons, that could determine the point. The judge must look at the letter of the law, and unless the house chose to submit their understandings to the quibbles and glosses of lawyers, and especially of crown lawyers in the pay of the crown, they would take care that that letter should be perfectly explicit. The object of the bill was to nullify the ordinary law—to legalise that which was illegal. He contended, that it would prevent any one of the acts in question from being made the subject of judicial inquiry, so that the parties aggrieved might have redress. The right hon. gentleman had indeed said, that the Attorney-General of 1801, who had expressed his opinion that the indemnity bill would not defeat any action for acts of unnecessary severity, was now Lord Chief Justice of the Court of King's Bench. In the first place, however, the actions for redress might not come before that noble and learned lord; and, in the second place, if they did, taking the present bill in his hand, he, from the light of experience, or from other causes, might not retain the sentiments that he entertained when Attorney-General. The noble lord talked of the hon. and learned gentleman having "laid down the law." The gentlemen opposite had been so long in the habit of finding that what they said was law, in the common acceptation of the phrase, that they began to fancy that every thing they "laid down" was really "law." Things were, however, not quite come to that pass. Until he found that their opinions were in fact law, he could not be brought to change his sentiments on the present question. Reverting to the whole of the transactions—the reports of the committees—the suspension of the habeas corpus—and this indemnity bill, he characterised them as forming one of the most impertinent but at the same time one of the most mischievous farces that had ever been played on the political stage, and as exhibiting still greater inconsistencies than any former proceedings of the present ministers, fraught as those proceedings had ever been with the grossest inconsistencies.

Sir S. Romilly said, he was surprised to hear the line of argument which had been pursued by gentlemen on the other side. Were there any technical words in this clause which a lawyer could understand better than any other man? Here were plain words which every man could comprehend. This act said, that all actions brought for or on account of any act, matter, or thing, should be discharged and made void; and that every person by whom any such act, matter, or thing should have been done, should be freed, acquitted, discharged, and indemnified. Now, they were told, that this act did not mean what it said. It was stated, that it went only to all necessary acts. But if this was the intention of the gentlemen who framed it, why did they not say so? The bill declared, that all acts whatever should be indemnified. What, then, was to become of the cases of those who had been treated with improper severity and cruelty? The petitioner, Ogden, whose sufferings had been treated with so much levity and want of feeling, (hear, hear) declared, that the infirmity under which he laboured was produced by the weight of fetters. Was this, then, a necessary act? Did this come within the meaning of the bill? If so, the words of this legislative measure had a different meaning in that house from what they had in any other place. He declared, that this was not the construction which could be put upon this act of parliament. The right hon. gentleman who talked about the Attorney-General of 1801 said, that his opinion could not fail to have very great weight; but was not that opinion given when he was Attorney-General, and urged in support of ministers in the house of commons? (Hear, hear.) The opinion of an Attorney-General was not law: nay, the opinion of a single judge was not law: the opinion of a judge at his chambers, or at Nisi Prius, might be, and often was, over-ruled: and were they now to be told, that because the person who formerly held the situation which his hon. and learned friend (the Attorney-General) now filled, had delivered such an opinion, it must be taken to be the law of the land? (Hear, hear.) He would never submit to such doctrines. He knew full well the importance which ought to be attached to the opinions of his Majesty's Attorney-General in that house. But it seemed, that because gentlemen on his side did not think proper to propose this amendment in a committee; because they were not present at any moment when his Majesty's ministers might command; (hear, hear) because it was judged expedient to the government that this bill should be passed with the utmost precipitation; therefore, it was not proper that this question should be discussed now. If this argument were to be allowed, in what manner could they justify themselves to their constituents—in what way could they hope to excuse themselves to the country—in what words could they reply to those persons who were suffering from the severities which had been so wantonly inflicted upon them? (Hear.) If his hon. and learned friend, if the noble lord opposite and his colleagues, contended that the words in question meant only necessary acts, why did they refuse to add the word necessary in that clause? He would once more say, that this act of parliament, to be considered in the way which gentlemen asserted, required the amendment which had been proposed.

The Solicitor-General said, that his learned friend had declared, that it was proper to insert the word "necessary," but his argument seemed to imply that it should be "unnecessary." Now, in his conscientious opinion, as the bill stood at present, no lawyer could contend, with any prospect of success, that an unnecessary act done for the purpose of apprehending, or detaining, was protected by it. The "acts, matters, or things," must obviously be necessary; for, if not necessary, they could not be done for apprehending, committing, or detaining. An act of severity or cruelty must have some other object, and could not be protected by the bill. He could not help thinking, therefore, that the word "necessary" was implied in the present bill as it had been implied in all other bills so framed. In 1801, lawyers on the opposite side of the house, as distinguished as any that ever sat in parliament, were perfectly satisfied that such was the legal interpretation of the indemnity bill of that day. If this was the case, it would be pernicious to introduce a clause, or a superfluous word, the only effect of which might be to raise a doubt where no doubt at present existed; and to stimulate to proceedings that might prove highly injurious to the parties instituting them.

Mr. Brougham thought, that when the house saw there was as complete a difference of opinion between the two hon. and learned gentlemen on the construction of the clause in question, as aye and no—when they heard his hon. and learned friend say, that he conscientiously entertained no doubt that the legal construction of the clause was in one way, and the Solicitor-general, backed by the Attorney-general, that he conscientiously entertained no doubt that it was in another, they would scarcely leave the words of it in so vague and undefined a form. What was the Solicitor-general's argument? That there could be no difference of opinion on the clause. But there actually was a difference of opinion on it. Why not, then, insert the explanatory word recommended by his hon. and learned friend? The Solicitor-general was alarmed at the idea of tautology and surplusage. How long was it since the house, in framing their statutes, had become so attached to conciseness? It was only, he believed, since this act of parliament had been introduced; and certainly, it furnished abundant proofs that those who framed it had paid particular attention to brevity of expression. In the preamble, for instance, it was stated, that "divers persons had tumultuously, unlawfully, and in a disorderly manner assembled to disturb the public peace." Now, an ordinary man would have thought these words sufficient: but, no; after the word "peace," were added, the words "and tranquillity." Again, "to cause terror in the minds of his Majesty's loyal and peaceable subjects," might have been supposed sufficiently intelligible; but no; the framers of this bill, in their love of precision, expressed it—to cause terror "and intimidation." When an author once got into a particular style, he followed it throughout; and therefore, the framers of this bill, in addition to the word "act" very properly inserted "matter or thing;" and not satisfied with the word "intents," placed after it "and purposes." He remembered that lord Kenyon had once called the composition of an auctioneer his "penmanship," for he did not think that it deserved the appellation of "style." Now, according to the penmanship of the framers of this act, it appeared, that they were not content that the information which the government had received should "remain secret," but it must be also "undisclosed." (Loud laughter.) But here stopped their love of conciseness; for, when a word was proposed to be added, which was considered substantially necessary, they turned round and said, "No, it cannot be admitted, it is surplusage, and would be superfluous:" (hear, hear) but as his hon. and learned friends themselves had introduced so many unnecessary words, he should wish to follow their example, by putting in one word which they might think unnecessary, but which he considered indispensable. He could not help thinking, that if a single word were to be introduced and surely they could not object to the expense of engrossing a single word, the whole doubt which existed on the construction of this clause would be removed. It would be but a slight deviation from the classical style of drawing acts of parliament, now so much insisted on, and was it too much to ask, that they should make that clear which the courts were required to follow? The right hon. gentleman (Mr. Bathurst) and his hon. and learned friend, the Solicitor-general, had adverted to the opinion of lord Ellenborough, given in that house when he was Attorney-general. Did his hon. and learned friend go so far as to state, that the opinion of the lord chief justice of the King's Bench, when he was Attorney-general in that house, was now to be recognized on the bench? What use, he would ask, could be made of that opinion out of that house? He should like to hear his hon. and learned friend tell the chief justice, that this opinion was to bind him in the court where he sat, because he had delivered the same opinion on a former occasion. The chief justice would then ask, "In what volume of East's Reports is that opinion to be found?" To which question his hon. and learned friend would be obliged to answer, "It is not contained in any volume of East, but is inserted in Cobbett's Parliamentary Debates." "In Cobbett's Parliamentary Debates," the chief justice would say, "what authority in this court are Cobbett's Parliamentary Debates?" He thought this clause was exceedingly liable to the construction which had been put upon it by his side of the house. The question was, whether putting chains on a man was necessary for the purpose of detaining him, or whether the chains were not so wide of the purpose, that they were not necessary? If the hon. and learned gentlemen on the opposite side were sincere; if they did not mean to justify, and to indemnify, all acts of persecution and cruelty, they could have no objection to add the word "necessary," particularly in an act which was not drawn with all the conciseness of which they boasted, and which they might have employed on the occasion. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. W. Wynn thought that a clause, such as that proposed by the right hon. baronet, might throw a doubt on other acts of the same description, though not on this. There could, however, be no inconvenience in inserting the word "necessary." It was the more requisite, because there was not one decision on acts of this nature. In the case of a justice of peace who had gone beyond his authority, and had done unnecessary acts, he would ask, if it had ever been held that he was not as much entitled to notice of action, as one who was proceeded against after having acted properly? If so, the word "necessary" was by no means superfluous in the present case.

Sir J. Newport then withdrew his amendment.

Sir W. Burroughs, after reminding the house that the enacting clause proposed an indemnity for any acts whatever done under the suspension, proposed a clause to prevent its including cases where those acts were done maliciously and without probable cause. This clause differed from that proposed by his right hon. friend, as it was not confined to gaolers, but extended to malicious informations, and malicious acts done by magistrates, or police officers. He agreed, that where a magistrate made a slip, not malo animo, he ought to be protected, as he was by the 24th of George II. which entitled him to one month's notice of action, and limited the time of proceeding against him to six months; but, if he acted maliciously, he ought not to be protected, and that was the case which his clause was intended to meet.

The Attorney-General contended that this clause would defeat the whole object of the bill. Upon what principle was the bill founded? It was founded on the presumption that the acts for which indemnity was provided were done for the public safety, and that the persons to be indemnified had acted honestly, fairly, and bona fide, and therefore they ought to be freed from the necessity of producing in a court of justice the evidence on which they acted, as the production of such evidence would be attended with danger. And yet the hon. baronet proposed a clause which would have the effect of forcing them to lay all the evidence on which they acted before courts of justice; for how could a magistrate, or secretary of state, make out or rebut an allegation of malice, or having acted without probable grounds, without disclosing all the circumstances on which he acted? (Hear, hear.) If the house wished to reject the bill, in the name of heaven, let it be rejected; but let them not pass the bill, and adopt at the same time a clause which was contrary to the principle of it, and would completely undermine it.

The clause was negatived.

Sir W. Burroughs rose to propose as an amendment, that, after that part of the preamble, "And whereas, in case the acts and proceedings of the several persons concerned or employed in such apprehending, committing, imprisoning and detaining in custody, and dispersing, and seizing, and searching, as aforesaid, should be called in question, it may be impossible for them to justify or defend the same," the words immediately following be left out—"without an open disclosure of the information given, and the means by which the said traitorous designs and unlawful purposes were discovered; and it is necessary, for the safety and protection of the persons by whose information and means the same have been discovered, and for the future prevention of similar practices, that such information and means should remain secret and undisclosed."—Such a recital was not to be found in any of the bills of indemnity that had been passed since the revolution, with the exception of that in 1801. That bill, however, was founded on a particular case—on the dangers to be apprehended by persons who had given information of a treasonable correspondence carried on with the government of France, and who were then in the power of the enemy. No dangers of that kind were now to be apprehended: it had been declared from the throne, and was repeated in the reports of both houses, that the great mass of the people had continued loyal. He, therefore, moved, to omit those words in the preamble, which stated the necessity of concealing the sources from which the information had been derived that led to the discovery of traitorous designs.

Sir F. Flood expressed his astonishment that any attempts should be made to clog a bill that had been passed by great majorities in the House of Lords. (Cries of order.) He thought that the hon. gentlemen opposite might be perfectly satisfied with the great majorities that had voted for the bill in that house, in every stage. But he found, that nothing would satisfy them but long declamatory speeches, made ad captandum vulgus, to please their constituents before a general election, but which were not approved of by a great majority of that house, or by the great majority of the people out of doors. The bill was founded on necessity. It was founded on a report made by the first characters of the country, one of which was the noble secretary of state for the foreign department, whom he was proud to call his countryman.

The amendment was negatived.

Sir J. Newport moved an amendment, providing, that payment should be made from the public revenue of such damages and costs as should be awarded to any aggrieved person in a court of justice. This principle was recognized in the case of vessels captured illegally, when costs and damages were awarded against the captors, if it appeared that they had acted with a view to the advancement of the public service. In such case, the costs and damages were allowed out of the droits of admiralty. Why should not the public pay the price of its own safety? Anxious as he always was for public economy, he should never look for it at the expense of a dereliction of duty—he should not attempt to rob individuals, or avoid throwing on the public purse, instead of throwing on individuals, what was necessary for the public safety.

The Attorney-General said, the object of the bill was, to prevent the necessity of laying the evidence on which magistrates, or others, had acted, before a jury; and yet this clause was to make the public pay damages and costs. Damages could only be given after a discussion of all the facts and circumstances before a jury; because it would not be contended, that any damages which any body could guess at should be paid out of the public coffers of the state. They could not adopt this clause without making the preamble a complete collection of unintelligible nonsense.

Sir J. Newport said, that, when he proposed this clause, he was aware that it would render other alterations necessary, both in the preamble and in the enactments, and justice required that such alterations should be made.

Mr. W. Smith supported the amendment. The law presumed that every man was innocent until he was proved to be guilty. Those persons, therefore, who had been arrested and confined, but had not been brought to trial, should not be debarred from seeking the redress to which they were entitled. A door ought to be left open to all who had not been tried, to recover damages for the hardships and losses which they had suffered from their apprehension and detention.

The amendment was put, and negatived without a division.

Sir W. Burroughs then rose and observed, that the bill went to indemnify "any person or persons" who had entered into houses to search for papers or arms. Now, it was probable, that unauthorised persons, persons in no public character, might have broken into houses for the pretended purpose of searching for papers and arms, and was any ruffian, any spy, for instance, to be protected, who might have violated the law in this manner? It would be highly improper and unconstitutional to grant an indemnity to such persons; and, therefore, he should move that the words "any person or persons" be left out, and that there be inserted instead thereof, "any secretary of state, any member of his Majesty's most honourable privy council, any justice of peace, any mayor, bailiff, or other magistrate of a corporation, any peace officer, or constable."

The Attorney-General contended, that this amendment was unnecessary, as the words of the bill, standing in their present connexion, could not be misunderstood. They were too definite to cover unauthorized persons, and besides, they went only to protect those who had searched for the arms or papers of persons who were in custody on charges of treason, or treasonable practices, or who had been afterwards arrested and detained on such charges. They did not go to protect those who had entered into houses under other circumstances.

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. Brougham moved, that after the words "for or on account of any act, matter, or thing, by him or them done or commanded, ordered, directed, or advised to be done since the 26th day of January, 1817," there be added the words "which may have been necessary."

The Attorney-General objected to this amendment as superfluous. By the proper interpretation of the bill, and of every statute similarly worded, the protection afforded was understood only to extend to such acts as were necessary for accomplishing the objects in view. A magistrate was supposed to commit no act of rigour which was not called for in execution of the duty imposed upon him. To adopt the amendment, therefore, would be introducing useless words; but this would not be the only evil. The adoption of the amendment would excite doubts as to the enactment of other statutes where similar words were omitted. All laws regarding the conduct of magistrates supposed they were liable to damages for excess of rigour in executing their duty; but, from the first to the last statute in the statute book, the words "acts which may be necessary," had not been introduced.

Mr. Tierney said, that the hon. and learned gentleman who opposed the amendment on the common principles of law, ought to have remembered, that the present bill was a violation of law, and, therefore, that it ought not to be tried by such a test. He was of opinion, that the language of the bill should be rendered as precise and as guarded as possible, and he put it to the house, whether he was asking too much, when he requested them not to object to the insertion of three or four words, not limiting the indemnity claimed by ministers, but defining the extent to which the law of the country had been set at nought?

Mr. Lockhart opposed the amendment. After the explanation of the hon. and learned gentleman opposite, (the Attorney-general) he considered it to be quite unnecessary.

Mr. Wynn said, that he did not consider the amendment necessary, but he should not oppose it, as it would not affect the objects of the bill.

The house then divided on the question, "that these words be inserted."

Ayes	. . .	39
Noes	. .	149

Mr. Speaker then put the question "That this bill do now pass."

Mr. Brougham said, he did not wish to provoke any discussion in the present stage of the measure, but he was anxious to protest on his own part, and on the part of his hon. friends, against its being imagined that they had less objection to the passing of the bill, either in consequence of the arguments which had been urged in support of it, or from the circumstance of their having attempted to qualify it by amendments. He and they were as desirous at that moment as before to avow their hostility to the whole detestable principle upon which the bill was founded. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Tierney said, it was his intention, on a former night, to have delivered his opinions on the subject; but he had abandoned that intention from a conviction that it was quite unnecessary after the speeches of his hon. friend who had just quitted his place (Sir S. Romilly), and his hon. friend who had just sat down. He should avail himself, however, of the present opportunity to declare, that he believed this to be one of the most detestable measures that ever was introduced into parliament.

Mr. Wynn said, he did not intend to detain the house: he should merely state, therefore, that, in his opinion, the measure was absolutely necessary.

Mr. P. Moore said, that he entertained a very different opinion: he considered it to be a measure of great injustice.

The bill was then passed.—It was in these words.

"An act for indemnifying persons who, since the 26th day of January 1817, have acted in apprehending, imprisoning, or detaining in custody, persons suspected of high treason or treasonable practices, and in the suppression of tumultuous and unlawful assemblies."

Whereas a traitorous conspiracy was formed in Great Britain for the purpose of overthrowing, by means of a general insurrection, the established government, laws, and constitution of this kingdom: and whereas divers persons have tumultuously, unlawfully, and in a disorderly manner assembled together in Great Britain, under pretence or for the purpose of proceeding to London in such numbers, as greatly to disturb and endanger the public peace and tranquillity, and to cause terror and intimidation in the minds of his Majesty's loyal and peaceable subjects: And whereas in order to secure the internal peace and tranquility of the country, and to counteract such traitorous conspiracy, it has been deemed necessary, since the 26th day of January, 1817, from time to time to apprehend, commit, imprison, and detain in custody divers persons suspected of high treason or treasonable practices, and to seize the papers of divers of such persons, and also to disperse the persons so tumultuously, unlawfully, and in a disorderly manner assembled together as aforesaid, and to apprehend, commit, and detain in custody divers of such last-mentioned persons, and to search the houses of divers persons for arms and other offensive weapons concealed or suspected to be concealed therein: And whereas in case the acts and proceedings of the several persons concerned or employed in such apprehending, committing, imprisoning, and detaining in custody, and dispersing and seizing and searching as aforesaid should be called in question, it may be impossible for them to justify or defend the same without an open disclosure of the information given, and the means by which the said traitorous designs and unlawful purposes were discovered; and it is necessary for the safety and protection of the persons by whose information and means the same have been discovered, and for the future prevention of similar practices, that such information and means should remain secret and undisclosed: And whereas some of the said acts done may not have been strictly justifiable in law, but being done for the preservation of the public peace and safety, it is fit that the persons doing the same should be saved harmless in respect thereof; be it therefore enacted by the King's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That all personal actions, suits, indictments, and prosecutions, heretofore brought, commenced, preferred, or exhibited, or now depending, or to be hereafter brought, commenced, preferred, or exhibited, and all judgments thereupon obtained, if any such there be or shall be, and all proceedings whatsoever against any person or persons for or on account of any act, matter, or thing by him or them done, or commanded, ordered, directed, or advised to be done, since the 26th day of January, 1817, for apprehending, committing, imprisoning, detaining in custody, or discharging any person or persons who hath or have been imprisoned or detained in custody for high treason or suspicion of high treason, or treasonable practices, not relating to coin or for apprehending, committing, imprisoning, or detaining in custody any person or persons who have been imprisoned or detained in custody for having been so tumultuously, unlawfully, and in a disorderly manner assembled as aforesaid, or for dispersing any persons so assembled as aforesaid, or for seizing the papers of any such person or persons, or for searching houses for arms and other offensive weapons as aforesaid, shall be discharged and made void and that every person by whom any such act, matter or thing shall have been done, or commanded, ordered, directed, or advised to be done, shall be freed, acquitted, discharged, and indemnified, as well against the King's Majesty, his heirs and successors, as against the person and persons so apprehended, committed, imprisoned, or detained in custody, discharged, or dispersed, and all and every other person and persons whomsoever.

II. And be it further enacted, That if any action or suit hath been or shall be brought, commenced, or had in any court of that part of the united kingdom called England, against any person or persons for or on account of any such act, matter, or thing as aforesaid, he and they may plead the general issue, and give this act and the special matter in evidence; and if the plaintiff or plaintiffs shall become nonsuit, or forbear further prosecution, or suffer discontinuance in any such action or suit, or if a verdict shall pass against the plaintiff or plaintiffs therein, the defendant or defendants shall have and be entitled to double costs, for which he or they shall have the like remedy as in other cases in which costs by law are given to defendants; and if any such action or suit hath been or shall be brought, commenced, or had in any court within that part of Great Britain called Scotland, the court before whom or in which such action or suit shall be brought, commenced, or had, or shall be depending, shall allow to the defender or defenders therein the benefit of the discharge and indemnity hereinbefore provided, and shall further discern the pursuer or pursuers to pay the defender or defenders the full and real expenses which he or they shall be put to by such action or suit: Provided always, that in such cases in which any such action or suit shall have been commenced before the 27th day of February now last past, and in which the plaintiff or plaintiffs, pursuer or pursuers, shall not have continued since the 27th day of February, or shall not hereafter continue the proceedings in any such action or suit, such plaintiff or plaintiffs, pursuer or pursuers, shall not be liable to any costs or expences.

III. And be it further enacted, that if any action, suit, indictment, information, prosecution, or proceeding hath been or shall be brought, commenced, preferred, exhibited, or had in any court against any person or persons for or on account of any such act, matter, or thing as aforesaid, it shall be lawful for the defendant or defendants, defender or defenders, in any such action, suit, indictment, information, prosecution, or proceeding, or for any of them, to apply by motion, petition, or otherwise, in a summary way, to the court in which the same hath been or shall be brought, commenced, preferred, exhibited, or had, or shall be depending, if such court shall be sitting, and if not sitting, then to any one of the judges or justices of such court, to stay all further proceedings in such action, suit, indictment, information, prosecution, or proceeding; and such court, and any judge or justice thereof when the said court shall not be sitting, is hereby authorized and required to examine the matter of such application; and upon proof by the oath or affidavit of the person or persons making such application, or any of them, or other proof to the satisfaction of such court, judge, or justice, that such action, suit, indictment, information, prosecution, or proceeding is brought, commenced, preferred, exhibited, or had for or on account of any such act, matter, or thing as aforesaid, to make an order for staying execution and all other proceedings in such action, suit, indictment, information, prosecution, or proceeding, in whatever state the same shall or may then be; and the court or the judge or justice making such order for stay of proceedings in any action or suit as aforesaid, shall also order unto the defendant or defendants, defender or defenders, and he or they shall have and be entitled to double costs for all such proceeding as shall be had or carried on in any such action or suit after the passing of this act, and for which costs he and they shall have the like remedy as in cases where costs are by law given to defendants or defenders: Provided always, that it shall be lawful for any person or persons, being a party or parties to any such action, suit, indictment, information, prosecution, or other proceeding, to apply by motion, petition, or otherwise, in a summary way, to the court in which the same shall have been brought, commenced, preferred, exhibited, or had, or shall be depending, to vacate, discharge, or set aside any order made by any judge or justice of that court for staying proceedings, or for payment of costs as aforesaid, so as such application be made within the first four days on which such court shall sit next after the making of any such order by any judge or justice as aforesaid; and such court is hereby required to examine the matter of such application, and to make such order therein as if the application had been originally made to the said court, but nevertheless in the mean time, and until such application shall be made to the said court, and unless the said court shall think fit to vacate, discharge, set aside, or reverse the order made by any such judge or justice as aforesaid, the same shall continue in full force to all intents and purposes whatsoever.

IV. Provided also, and be it enacted by the authority aforesaid, that if any action or suit hath been or shall be brought, commenced, or had in any court in that part of the united kingdom called Ireland, for, or by reason, or on account of apprehending, committing, imprisoning, detaining in custody, or discharging out of custody any person or persons in Ireland who have or hath been charged with high treason, or suspicion of high treason, or treasonable practices, committed or carried on, or alleged to have been committed or carried on in Great Britain, any person or persons against whom any such action or suit hath been or shall be brought, commenced, or had, may plead the general issue, and give in evidence this act and the special matter, and shall be entitled to double costs in like cases in which any defendant or defendants sued in Great Britain is or are hereby declared to be entitled to double costs, and shall have the like remedies for the same; and the court in Ireland in which such action or suit hath been or shall be commenced whilst sitting, and the respective judges thereof whilst the court is not sitting, are and is hereby empowered, authorized, and required, upon applications made for that purpose in a summary way by any defendant or defendants, to examine the matter of such applications, and thereupon to make orders as to staying execution and other proceedings, and as to double costs, in such and the like manner as is hereinbefore enacted and provided with respect to applications made to any court or judge in England, and with such and the like power to the courts when sitting to vacate, discharge, or set aside any orders made by any judge of such court when the said court was not sitting.

V. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that all and every person and persons discharged out of custody as aforesaid, although he shall not have been discharged according to law, shall be deemed and taken to have been legally discharged out of custody.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, March 16.

INDEMNITY BILL.] This bill was brought from the commons by Mr. Brogden and other members without any amendments.

GREENLAND FISHERY OATHS BILL.] This bill was brought from the commons, and read a first time.

MARINE MUTINY BILL.] This bill was read a third time and passed.

The Marquis of Downshire moved that a copy of a circular letter addressed to the clergy and churchwardens of the different parishes in Ireland, on the subject of the window-tax, be laid before the house.—Ordered.

The noble marquis then stated, that he had in his hand two petitions against the window tax, one from the inhabitants of Dublin assembled in parishes, the other from the town of Belfast. The tax for the repeal of which these petitions prayed had been imposed before the union took place. It was proposed by Mr. Corry, who was chancellor of the exchequer for Ireland at the time the act was passed, as a tax to be continued merely for a limited period. He stated, that it was asked for merely as a war-tax, which would be allowed to expire on the restoration of peace. Accordingly it had been renewed by the Irish parliament, and continued from year to year by the united parliament. The people of Ireland considered the prolongation of the burden a grievance, and several meetings had been held in different parts of the country to petition against it, and the letter for which he had moved was connected with the proceedings which had taken place on this subject. It was proposed, that a commutation should by offered by the parishes, but many objections were urged against such a measure, chiefly on the ground that it would be giving the parishes a sort of legislative authority. He had attended many of the meetings which had been held against the tax; and he could assure their lordships, that all of them which he had witnessed had been conducted with the greatest decorum and regularity. The unanimous opinion of all these meetings was, that, in consequence of the manner in which the tax originated, it having been avowedly enacted for a limited time, it ought to be wholly or partially repealed. The tax, it ought to be recollected, had been greatly increased since it was first imposed; for, at one time, an addition of 50, at another time, of 25 per cent. had been made; still it had always been regarded as a war-tax. The petitions he had to present went the length of praying for a total repeal: whether their lordships would think that advisable or not, would be matter for future consideration; all he could, in the meantime, as a member of that house, do, was to bring the subject before them.—The petitions were then read and laid on the table.

PERSONS ARRESTED FOR TREASON.] The Earl of Shaftesbury laid on the table an account of the number of persons arrested under the operation of the habeas corpus suspension act, since the 1st of January, 1817. On the motion of Lord Holland this paper was ordered to be printed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, March 16.

ELECTION OF CORONERS BILL.] This bill was read a second time.

INDEMNITY BILL.] A petition of inhabitants of King's Lynn, against this bill, was presented, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Brogden and other members were ordered to attend the house of lords with the bill agreed to.

Mr. Alderman Wood presented the following petition of Thomas Preston, which was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.—"That the petitioner was, on the 4th day of December 1816, on a charge of rioting, taken before the right hon. Matthew Wood, then lord mayor of the city of London, who was satisfied that the charge was groundless; that whilst the petitioner was undergoing a long examination at the Mansion House, John Castles, an informer of universal notoriety, went to the petitioner's residence at No. 9, Greystoke Place, Fetter Lane, and falsely represented to Charlotte Preston, the petitioner's daughter, that he the said Castles was authorized by the petitioner to remove his household furniture to a place of greater safety, in order (as the said Castles pretended) to prevent the same being seized by officers who were about to convey it away; that the petitioner was thus, by the false representations of the aforesaid Castles, plundered of his furniture, books, wearing apparel, &c.; and the petitioner further most humbly sheweth, that after he was acquitted of the aforesaid charge, and was, on the evening of the same day, returning to his peaceful home, he the petitioner was abruptly seized by a watchman, and forcibly dragged to the watch-house of St. Andrew's parish, whence, after being confined a considerable time, he was, as he humbly ventures to presume, unjustly and against the statutes of these realms hurried to Giltspur Street Compter by Drinkwater, a city officer, without any apparent authority or charge made against him; that the petitioner was in this prison confined to a dreary and solitary cell during the whole of the night, receiving on the following morning merely the prison allowance of a small loaf of bread and a pint of gruel; that the petitioner was again taken before the lord mayor without any warrant or charge made against him, and was detained at the Mansion House for seven hours, and afterwards remanded for a future examination, and thus kept in a state of imprisonment for five days, and without the permission of communicating with his family or friends; that at length the petitioner's daughter was allowed to see him, who was then informed that Castles had sold the furniture of the petitioner and of his daughter, who was at that time almost his only support in a state approximating to starvation; that Castles sold the furniture to brokers named Angel and Monroe, in White's Alley, Chancery Lane; and the petitioner further most most humbly sheweth, that he was on the 9th of February, on a charge of high treason, apprehended by a warrant issued by the right hon. Lord Sidmouth, and after undergoing an examination before his majesty's honourable privy council, was committed to Cold Bath Fields prison for re-examination, which took place on the 12th of the same month; that the petitioner was thus prevented using legal means to prosecute Castles for his unjustifiable seizure of the property of the petitioner and his miserable family, whilst, in the meantime, the said Castles was, as the petitioner is enabled to prove, seeking every means to sacrifice the life of the petitioner; and the petitioner further most humbly sheweth, that he was again examined on the 14th of the same month before his majesty's most honourable privy council, by whom, on the evidence of the said Castles, he was committed to the tower of London: that the petitioner was here, previous to his trial, seventeen weeks in a state of incarceration, during which his family suffered the most excruciating misery, alike exposed to the extremes of hunger and cold, deprived of the petitioner's assistance on the one hand, and plundered by the infamous Castles on the other; thus destitute, the petitioner's family was driven into the street by their landlord, who had seized the small remains of property which had escaped the rapacity of the cruel and notorious Castles; added to these calamities, the petitioner, by his long confinement, lost his trade, by which he had supported himself and family; that the petitioner was at length brought to trial, and, to the satisfaction of every good man, acquitted by a jury of his countrymen; that the petitioner, though restored to liberty, was doomed to behold his family in a state of unheard-of misery, and himself without the most humble means for their relief, being involved also in the heavy expenses of a trial which had lasted for six days; that the petitioner has, since his acquittal, written to Lord Sidmouth, to request that Castles may be brought to justice, and that the petitioner may be indemnified for his loss of property; the answer from his lordship denies any knowledge of the transaction; that the petitioner most humbly implores the house to take the premises into their consideration, and if it seem meet to the house, that the said Castles may be brought to justice; and he furthermore most humbly implores, that a bill of indemnity may not be permitted to pass, but that his majesty's ministers may be impeached for their unconstitutional conduct; and the petitioner further most humbly implores the house to grant him such assistance and relief as in their wisdom his case may appear to demand; and he further most humbly assures the house that he is not urged by vindictive motives, nor has he any sinister views, his only object being a desire for that even-handed justice which his extreme sufferings may seem to require, and for which he humbly trusts the laws of his country so liberally provide; and the petitioner most humbly implores the house to overlook any inadvertence or informality that he may have committed in this his humble petition, and attribute it to his inexperience in these matters, and not to any desire to infringe the rules and regulations of the house."

LEATHER TAX.] Petitions were presented of tanners, curriers, and others, of Horncastle; also, of the city of Lincoln; also, of Spilsby, Wainfleet, and Burgh; also, of Boroughbridge, against this tax.—Ordered to lie on the table.

COPYRIGHT BILL.] Sir E. Brydges brought in a bill "To amend an act passed in the 54th year of the reign of his present Majesty King George III." intituled 'An act to amend the several acts for the encouragement of learning, by securing the Copies and Copyright of printed Books to the Authors of such books or their assigns.'—It was read a first time.

Lord Archibald Hamilton presented the following petition of the University of Glasgow, against the bill, which was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.—"That the petitioners observe that leave has been given to bring in a bill to alter the act 54 Geo. III. chap. 156, and apprehending that one of its objects may be to take away the right which that act secures to certain public libraries, and among others to that of the University of Glasgow, of receiving copies of every new book published in the united kingdom, beg leave humbly to represent, that about four years ago, when certain booksellers attempted to obtain a repeal of the statutes establishing or confirming that right, a committee of the house, 'after much attention bestowed on the subject,' presented a report, in which, though it was drawn up from the testimony of persons by whom the right was attacked, persons, namely, 'connected with the printing, the publishing, and the sale of books,' they nevertheless declare, that 'the substance of the laws referred to them should be retained, and, in particular, that the delivery of all new books, and in certain cases of subsequent editions, to the libraries entitled to receive them, will tend to the advancement of learning and the diffusion of knowledge, without imposing any considerable burthen on the authors, printers, or publishers of such books;' that, agreeably to the views of this wise and moderate report, the present law was enacted, by the operation of which very important public benefits have been gained; in the universities, the teachers in the higher departments of education are enabled to keep up their own knowledge to the same level with the constantly advancing improvement of the age; the privileged libraries, being rendered the general depositaries of all the publications of the united kingdom, furnish to men of research in different parts of the country ample and accessible information on every topic to which the speculations or the events of the day may give interest or importance, and at the same time they secure for the use of posterity every valuable literary production, or, according to the practice of the university of Glasgow, every literary production, whatever be the present estimation of its value, from the destruction which time would otherwise bring upon it, or from the oblivion and uselessness into which it might sink by being locked up in the private cabinets of the curious; that these public advantages are obtained at an expense the amount of which has been shewn, by calculations not disputed by the opposers of the privilege, to be altogether insignificant, an expense which must ultimately fall upon the purchasers, not upon the publishers of books, and finally, an expense which, if in any degree it affects publishers or authors, has been richly compensated to them by the statute 8th Queen Anne, which first imposed the burthen, and which also constitutes the original and sole foundation of their claim of copyright, and still more abundantly by that statute, the alteration of which is now proposed, and which has extended their possession of that right from the period of fourteen to that of twenty-eight years; on these grounds, and on others which will suggest themselves to the wisdom of a British house of commons, the petitioners humbly presume to entertain the fullest confidence, as well as to express their most earnest desire and prayer, that no alteration may be made in the present law that shall in any degree diminish, or render less efficient, the privilege which it bestows upon their library."

BANKRUPT LAWS.] The report of the select committee appointed to consider of the bankrupt laws, and of the operation thereof, was brought up, ordered to lie upon the table, and to be printed.

The following is the examination of Sir Samuel Romilly, a member of the committee.

"The committee are aware of the pains you have taken to improve the bankrupt laws, and are desirous of your opinion upon the subject of any improvements which are required in them, if you are prepared to give it?—The bankrupt laws appear to me to be in many respects extremely defective, and to require much alteration.—The penal part of them, as being first in importance, requires first to be considered. If a bankrupt do not surrender to his commission, he is, under the statute of 5 Geo. II., punishable with death. If he surrender, but omit to make a full disclosure of his property, and withhold part of it, to the amount of 20*l., from his creditors, he is also, by the same statute, punishable with death. This excessive severity (as always happens where severity is excessive) defeats its object. The cruelty of the law prevents its execution; and though these offences are extremely common, nothing is more uncommon than the punishment of them. Since the statute was enacted, which is now more than eighty-five years, few years have passed in which various instances of these offences have not occurred; and yet there have not, I believe, been more than three examples of the law having been executed. Those very examples, too, have, upon the whole, had rather a tendency to multiply crimes; they have had more effect in preventing prosecutions, than occasions for prosecution, and have in a great degree made the law, for want of prosecutors, a dead letter. In other cases of inordinately severe punishments, private individuals are often induced to prosecute by relying on the mercy of the government; and by a confidence, founded on experience, that the administration of justice will be much less cruel than the law; but in the case of bankrupts it is well known that no mercy is to be expected. It is supposed to be for the interest of the community that this most severe statute should be most rigorously enforced. In the few instances that have occurred of convictions upon this law, the sentence has always, I believe, been executed, with one single exception. This excepted case was that of a man of the name of Bullock. The circumstances under which his life was spared, were that after his conviction, it was made perfectly evident, in a petition in his bankruptcy which came before the present lord chancellor, that the commission against him was of no validity. The facts which put this beyond all doubt had not been proved upon the trial. By the evidence given on that occasion, the conviction was well warranted; but according to the real circumstances of the case, the bankrupt ought never to have been convicted. And yet even this exercise of mercy, indispensable as it seems to have been, gave to some persons great dissatisfaction, and though the man was pardoned, it was only on condition of his being transported; and (if I mistake not) for life. He was, I believe, a dishonest man; but the commission against him not being valid, he had done no act which by law was punishable, either with death, or with transportation; and I mention this case only to shew with what rigour crimes against the bankrupt laws have been treated by the executive government.—With such rigour, indeed, is government disposed to treat them, that upon some very important occasions it has ranked them with murder and forgery. Thus, in the treaty of Amiens, it is stipulated that certain offenders who fly from justice, shall be reciprocally given up to their respective governments; a stipulation, by the bye, which it was felt that the crown had not the power to make without the sanction of parliament; and a statute was therefore passed to confirm and give effect to the treaty, the 42 Geo. III. cap. 92, sec. 21. The offenders to whom an asylum was thus formally, and by a solemn national act refused, were only of three descriptions,—murderers, persons guilty of forgery, and fraudulent bankrupts.—The nation however has been so far from adopting this severe disposition of its government, that it scarcely ever happens that persons can be found who will institute prosecutions for felonies under the bankrupt laws. Very numerous instances might, I believe, according to information which I have received from various quarters, be laid before the committee, of creditors who have deliberately resolved to allow

* Within the last three years, several persons, who had committed forgery, and fled from justice, have been brought back from France and the Netherlands, and put upon their trials. It is expedient, that this international law should be generally known, as, it is to be feared, that many persons may be induced to commit forgery, from the hope of finding an asylum against punishment in foreign countries.

bankrupts by whom they had been grossly defrauded, to enjoy complete impunity, because they saw no other alternative than such impunity, or the certainty of shedding their blood.—That men should feel great repugnance to put a human creature to death for such an offence, cannot surprise those who have reflected what the nature of the crime really is. Whatever the language of the law may be, or whatever national expediency may be thought to require, the great mass of mankind never can be brought to regard as highly criminal that which is not to a great degree immoral; and when it is considered, that by our law, a bankrupt is made such against his will, it is evident that the only immorality of one who has secreted none of his property, but who does not surrender to his commission, is that he withholds from his creditors the information and assistance which he ought to afford them, to enable them to recover his effects, and to apply them in satisfaction of their demands; and even this immorality may find some extenuation in the disgrace to which he must be subjected, and in the danger to which he is exposed; since however honestly he may have acted, and though every thing he has in the world be given up to his creditors, yet if he do not obtain his certificate, he may be imprisoned for life, by any one creditor who will prefer gratifying his resentment to any benefit he might derive from the commission. That a man has not fortitude enough to encounter so much shame, and such a risk, may be culpable; but who can, upon calm reflection, say that it ought to be punished with death?—The crime of withholding property from the creditors is indeed much more immoral; but even this, in the case of one who has been made a bankrupt without his own concurrence, amounts in reality to nothing more than the not paying (to the extent of the property withheld) debts which it is in his power to pay. That this is criminal cannot be denied; but that it should be expiated by the blood of the offender confounds all notions of justice, and destroys all gradations of guilt. It is very dishonest, but it is not more dishonest in an obscure tradesman, than in the heir to a title; and yet for this dishonesty, while our law hangs the tradesman, it suffers all other such debtors to enjoy complete impunity: nay, it not only leaves them unpunished, but it suffers them, in defiance of their creditors, to enjoy and to squander in gaol the substance which ought to be applied in the payment of their debts; for there is no process by which, in the case of persons not subject to the bankrupt laws, copyhold estates, property in the public funds, or money lent upon security, can be taken by creditors in execution. The statute of 5 Geo. II, which first made the offences of not surrendering under a commission, and of withholding property by bankrupts, capital, was originally a mere temporary law: it was passed only as an experiment; and though it has been a most unsuccessful one, it was continued from time to time till the year 1797, when it was made perpetual. The cruelty of this statute has, I am fully convinced, wholly prevented its efficacy; and I entertain no doubt that if it were repealed, and the offences for which it denounces death were declared to be misdemeanors, and were merely punished with imprisonment, the number of such crimes would soon be very sensibly diminished.—There is, however, an offence often committed under the bankrupt laws which appears to me far more serious than that of not surrendering to a commission, or that of concealing property from the creditors, but for which the law has appointed a much slighter punishment; I mean that of a trader procuring a commission to be taken out against him, in order, by means of false and fictitious debts proved under it, to obtain a certificate, which shall operate as a release of all his real debts. This is an offence which has of late years become extremely common, and in the perpetration of which there is great reason to believe that the same persons have been repeatedly employed as instruments under different commissions. The crimes which the law has made capital are merely crimes of omission, and consist in not submitting to very harsh coercive proceedings; but this crime is the spontaneous and premeditated act of the debtor; it is a gross fraud, practised generally on a great number of individuals, and to a very great amount, and which can be perpetrated only by means of repeated, numerous, and flagrant perjuries. The only prosecution which can now be instituted against these, the greatest offenders in bankruptcy, is for a conspiracy, or for subornation of perjury; and the only punishment that can be inflicted on them, if tried for the first of those crimes, is fine and imprisonment; and if for the last of them, the pillory, in addition to those other penalties: a severer punishment ought surely to be appointed for this crime, such as transportation, or imprisonment and hard labour in a house of correction; for even in this case the punishment of death would, as it appears to me, be neither expedient nor justifiable.—Another part of the law relating to bankrupts, which is highly penal in its consequences, and which very urgently requires alteration, is that which gives power to the commissioners to commit a bankrupt to prison, if he do not answer to their satisfaction the questions they put to him respecting his property, and to keep him in custody till he does. It was formerly held that if the bankrupt gave plain and direct answers to the questions, even though the commissioners believed them to be false, they had no power to commit; and that the only remedy was a prosecution for perjury: but it is now understood that if the commissioners discredit the answers given them, they may imprison the bankrupt till he shall answer to their satisfaction. Such a power ought not, under any system of laws, to be entrusted to any description of persons, who,

however wise and discreet, yet being men, must be subject to error. The answers given by the bankrupt may be true, though they do not appear such to the commissioners. Truth has not always the semblance of truth: and no man can have had much experience of judicial proceedings without having sometimes seen that facts, which at the first statement of them appeared in the highest degree improbable, have nevertheless in the end been fully and satisfactorily established: if ever this should have occurred in bankruptcy, and the first impression have been acted on; if ever a bankrupt should be committed because the commissioners refuse credit to his assertion, although that assertion be strictly true (and no person can doubt that this may sometimes happen), an innocent man must be punished with perpetual imprisonment, only because his judges are difficult of belief. It is perseverance in truth, which in such a case must make the imprisonment perpetual; the only chance of deliverance is to fabricate some falsehood, and to maintain it with such confidence and consistency that it shall gain credit with those by whom the truth was disbelieved.—Next in importance to those parts of the bankrupt law which I have already observed upon, is that which relates to certificates. Upon this subject it should seem, from much of what appears in the evidence reported by the committee in the last session, that very erroneous notions are entertained: it may therefore be expedient a little to enlarge upon it. The principle upon which the bankrupt law, as established in the 5th year of the reign of Geo. II. proceeds, is, that every bankrupt whether he has become such by misfortunes, by imprudence, or even by culpable conduct, shall, if he give up all the property that he has in the world to his creditors, and conform himself to the provisions of the statute, by making a full disclosure of every thing material for their information, be protected from all the process to which his creditors might otherwise resort against his person or against property acquired by him subsequently to his bankruptcy; accordingly, what is requisite to entitle him to this protection, is a certificate, not that his failure was the effect of misfortune, or that his former conduct was blameless, but merely, that after the commission issued, he had done every thing which the law required of him, to give full effect to it. This being the object and nature of the certificate, it seems not a little extraordinary, that amongst the persons whose consent is necessary to its allowance, should be a certain proportion of the creditors, and that it should be left to their uncontrolled discretion to give or to refuse such consent. If they were to be considered merely as witnesses, who having a full knowledge of what had been done under the commission, and an interest narrowly to watch the proceedings, were best qualified to testify what the bankrupt's conduct under it had been, one could well understand why their signatures should be required; but then equal justice would seem to demand, that the bankrupt should have a right to insist on their making some declaration on the subject; and that if they could not conscientiously certify that he had not conformed to the statutes, their silence should be considered as a tacit admission that he had done every thing which the law required of him. It is not however in this light (whatever may have been the intention of the legislature) that the matter is now considered, either by the creditors or by any persons concerned in the administration of this part of the law. The lord chancellor and the commissioners, whose assent is necessary to the allowance of the certificate, as well as that of the creditors, are bound to lay entirely out of their consideration the anterior conduct of the bankrupt. If he has appeared to his commission, has given up all his property, and upon his examination has made a candid and ingenuous disclosure of his affairs, they are bound to allow his certificate, though that very disclosure should amount to an admission, that before his bankruptcy he had deceived all who dealt with him, and had practised on his creditors every species of fraud and imposition. The creditors however, though it is the same certificate, and attended with the same consequences, that they are to sign, are bound by no such rules. They are at liberty to advert to the whole of the past life of the bankrupt, and as it were to sit in judgment upon the transactions which have taken place with themselves: to be judges in their own cause, and to inflict punishment at their pleasure for whatever they may consider as an offence against themselves or against the public.—This has, I confess, always appeared to me to be an extremely defective system. I have always thought that the keeping a bankrupt without his certificate was an unfit punishment for past offences, and that creditors were not the judges who could be best entrusted with the power of punishing their debtors. The effect of withholding a bankrupt's certificate, is to leave him exposed to all the severe process which the law of England affords to creditors against those who will not pay their debts; while the same law, by stripping the bankrupt of the whole of his property, makes it impossible that he should pay them. It takes from him, too, all motives for industry, by subjecting the future fruits of his labours to the demands of his former creditors. One single creditor who refuses to come in under the commission, may throw the bankrupt into prison, and detain him there for life, except as far as under the present temporary insolvent debtor's act he may, as long as it shall continue in force, obtain at the end of five years of imprisonment the relief of a kind of second bankruptcy.—Before the passing of the act of 49 Geo. III. the injustice was still greater: for it was permitted to a creditor who did not choose to take the benefit of a commission, to come in and prove his debt under it, for the mere purpose of being counted in the number of those whose signature to the certificate was required; and by refusing to sign it, to render the other signatures unavailing, and make effectual the severe measures he was himself pursuing. How this practice ever came to be permitted it is difficult to understand, for there is nothing in the statute of Geo. II. which could sanction it, though it appears to have prevailed, if not from the passing of the act, yet at least from the time of Lord Hardwicke. This gross injustice is now, by the late act, prevented; and no creditor is now permitted to proceed by law against the bankrupt, and at the same time to take advantage for any purpose of the commission.—The evils which may befal a bankrupt who cannot obtain his certificate, though they are very severe, and in some cases extremely cruel, are yet not of such a kind as ought to be inflicted by way of punishment. If a trader has committed frauds before his bankruptcy, he should suffer the penalty which the law has appointed for them; or if they be such as no law has yet provided against, an act should be passed to declare them criminal, and to fix the proper punishment for them. The lot of evil which he is to suffer for his misdeeds should be pronounced in a judicial sentence; the crime should be defined, the punishment should be certain, and it should be public, that his sufferings might operate by way of example and of prevention, and might be made useful to the community. His miseries ought not, as they now are, to be dependent upon the accident of some one creditor choosing to proceed against his person, while others refuse to sign his certificate; they ought to be inflicted speedily, and not deferred perhaps for years, till all his misconduct has been forgotten, and his misfortunes only are remembered; they ought not to be prolonged throughout his life, and to be endured in silence and in secrecy, and without any declaration of the nature and the circumstances of his offence. A man who is undergoing the penalty of his crimes ought not to be left in the doubtful state in which an uncertificated bankrupt is placed, leaving it uncertain, to all who hear of his condition, whether his sufferings are the effect of his own guilt or of the capricious cruelty of some unrelenting creditor. If, however, the law relating to certificates were not, as a penal law, liable to all these objections, yet upon what principle can it be justified, that the administration of this law, in which the public has so deep an interest, should be confided to creditors, not responsible to any one for their conduct, but left at full liberty to act as their passions or their interests may prompt. No man, much experienced in bankrupt law, who will recollect to what persons certificates have been granted, and to whom they have been refused, will pretend that the discretion thus entrusted to creditors' has been generally exercised upon motives which would bear the test of any moral investigation. I have heard it, indeed, asserted, that creditors abound with kindness and humanity, and never refuse certificates, but to those who are undeserving of them. I cannot say that my experience confirms that observation; on the contrary, I have known several instances of the most harsh and inhuman refusals of certificates by creditors: one such case exists at the present moment. It is that of a very honest and most unfortunate gentleman, a bankrupt through no fault of his own, but who has been involved in ruin by the villainy of a partner, and who yet, without the pretence of any imputation on him, remains without his certificate, merely because it is the pleasure of a creditor of large amount that it shall be withheld.—It could not but occur to those who framed the statute of 5 Geo. II, that a creditor smarting under a pecuniary loss, and invested with the power of doing such injury to his debtor, or conferring so valuable a boon on him, as the withholding or granting his certificate, would be likely enough, unless restrained by law, to make a traffic of his authority, and to accept a bribe for the exercise of his judicial discretion. They have accordingly strictly forbidden creditors to receive, either from the bankrupt or from any other person, any consideration whatever for signing a certificate; and have declared a certificate signed for any such consideration void. But in spite of the prohibition of this law, no man conversant with the subject can doubt, that in very many instances, money, or other valuable considerations, are still taken for signing certificates. It frequently happens, too, that in order to recover some part of the property which is to be divided among the creditors, or to resist some demand set up against the estate, it becomes necessary to examine the bankrupt as a witness; but he can be rendered a competent witness only by granting him his certificate. In all such cases, the creditors, without any regard to the past transactions of the bankrupt, or to his conduct under the commission, but with a view only to the dividends they are to receive, affix their signatures: nothing surely can be more destructive of the only just end of punishment, than such examples as these; and if punishment be not the object of those hardships and severities to which an uncertificated bankrupt is exposed, they are very wantonly and cruelly inflicted on him.—Upon the subject however of certificates, it should be observed that the two effects which by our law follow their being granted or refused, admit of very different considerations: whether a man whose debts remain unpaid, no matter from what cause, should be allowed to make what use he pleases of after-acquired property, and to keep it entirely privileged from the claims of his former unsatisfied creditors, admits of a very different consideration from the question, whether he ought to be exposed in his person to a severe and cruel restraint for not paying debts which the law has made it impossible for him to pay. Between these different consequences, however, of a bankrupt's certificate being withheld, the law as now existing makes no distinction; and a creditor cannot, by signing the certificate, afford a bankrupt a shield against oppression, without resigning all claim to receive satisfaction for his debt out of the bankrupt's future opulence. It should be observed too, that it may be both impolitic and unjust, to prevent a bankrupt from enjoying in security the fruits of his future industry; and yet be quite consistent with justice and expediency, that accessions of fortune which are not obtained by his own exertions, should have no such protection: hence a distinction might reasonably be made between the future earnings of a bankrupt, and the property he may derive from gift or from inheritance; or if it should be thought just to preserve the law which subjects even the produce of the subsequent labour or ingenuity of an uncertificated bankrupt to the payment of his antecedent debts, yet it might be expedient, in order to prevent the bad effects of so fatal a restraint upon industry, to make some distinction with respect to the amount of such acquisitions; and to let what should remain only, after a reasonable provision for the bankrupt and his family, be considered as a fund for the liquidation of his unsatisfied debts. —If it be right that the creditors should have the power of deciding whether a bankrupt shall have his certificate, I see no reason to object to the old law, which required that the number of assenting creditors should be four-fifths of the whole: and though the act of the 49 George III. which requires the assent only of three-fifths, is generally called my act, because I was the original mover of it in the house of commons; yet that alteration was never suggested by me, nor was I ever consulted upon it. As the bill was brought into and passed the house of commons, it gave the bankrupt a right of appealing to the Lord Chancellor, from the decision of his creditors, if they refused him his certificate, as had been done in Ireland in certain cases, by several acts of the Irish parliament, particularly the 21 and 22 George III. cap. 59; the 25 George III. cap. 25; the 37 George III. cap. 25; and the 39 George III. cap. 57. This clause was struck out in the house of lords, and the alteration as to the proportion of creditors required to sign the certificate, was substituted in its place. A number of clauses were in the same manner added to the bill by the lords, from the 15th section to the end of it, for which I certainly can claim no praise, and deserve no blame. Though known to be the author of the bill, I received no intimation whatever that any such additions or alterations were intended; and as the bill, according to a practice which is extremely common with respect to bills coming up from the commons, and purporting to make important alterations in the law, was put off by the lords to the last days of the sessions, it did not come down to the commons in its altered state till the day before parliament was prorogued; and consequently all opportunity of considering the propriety of the lords' alterations was denied to the commons.—The defects in the bankrupt laws which I have already mentioned, those which are found in them when considered as penal laws, and those which relate to certificates, I consider as being by far the most important: there are, however, as it appears to me, other evils resulting from those laws, which ought not to be overlooked; such as the extensive and numerous litigations which attend them, the very great expense of commissions, and their inadequacy to relieve a bankrupt from all his engagements.—The validity of a commission may, after the party has been found a bankrupt under it, be contested in a variety of ways. It may be disputed by the bankrupt himself, by any of his creditors, and by any of the persons who are indebted to the estate. It may be disputed in petitions to the chancellor, in actions brought against the assignees, or against the messenger, and in the defence which may be made to actions brought by the assignees. The expense which attends these litigations is enormous; and property which, at the time of sealing the commission, would have afforded a large dividend to the creditors, is by such proceedings often very greatly diminished, and sometimes wholly consumed. It was the object of the statutes of 46 Geo. III. and 49 Geo. III. to diminish this evil, by making it impossible to overturn commissions by reason of prior secret acts of bankruptcy, and by dispensing with the necessity of proving all the requisites to support a commission in any action by the assignees, unless the party against whom it was brought meant really to try the validity of the commission, and would, at the risk of costs, give notice of such his intentions; and those acts have certainly prevented some litigation, and saved some expense; but a more effectual remedy should be applied: perhaps the most effectual would be that suggested by Mr. Stevens, in his evidence given before the committee in the last session, namely, to make the adjudication by the commissioners, when acquiesced in by the bankrupt for a certain period, final in all cases, except those of commissions fraudulently taken out at the instance of the bankrupt himself. It is important that something of this kind should be provided, not only for the avoiding the litigation and expense which belong to these proceedings, but to protect assignees from the vexation and ruin which may be brought on them, notwithstanding their conduct may have been the most honourable, and the best calculated to promote the interests of the creditors, if it happens that the commission under which they have acted proves to be invalid.—A commission of bankrupt, and a certificate of the bankrupt having conformed under it to the statute, will not, under the law as it now stands, protect him from being answerable for all his former pecuniary engagements: and this appears to be a very great imperfection in it. All the provisions of the law, as well those of a criminal as of a civil nature, seem to proceed upon the principle of the bankrupt's being completely discharged from all such engagements. Upon no other ground can it be just to take away all his property and distribute it amongst his creditors, or to subject him to severe punishment if he do not make a full disclosure of it. It is surely the grossest injustice to take from a man all the means of paying his debts, and yet to leave him answerable for those debts, and to punish him by imprisonment if he do not discharge them. To remove this evil in some degree was the object of the statute of 49 Geo. III.; and it has accordingly enabled the proof of different debts under the commission, which before were not provable, and consequently made the bankrupt's certificate a discharge for them. That statute, however, has not gone so far as it ought to have done; but that more was not attempted by it, will not surprise those who know what difficulties a private individual who presumes to propose amendments of the law has to encounter. All contingent debts ought, upon a proper estimate to be made of their value, to be admitted to be proved, since nothing is left in the hands of the bankrupt to answer such demands when the contingency may happen. As the law now stands, contingent debts cannot be proved, though all a bankrupt's property, even that in which he has only a contingent interest, is divisible amongst his creditors who come in under the commission. It should seem too, that all debts, which at the time of the bankruptcy remain in unliquidated damages, and which are now excluded, ought to be admitted to be proved; the amount of such damages being previously ascertained before the commissioners, or in such other mode as may be thought expedient. Where such a demand is constituted by contract, this probably would not be much objected to; but there is certainly much difficulty where the demand arises out of some personal wrong. That species of debt has, by many of the acts of parliament for the relief of insolvent debtors, been treated as being of a penal nature, and has therefore been excepted from their provisions. This principle has never been adopted in the bankrupt law; and it is only when the amount of the damages has not been previously ascertained, that it is excluded in common with all other demands of an unliquidated amount, from the benefit of the commission; if a verdict has been previously recovered, the debt is provable, and is discharged by the certificate, like any other demand. The justice, too, of the principle on which the insolvent debtors' acts proceed, is extremely questionable: for many personal wrongs, the injured party has his choice to proceed either by indictment to exact punishment, or by action to recover a pecuniary compensation; and it would seem not a little extraordinary, if, by adopting the latter mode of proceeding, he could, for such offences as a private libel or a trifling assault, inflict perpetual imprisonment; a severer punishment than the law allows, even in cases of the most aggravated misdemeanors. There are other personal wrongs, indeed, for which by law no punishment can be inflicted, such as adultery, and the seduction of a daughter; the defect of the law, however, in this respect, ought not to be supplied by such indirect means; and punishment in such cases should not be left to depend upon the indifferent and accidental circumstances which are to determine whether debts arising out of such transactions are or are not barred by a certificate.—Another description of debts from which a bankrupt is not released by a commission, and by his certificate, are those which are due to the crown. It does not appear to me that any just reason can be assigned for distinguishing such debts in this respect, from debts due to a subject; at any rate, it should be provided, that no extent at the suit of the crown should be effectual after the debtor had by the commissioners been declared a bankrupt, in order to save the expense of a provisional assignment, which is of no other use than to protect the bankrupt's property from extents.—Some provision too is wanting to compel a bankrupt, who is seised of real property in the colonies, or in a foreign country, which, by the municipal law of the place where it is situated, will not be affected by his commission, to convey it to his assignees for the benefit of his creditors.—Another part of the bankrupt law which has long appeared to me to require alteration, and which I have known in many instances productive of extraordinary injustice and oppression, is the facility with which commissions can be taken out. If a trader is indebted to any man in 100*l.*, or if any person will swear that he is indebted to him in that amount, the real or pretended creditor, if he can get any witness to swear that an act of bankruptcy has been committed, may, without the least previous intimation, and by a mere ex parte proceeding, make his debtor a bankrupt: the immediate consequence is, that all the man's property is taken possession of; his trade is put a stop to, and he is compelled to surrender to the commission, and to submit to be examined as to all his concerns: and all this, though he might be able, if an opportunity were afforded him, to prove that he had never committed any act of bankruptcy, and that he does not owe the man who is prosecuting the commission a single shilling. This proof he can only be allowed to give upon a petition to the lord chancellor to supersede the commission, or in an action which he may bring against the messenger or the assignee to recover his property. Several months must elapse; several years may, and sometimes do, elapse before he can have such a petition or such an action finally decided. In the meantime, not only is all his property withheld from him, but it is in the hands of the person with whom he is contending, and affords the means of protracting the litigation, and of supporting his oppressor in his injustice. The bankrupt is without any resources but such as his friends may from charity advance him, while his opponent is with the bankrupt's property resisting his just demands. I have known several instances of this kind: commissions taken out without any colour of justification, either in respect of the insolvent circumstances of the supposed debtor, or of there having been any act of bankruptcy committed; and I have known that such commissions have in the end been superseded, and the persons who took them out have been ordered to pay all the costs of the proceeding: but I never knew an instance of this kind in which the person against whom the commission had been taken out, was not, notwithstanding his ultimate success, completely and irretrievably ruined. Such proceedings as these sometimes originate in malice; sometimes in indifference to consequences which will only affect a man's debtor; and sometimes, and indeed most frequently, in a desire to create law expenses, by which an attorney, who is either himself the petitioning creditor, or who has suggested the measure, is largely to profit. This, in my opinion, most urgently calls for some remedy, though I am not prepared at the present moment to say what that remedy should be.—It seems to have been the opinion of several gentlemen who were examined before the committee of last session, that it would be a great improvement in the administration of the bankrupt laws, if there were fixed and permanent lists of commissioners in the country, to whom all commissions must be directed, as is the case in London, instead of leaving it to the person who takes out the commission to have it directed to what commissioners he pleases; provided only that two of them be barristers: I am not myself, by any means, satisfied that this is desirable. It is true, that the duty of commissioners would probably, under such a system, be somewhat better discharged than it is at present; but I doubt whether the good that would result from this, would sufficiently compensate for the mischief of extending the patronage and influence of the crown over the profession in every part of the kingdom, by placing such a number of new offices in the gift of the chancellor. It has always appeared to me to be of great importance to the public, to preserve as much as possible the independence of lawyers; and I know of no more effectual mode of destroying that independence, than by accustoming them to be looking up to the favour of the chancellor for an appointment, not only lucrative in itself, but which is a recommendation and an introduction to business. Lord Rosslyn, when chancellor, took upon himself to have such lists made out in several of the principal trading towns in England; but this had not been done by any of his predecessors; and the present lord chancellor has rejected this patronage, and has always expressed his disapprobation of what he has been pleased to say, he considered as an exercise of favour, which was unfair towards those whom it excluded; and though he has continued the directing of commissions at Birmingham, and some other places, to the lists which he found appointed when the great seal was committed to him, he has not, in a single instance, added to those lists, or even filled up the vacancies in them, which have been caused by death.—With respect to these country commissioners, some alteration should be made in the amount of their fees. They are now allowed, like town commissioners, only twenty shillings for each meeting they attend; and so imperative is the statute, that it declares, that any commissioner who shall take a larger fee shall be disabled for ever from acting as a commissioner in any commission. This positive injunction is however every day disregarded; the fee which is allowed being a very inadequate compensation, where a barrister (as is often the case) has to travel a considerable distance to the place appointed for the meeting, in addition to the long attendance which may be required of him.—The evils which I have noticed appear to me to be those which require most to be corrected in the bankrupt laws. There are other matters, however, which deserve attention in any attempts that may be made to improve those laws; as has been well pointed out by several of the gentlemen who gave evidence before the former committee. The expense attending the execution of commissions seems of late to have considerably increased; their meetings to be greatly multiplied; and the custom of having counsel to attend them to have become of late extremely common: for the inconveniences which all this may occasion, it is certainly not very easy to provide a remedy. In one instance, however, which it may be worth mentioning, there seem to be meetings of commissioners often had which I apprehend are wholly unnecessary; I mean the meetings which I understand are sometimes called to authorize the laying out by the assignees of money in their hands in the purchase of exchequer bills. Notwithstanding the seventh section of the act of 49 Geo. 3, which was most inconsiderately added to the bill after it had been brought into the house of commons; no such meetings can be necessary. The laying out money in exchequer bills for the benefit of the creditors, and depositing them in the hands of the bankers appointed under the commission, could not possibly subject the assignees to any penalties, and the sanction of the commissioners to such a measure must be quite superfluous.—The necessity of expensive applications to the chancellor might, in many cases, be avoided by extending the powers of the commissioners; by enabling them to keep separate accounts of the joint and separate estates of bankrupts, and to admit the proof of joint debts under separate commissions; by allowing them to take cognizance of equitable as well as of legal mortgages; by authorizing them to expunge the proof of debts admitted by them, upon the production of evidence not known when the proof was admitted; and by empowering them to compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of documents necessary for their proceedings."

NAVY ESTIMATES.] The house having resolved itself into a committee of supply, the estimates for the naval service were referred to it, when

Sir George Warrender rose and said, that the observations which he should have the honour to submit to the committee would occupy but a very narrow space. The subject of the naval expenditure had for some years past been brought before the consideration of parliament in a shape so distinct as to render any detailed statement altogether unnecessary. Indeed, the reports for the last two years of the committee of finance and public expenditure, were best calculated to give the fullest and clearest information. An important change had been effected in that branch of the public service. The contracts in the merchants' yards had been abandoned, so that the whole ship-building was now brought under the eye of the government. This change had not merely been productive of great economy, but ships of a better description were built. Another large branch in the expenditure of the navy, which had been referred to in the eighth report of the finance committee, then upon the table, was that connected with the works carried on in the naval yards. For a detailed account of that branch, together with a statement of that able engineer, Mr. Rennie, he begged to refer the committee to that report. The committee were aware, from the nature of all works carried on immediately near the sea, it was most desirable to complete them as soon as possible. Besides, the materials and labour in a time of peace were so much cheaper, that though a large sum might, in one or two years, have been expended, it was in the end productive of considerable diminution in the expense. That consideration had contributed to produce an increase in the amount of the present estimates, but every practicable reduction had been attended to. The works at Sheerness and Chatham had done away the expenditure to a much larger amount in the establishments on the river, while the basin and docks constructing there would still afford the means of sending a fleet to sea fully adequate to any service that, in the present situation of Europe, could arise. There remained one point on which he wished to offer a few observations. It had been insinuated, in the discussion of general questions of policy, that the government of the country had indicated a disposition to neglect that important branch of the public security—its natural and ancient bulwark, the navy. He could see no ground for such an insinuation, for nothing had been omitted to strengthen and make it available to the national wants. The number of out-pensioners of Greenwich hospital amounted to 35,000, the far greater proportion of whom were serviceable, and ready to be employed in the public defence, wherever our security required it. The establishment of roadsteads for our fleets, by which safety and promptitude in fitting them out were obtained, shewed that there existed no grounds for any such fears. If the committee looked to the efficacy and despatch, even in a time of peace, with which the last expedition on which the navy was employed had been fitted out (Algiers), an efficiency that had attracted the acknowledgment of the gallant and distinguished commander, it was impossible to assert that any neglect was chargeable. It was perfectly true that the period of peace was not the season for daring enterprises and brilliant achievements. "But," said the hon. baronet, "although a period of peace does not afford an opportunity for those wonderful efforts, which, in war, have distinguished the marine of this country, yet, there may arise services of a far more interesting nature, in the execution of which all those high qualities of skill, enterprise, courage and perseverance, which so eminently distinguish the British seaman, are required. It has justly been the boast of this country that, as in war, she has employed her naval means to support the weak against the strong, and to maintain the independence of nations, so, in peace, she has engaged in the most arduous undertakings for the advancement of science and general knowledge, not with any selfish views of her own, but for the common benefit of mankind. The committee will therefore learn with satisfaction, that active and intelligent officers are employed, in various quarters of the globe, on the service of surveying seas and coasts, of which the knowledge is at present very imperfect, and, above all, they will join in that general feeling of interest which the projected expedition to the arctic regions excites, and which, it may reasonably be hoped, will decide the interesting question of a N. W. communication, or passage, into the Pacific, which, but for the premature death of our great navigator Captain Cook, he himself would probably have solved. I trust, sir, that for the happiness of mankind, to objects of this sort alone, for at least a long period of years, the exertions of British seamen will be directed; but if, unhappily, other circumstances should call forth that powerful arm of this country, which has heretofore so effectually sustained her independence and her glory, it must be satisfactory to the committee and the country to anticipate (as they confidently may) that at no period in the history of the country did she possess the means of more effectually displaying, in every quarter of the globe, the elastic nature of her naval power." The hon. baronet concluded with moving, "that a sum not exceeding 2,480,680*l.* 17*s.* 3*d.* be granted to his Majesty, for defraying the ordinary establishment of the navy for the year 1818."

Mr. M. W. Ridley said, he was not disposed to object generally to the vote which the hon. baronet had proposed. The eighth report of the finance committee had removed those objections which he formerly entertained respecting the estimates, and he hoped that a report containing such beneficial suggestions would not be unproductive of public benefit—that it would not be allowed, like many other valuable reports presented by committees of that house, to remain a dead letter. He did not mean to oppose any other item than that which related to the lords of the admiralty, and in that, he thought, a reduction of 2000*l.* should be made from the vote, being the sum allowed to the two junior lords, who, in his opinion, could be dispensed with, without any detriment to the public service. The committee would recollect, that in the course of the last session, (see vol. i. p. 811.) he made a motion for the reduction of two out of the six lords of the admiralty, and it was then urged by the opposite side, that the crown ought not to be deprived of a portion of its fair patronage—that those two places gave the ministers an opportunity of serving their friends, and that they were necessary as a school for the education of young statesmen. If he had not heard such arguments gravely advanced in the house of commons, he could not have believed it possible that such an expense to the public could be so defended. As to the patronage of the crown, he thought it already too great, and therefore, that no place, useless in itself, ought to be kept up. With respect to the education of young statesmen, he could not consent that 2000*l.* should be taken out of the pockets of the public for the education of two young gentlemen, ambitious of becoming statesmen. (Hear, hear.) The sum, it was true, was small, but he objected to it from the principle on which it was demanded. If there must be a school for young statesmen, they ought to pay for their own education. What the peculiar course of knowledge was in which those young statesmen were trained at the admiralty, he was not informed enough correctly to describe. He had seen, however, a very entertaining book, called "Stories for Children." It was written, he understood, by the hon. gentleman opposite, (Mr. Croker,) and, he supposed, for the purpose of developing the whole system of education necessary for lords of the admiralty. (Much laughter.) It might be very well adapted for that purpose, although he could not agree with one assertion in it; for he did not believe that "Charles I. was either an excellent man or a good king." This was all the education which those two junior lords were to acquire at the expense of the public, so far as he could learn. Perhaps, they might extend their scholastic exercises a little farther, and read a periodical work, whose principles would considerably facilitate their promotion—he meant the Quarterly Review; the most celebrated pages of which were ascribed to the same pen that had written the "Stories for Children." (Laughter.) Any gentlemen, so disposed, might certainly devote their attention to those works with the view of becoming accomplished statesmen, but he would repeat, that the public ought not to pay 2000*l.* for their education. In his motion for this reduction, he looked with confidence for the support of all the hon. members who had voted against the leather-tax. (Hear, hear.) The right hon. gentleman opposite had represented the necessity of a substitute for that tax, if it should be abolished. This reduction would be equivalent to a substitute to the amount of 2000*l.*—The hon. baronet concluded by moving, as an amendment, "that a sum not exceeding 2,478,680*l.* 17*s.* 8*d.* be granted to his Majesty, for defraying the ordinary establishment of the navy for the year 1818."

Lord Castlereagh said, that the principal arguments for continuing six lords of the admiralty were, the great benefits derived from the constitution of this board, a constitution which had existed for a considerable time without any increase or alteration. There was no imputation before the committee against the general economy of the government; they could not therefore agree to the amendment proposed. It was upon solemn argument that the motion to reduce the two junior lords had been rejected. He could not now argue the question in the same pleasant manner as the hon. baronet, and, therefore, he would leave it to the committee without further observation.

Mr. Bankes said, that the finance committee had great reason to be satisfied with the general spirit of economy manifested by ministers, and with the attention paid to the recommendations of the committee and of the house. He should be excused for mentioning, that the ordnance accounts, for instance, had proved very satisfactory to the committee, and he hoped that they would prove as satisfactory to the house, when they should be laid before them. It must be a subject of great satisfaction to the house to know, that every attention had been given to their recommendations, and to those of the finance committee.

After the gallery was cleared for a division, and just as the tellers were proceeding to count, Mr. Wilberforce entered at one of the doors, but immediately retreated. The tellers, however, having seen him, followed and brought him in; when he was asked by the chairman of the committee, (Mr. Brogden,) whether he had heard the question put? To which he replied in the negative. The chairman then ordered the question to be read to him, which was done, and then asked him which way he voted? Mr. Wilberforce replied, for the Ayes, but took his seat among the Noes.

Mr. Lyttelton then observed, that he saw a member among the Noes, who had declared he meant to vote with the Ayes; and contended, that he ought not, therefore, to be told in his present situation; he meant the hon. member for Bramber.

Mr. Wilberforce admitted that he had for a moment neglected his duty; and coming into the house when the committee was on the point of dividing, without even knowing the subject of debate, he had endeavoured to withdraw; but had been followed by the tellers, one of whom had dragged him from the place to which he had retreated, and, in his confusion, he had declared he should vote with the ayes, when he really meant to vote with the noes, being determined to vote on the opposite side to the individual who had brought him forward against his will, in order to prevent his being treated so in future.

The Chairman stated, that he conceived the hon. member was perfectly justified in changing his mind, and voting one way, after declaring his intention to vote another. (Hear, hear.)

Lord Folkestone called the attention of the house to the declaration of the hon. member, that, without regard to principle, or the merits of the case, he voted from the sole motive of disappointing the teller who had brought him into the house; and was proceeding to contend, that it was the duty of both the tellers to bring in any member whom they found in that situation, when he was interrupted by a call of order.

The Chairman repeated, that the hon. member had a right to retract any declaration of his intentions made in error, and he was accordingly counted among the Noes *.

On the division, the numbers were,

TELLER—Sir M. W. Ridley.

The resolution being thus carried,

Sir George Warrender moved, "that a sum not exceeding 1,787,181*l.* be granted to his Majesty, for defraying the charge of what may be necessary for the building, rebuilding, and repairs of ships of war in his Majesty's and the merchants' yards, and other extra works over and above what is proposed to be done upon the heads of wear, tear, and ordinary, for the year 1818."

Sir M. W. Ridley complained, that, notwithstanding what had been stated on a former occasion, no provision had been made for those meritorious persons who had served as pursers in the navy. Many of them had been seen begging in the streets, and one of them, who was of seven years' standing, was in so distressed a state, as to be compelled to take refuge in one of the vessels for the reception of destitute seamen. A sum, not greater than that which he had just moved to reduce, by suppressing the offices of the two junior lords of the admiralty, would go far in affording relief to such persons.

Mr. Croker said, that the persons to whom the hon. baronet had alluded, were not pursers, but supernumerary clerks, who had acted as such. It was quite beyond the power of the board to afford them any relief, without opening the door to many claims which could not be complied with. Those who had been pursers had been allowed half-pay to a certain date, and to that date the hon. baronet would find it paid in the estimates.

The resolution was then agreed to.—The following resolutions were next put, and carried.

"That a sum not exceeding 320,000*l.* be granted to his Majesty, for the purchase of provisions for troops and garrisons on foreign stations, and the value of rations for troops to be embarked on board ships of war and transports for the year 1818."

* The general rule on a division of the house is, that all who were present at putting the question should vote.—On the 20th of February, 1795, Mr. Fox was told in on a division, and the tellers reported the numbers to the chair, 64 to 12; but notice being taken, that Mr. Fox was not in the house when the question was put, Mr. Speaker asked Mr. Fox, whether he was in the house, and heard the question put? Mr. Fox answered, that he was in the Speaker's chamber; upon which the Speaker said, "Then his vote must be disallowed;" and the Speaker immediately reported the numbers 64 to 11. The Speaker's chamber, technically so called (but sometimes also the Smoking Room) is properly a committee room, or rather the committee room, for all committees appointed by the house on bills are ordered to meet in the Speaker's chamber.—But otherwise, if in the Speaker's room, behind the chair, for any member who is there at the putting of the question, has a right to have the question stated to him and to vote. Indeed, the tellers sometimes go and fetch members from that room, who are then compelled to vote.—See the last edit. of Hatsell, v. ii. pp. 186-7.

"That a sum not exceeding 178,948*l.* be granted to his Majesty, for the expense of the transport service for the year 1818."

ORDNANCE SERVICE.] On the motion of Mr. Ward, who stated that he should not be prepared to submit the whole of the ordnance estimates to the consideration of the committee until after the holidays, a resolution was agreed to, for granting the sum of 120,000*l.* on account, for the ordnance service of the present year.

HIGH BAILIFF OF WESTMINSTER.] Mr. Marsh rose to move, in the committee of supply, that a sum of 800*l.* be granted to the high bailiff of Westminster, to remunerate him for losses which he had sustained, in consequence of the election of a member to serve in parliament for that city, in the year 1812. He observed, that this was a case of pure, unmixed justice; and that the claim came recommended by a committee, to which, four years ago, it had been referred. By their report, (presented on the 20th of June, 1814,) it appeared, that the high bailiff had suffered two specific losses; one, in the contested election for Westminster in 1807, the other in the election in 1812. In the former instance, he erected hustings, and provided poll-clerks, without which, the election could not have been conducted to a fair and legal return: for it was evident that, in a place like Westminster, where the election was of a popular character, if those provisions were not made, scenes of riot and confusion would ensue, totally subversive of the rights of the electors. The high bailiff afterwards applied to the candidates to repay him the money which he had expended, but his demand was resisted, and, on bringing an action against them, the Court of King's Bench decided in their favour, leaving him a loser to the amount of 1500*l.* For this, however, he afterwards obtained a compensation; and, in order that he might not suffer any loss in future, the legislature passed an act, (51 Geo. III.) to assimilate elections in Westminster to those that took place in other cities*, and to throw the expense of the necessary preparations on the candidate or candidates; but, at the same time, making it imperative on the high bailiff (which it was not before) to cause the erection of hustings, and to provide poll-clerks, in the first instance, out of his own pocket. In their anxiety, however, to protect the high bailiff, parliament neglected to provide for that anomalous and unforeseen case, the election of an "involuntary candidate." In consequence, the high bailiff, after the close of the election in 1812, having been refused the expenses to which he had been subject in the execution of the act, and having brought his action against one of the candidates for the amount, was nonsuited by a rather nice interpretation of the language of the act; it being ruled, that he who had not solicited to be elected, although he was elected, could not be considered a candidate: on whom alone, according to the words of the act, the expense in question was to fall. The high bailiff afterwards sued the other candidate for a moiety of the expense, and the defendant having suffered judgment to go by default, the damages were assessed before the sheriff. One moiety, therefore, of the expense had been recovered, but, in respect to the other moiety, the high bailiff was still a loser. He now appealed to the committee on behalf of that officer, and surely, in common justice, he was entitled to be compensated for doing that which it was imperative on him by act of parliament to do. The object was small for the liberality of the house to accord, but the loss was large for the high bailiff to sustain. It was impossible for any individual to come to the house with a more meritorious title. It was, as he had before observed, a case of pure, unmixed justice, and he should be sorry to impute to the house so slow a sense of justice as to imagine that they would refuse to agree to his motion, which was, "that the sum of 800*l.* be voted to the high bailiff of Westminster, to reimburse him for the expenses attendant on the election for Westminster in 1812."

Mr. Bankes protested against the irregularity of this proposition. Had the applicant the smallest claim on parliament, which he denied, it was quite irregular, in a committee of supply, to propose any vote except in the form of a grant to his majesty. Another irregularity was, that it was totally inconsistent with the practice of the house, for a member to rise up in a committee of supply, and propose a grant for the benefit of an individual, even in the form of a grant for the service of the crown, unless the consent of the crown to such a proposition had been previously signified. Had his right hon. friend, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, received any application on the subject? And, if so, had he intimated the consent of the crown? Without such an intimation, the motion of the hon. gentleman, even if its form were not in other respects incorrect, would be perfectly unconstitutional. Nor was this practice in the least calculated to give an undue influence to the crown. It has been the established practice from the time of queen Anne, that no application to parliament for a grant of public money should be made without the consent of the crown. It was a prudent guard which the house had set up against its own prodigality and inconsiderateness. If once it were allowed to any hon. gentleman to stand up and propose any grant to which a feeling of compassion, or perhaps of levity, might prompt him, the profusion and waste, of which they were accustomed to complain on the part of the crown, would soon be outdone tenfold by the exhibition of the same qualities in that house. On the irregularity of the proceeding alone, therefore, without any inquiry into the merits of the case, which he was nevertheless quite prepared to dispute, he would stop it in limine by opposing the motion.

* Westminster first sent members to parliament in the reign of Edw. VI. It became a city by express creation, and not singly by making it the see of a bishop, however sufficient that of itself might have been; the letters patent, which erected the bishoprick, ordaining, quod tota villa nostra Westmonasterii extunc et deinceps in perpetuum sit civitas, ipsamque civitatem Westmonasterii vocari. See Hargr. Co. Litt. 109. b. and the Letters Patent in 1 Burn. Reform. page 246 of the Appendix.

The Chairman (Mr. Brogden) apologized for an omission of duty. The consent of the crown had been signified to the proposition; but he had omitted to communicate it to the committee.

Mr. Bankes observed, that that did not remove his objection to the irregularity of the form in which the hon. gentleman had brought forward his motion.

The Chairman remarked, that that might be rectified by moving for the sum in the form of a grant to his Majesty.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that the present application was unquestionably sanctioned by the report of the committee four years ago; and that he had signified the consent of the crown to the introduction of the subject to the consideration of the house.

Mr. N. Calvert thought that the emoluments of the high bailiff's office ought to be made known to the house.—It was a situation so valuable as to be the object of purchase, and the expense to which it appeared the high bailiff had been subject might be no unreasonable burden on him.

Mr. Brougham said, he was always disposed to listen to the hon. member for Corfe Castle (Mr. Bankes) on questions of economy, and was one of the last men who would vote for an unjustifiable expenditure of the public money in grants, either to the crown or to individuals, but the present appeared to him to be a claim of strict justice. This gentleman had been saddled with an expense which the legislature never intended to fall on him, merely by the unfortunate use, in an act of parliament, of a word which was not technical, and which a court of law had construed in a sense different from that in which it was intended. The observation of the hon. member for Hertford, that the office was purchased, rendered the claim still stronger. It was an estate on which parliament had, by mistake, imposed a burden, which the purchaser could by no means have anticipated. And for whose benefit was the expenditure in question? For that of the public. To blunder in acts of parliament, was not peculiar to the House of Commons; but it was peculiarly imperative on that house to be accurate in every thing which respected elections. In the act under consideration that house had said, that the expenses of the hustings, &c. at Westminster, should be borne by the candidate or candidates. When those words were employed by the framers of the act, it was undoubtedly expected by them that whoever might be returned to serve for Westminster, and who professed his readiness to serve, would be liable to bear his share of the burden. A case had, however, occurred, in which a member had been returned, who had not sought the honour, and it had been determined by a court of law, that he could not be called a candidate, and that, therefore, he was not liable to pay any part of the expenses. Under all these circumstances the committee were, in his opinion, bound in justice to make good the deficiency to the high bailiff.

Mr. Wynn said, it was highly desirable that the report made by the committee four years ago should be reprinted, and in the hands of members, in order to make them adequate judges of the subject before they were called upon to decide on it. He had a strong objection to the motion. Nor did it appear to him that there was any blunder in the act. The high bailiff having brought his action against Sir Francis Burdett, for his portion of the expense of the hustings, &c. a court of law decided, that a man was not a candidate, who had not offered his services to the electors; and that he was not liable to pay his share of the expenses, unless he had rendered himself a party to the proceedings. Were it otherwise, what intolerable injustice might be inflicted on any man, by exposing him to the payment of some hundreds of pounds, in consequence of his being proposed to represent Westminster without his concurrence! If such a proposition as the present were acceded to, it would be advisable to pass a general bill, to declare how such expenses should henceforward be borne: otherwise parliament would unquestionably be called upon to pay all future charges of a similar nature. The sum also appeared to him to be extravagant. He could not conceive how so large a sum as 800*l.* could be expended in the construction of hustings, as the materials of which they were composed were not afterwards wasted.

Mr. Brougham observed, that having been of counsel against the high bailiff, when he brought his actions, he could inform his hon. and learned friend, that the expense was about 1600*l.* In the action against Sir Francis Burdett, he was nonsuited; but lord Cochrane, against whom he proceeded for a moiety of that sum, suffered judgment to go by default, and a writ of inquiry was executed before the sheriff. On that occasion, he, and a learned friend of his, minutely investigated every item of which the account was composed, and were unable to reduce it. The expense was not incurred merely by the purchase of timber for the hustings, but also by the hiring of poll clerks and their assistants, whom the high bailiff was bound to pay out of his own pocket. The act was temporary: it had either expired or would expire this year, and the question of its renewal might be discussed hereafter; but in the mean time, justice ought to be done to the high bailiff.

Mr. Wynn observed, that at the election for Westminster in 1812, no poll had taken place.

How, then, could such an expense as 800*l.* be incurred in a few hours?

Mr. Brougham replied, that it was imperative on the high bailiff to have the hustings and the poll-clerks ready. It was impossible for him to know whether or not there would be a poll, until the time arrived; and such a city as Westminster could not be exposed to all the tumult that would arise from a delay in the commencement of the poll, in the event of its being demanded.

Mr. Wynn said, that the mistake was on the part of the high bailiff, in not bringing his action for the whole of the expenses against the noble lord, who was a candidate, and from whom he had obtained only a moiety.

Mr. Bathurst begged to inform the hon. and learned gentleman, that a motion was made on that subject; but the court held, that as there was no joint interest in the candidates, the liability was separate. The burden was thrown on the high bailiff after he had purchased his office, and he was, therefore, entitled to compensation. As to his hon. friend's objection to the form of the motion, that might easily be obviated, by voting the sum in the shape of a grant to his Majesty, to enable him to remunerate the high bailiff. He deprecated any further delay in the decision on this claim. The matter had been before them for four years, and ought to be determined.—As to reprinting the report of the committee, the expense would be half as much as the sum now claimed.

Mr. Barclay thought that the present vote might go to establish an important precedent that would apply to other places, in one of which—he alluded to the borough of Southwark—a considerable expense had, on a late occasion, been thrown on the returning officer. He suggested, that some legislative measure on this subject should be adopted

Mr. Lockhart observed, that the act in question was confined to Westminster, and expired in the present year; but the house would do well if they regarded the peace of that city, to adopt some further legislative proceedings on the subject.—As to the question before the committee, it should be remembered, that the high bailiff was subject to the penalty of being proceeded against by indictment or information, if, in the event of an election, he did not in the first instance take on himself the expense of erecting hustings and providing poll-clerks. He begged leave to say, in behalf of the high bailiff, that, consulting the peace of this large city, he, on the occasion in question, under very inauspicious circumstances, paid out of his own pocket above 1,500*l.* for the purpose of making the arrangements prescribed by the act of parliament. Half of that sum he had never been repaid.—He trusted, therefore, that this gentleman, who had already been kept four years out of his money, would not be allowed to suffer for his obedience to an act of parliament; but that the committee would shew, in his example, that when any duty was cast on an individual, for the public service, parliament would not permit that individual to be injured in consequence of his performance of it.

The Chairman intimated that the technical difficulty involved in the form of the hon. gentleman's motion had been obviated, by converting it into a resolution for granting a sum not exceeding 800*l.* to his Majesty to enable him to remunerate the high bailiff of Westminster, &c.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, it was evident that a burden was thrown on this gentleman, which was not in the contemplation of parliament. The case was one of such peculiar hardship, that he should certainly not oppose the grant.—The house then resumed, and the report of the committee was ordered to be received to-morrow.

BUILDING OF CHURCHES.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer having moved the order of the day, for the house to resolve itself into a committee of the whole house, to take into consideration that part of the speech of the lords commissioners to both houses, on the opening of the session, which related to the building of churches,

Mr. Tierney rose, and said, that soon after the holidays he intended to move, that the sum granted by parliament for the erection of a monument to commemorate our victories by sea and land, be laid out in the erection of a parish church or churches.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that the subject to which he was about to call the attention of the house was not connected with that alluded to by the right hon. gentleman, in as much as an economical arrangement for the building and enlarging of churches throughout the kingdom, was very different from the erection of a monumental church upon a great scale of ornamental architecture. At the same time, he was far from being disinclined to coincide with the view of the right hon. gentleman on this subject—(Hear, hear, hear)—for he thought, that if the right hon. gentleman would do him the favour to communicate with him on the subject, it would be found that they did not disagree. His own opinion was, that nothing could be more fit, than that national monuments should be rendered applicable to purposes of general utility.—(Cheering.)

Mr. Tierney expressed great satisfaction at what had fallen from the right hon. gentleman. It was so much better that this view had been adopted in that quarter in which it could be most advantageously carried into execution, that he could not but congratulate the house upon it.

The house then resolved itself into a committee, and that part of the speech of the lords commissioners to both houses, which related to the want of accommodation for public worship, was read as follows:

"The Prince Regent has commanded us to direct your particular attention to the deficiency which has so long existed in the number of places of public worship belonging to the established church, when compared with the increased and increasing population of the country.

"His Royal Highness most earnestly recommends this important subject to your early consideration, deeply impressed, as he has no doubt you are, with the just sense of the many blessings which this country, by the favour of Divine Providence, has enjoyed; and with the conviction, that the religious and moral habits of the people are the most sure and firm foundation of national prosperity."

The Chancellor of the Exchequer then rose, and said, that he believed there never had been a communication from the throne which was more entitled to be received with gratitude and respect by the public, than that part of the speech which had just been read. More than a century had now elapsed, since Parliament had interfered to promote the erection of places of public worship, and that interference, though attended with considerable expense, had been very imperfect in its execution*. Since that time, no further steps had been taken by public authority. The population,

* On the 29th of March, 1711, her majesty queen Anne sent the following message to the house of commons.

"ANNE R.

"Her majesty having received an address from the archbishop, bishops, and clergy of the province of Canterbury, in convocation assembled, to recommend to the parliament the great and necessary work of building more churches within the bills of mortality, is graciously pleased to approve so good and pious a design; and does, accordingly, very heartily recommend the carrying on the same, to this house, particularly in and about the cities of London and Westminster; and does not doubt but effectual care will be taken in this matter, which may be so much to the advantage of the protestant religion, and the firmer establishment of the church of England."

Whereupon the commons resolved, "That the humble thanks of this house be returned to her majesty, for her majesty's most gracious message, in recommending so good and pious a design, as the building of churches in and about the cities of London and Westminster; and to assure her majesty, that this house will enable her majesty to make an effectual provision for the carrying on so good and necessary a work:" and appointed a committee to draw up an address upon the said resolution, and upon the debate of the house.

April 6. Mr. Annesley reported from the committee, to whom the petition of the minister, churchwardens, and several other inhabitants of Greenwich, in the county of Kent, and several other petitions, were referred, and who were also to inquire what monies remain in the hands of the commissioners for rebuilding the cathedral church of St. Paul's, and consider what the produce of the duties in being, appropriated for that purpose, may amount to for the time to come, and make an estimate of what will be necessary for finishing and adorning the said church, and other the purposes in the acts mentioned, for building the cathedral church of St. Paul's; and also to consider what churches are wanting within the cities of London and Westminster, and suburbs thereof, and report the same to the house; That the committee had considered the several matters to them referred, and had directed him to report how the same appeared in relation thereunto, and had come to a resolution, which they had also directed him to report to the house, and he read the said report and resolution, and afterwards delivered the same in at the table, where the same were read, and the resolution agreed to, viz. "That, in the several parishes in and about the suburbs of the cities of London and Westminster, 50 new churches are necessary to be erected for the reception of all such as are of the communion of the church of England, computing 4,750 souls to each church." and then the said report was referred to the consideration of the committee of the whole house, who were to consider farther of the supply.

April 9. The Speaker, with the house, waited on her majesty, at St. James's, with the following address:

"Most gracious sovereign; we your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the commons of Great Britain in parliament assembled, have, with the utmost satisfaction, received your majesty's gracious message, recommending to us the great and necessary work of building new churches, in and about the cities of London and Westminster.—We are sensible how much the want of them hath contributed to the increase of schism and irreligion, and shall not fail therefore to do our parts towards the supplying that defect, being entirely disposed to promote every thing that is for the interest of the established church, and the honour of your majesty's reign.—Neither the long expensive war in which we are engaged, nor the pressure of heavy debts, under which we labour, shall hinder us from granting to your majesty whatever is necessary to accomplish so excellent a design, which, we hope, may be a means of drawing down blessings from Heaven on all your majesty's other undertakings, as it adds to the number of those places, where the prayers of your devout and faithful subjects will be daily offered up to God, for the prosperity of your majesty's government at home, and the success of your arms abroad."

To which her majesty returned this answer:

"Gentlemen, your address is extremely acceptable to me, as it is a proof of your zeal for the interest of the established church, and for the advancement of religion: I will take care that what you grant, shall, in the most speedy and effectual manner, be applied to the good purpose for which it is intended."

In the 9th of Anne, an act was passed (c. 22.) "for granting to her majesty several duties upon coals for building 50 new churches in and about the cities of London and Westminster, and the suburbs thereof." By that act, her majesty was authorized to nominate commissioners, to inquire in what parishes the said new churches were most necessary to be built, (with towers or steeples to each of them,) but it was specially enacted, that one of them should be erected in the parish of East Greenwich in the county of Kent.

By the 10th Anne, c. 11. the time given to the commissioners by the former act was enlarged, and provision was made for rebuilding the parish church of St. Mary Woolnoth, in the city of London, which however, had been gradually increasing, and it was now little less than double what it had been when the attempt, to which he alluded, was made. It was not surprising, therefore, that the public should have looked with a great degree of solicitude to some proposition of the nature of that which he was about to submit to the committee. Nothing, in fact, could have justified so long a delay, but the great difficulties which the state had had to encounter, and the long and expensive wars in which we had been engaged. During that period, great advances had been made in conferring upon the country the benefits of a resident and moderately endowed clergy; but still there existed a melancholy deficiency in places of public worship. This want of accommodation, which had been greatly increased by the concentration of our population in the metropolis, and other great towns, rendered it the duty of parliament to take this subject into their most serious consideration. Several parts of the metropolis, which, about sixty years ago, consisted of fields, were now covered with buildings, and numerously inhabited, and many towns in the country, which were thinly peopled, contained at present several thousand souls. By the returns which had been laid upon the table, by the command of his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, the committee would perceive, that the number of churches and chapels in the different dioceses would not accommodate one half of the inhabitants. He believed, that, in support of a fact so generally known, he might rest on the ground of public notoriety; but, as it might be more satisfactory to refer to official documents, he would take the liberty of directing the attention of the committee to them.

The first of those accounts contained the following abstract of the totals of parishes wherein the population amounted to or exceeded 2000, of which the churches would not contain one half.

was one of the 51 churches directed to be rebuilt by the 22 Charles 2. c. 11. but which, for the conveniency of the inhabitants, had been only repaired.

In the 12th Anne, an act was passed (c. 17.) to vest in the commissioners so much of the street near the May Pole in the Strand, as should be sufficient to build one of the said 50 churches upon.

By the 7th Geo. 1. c. 14. it was directed, that the parish church of St. Giles in the Fields, in the county of Middlesex, should be rebuilt, instead of one of the said 50 new churches.

It appears, however, that, after all these exertions on the part of the crown and the legislature, only eleven new churches were built.

The second account contained the following abstract of the totals of parishes wherein the population amounted to or exceeded 4000, of which the churches would not contain one fourth.

From these accounts, he had extracted a list of several parishes, in which the excess of population above the capacity of churches and chapels was most enormous. For instance, in the Diocese of London.

In Lambeth, in the county of Surrey, the population was 45,000, and the churches and chapels would contain only 6,000. In the city of London, however, the accommodation in the churches considerably exceeded what the inhabitants required. That city contained within its walls 91 parish churches for a population of 55,484 persons. This was the case in all the ancient cities of the kingdom, of which the parishes were in general small, and the churches very numerous. Norwich, Lincoln, Canterbury, and, indeed, all our cities which had their origin during the supremacy of the church of Rome, were amply provided with churches; but in those towns which had been built, or greatly enlarged, since the Reformation, the case was very different. In Liverpool, out of 94,376 inhabitants, 21,000 only could be accommodated in the places of public worship belonging to the established church. In Manchester, the population was 79,459, and 10,950 only could be accommodated. In those two places, then, and in the parish of St. Marylebone, there were 208,809 persons, who could not obtain access to their churches and chapels. The excess of population, above the capacity of the places of public worship, was certainly most striking in London and Chester; but, it appeared by the returns which were then upon the table, that it was very great in some other dioceses, and more especially in Winchester and York. But the excess of population in different parishes, above the capacity of the churches and chapels, was not the only evil. There were many other religious duties, besides the performance of divine service, which a clergyman, however zealous and diligent, could not properly discharge, if he had a cure of 50,000 souls. How was it possible to administer the sacrament, to perform the funeral rites, and celebrate baptisms and marriages, in a solemn and impressive manner, in a cure so extensive? Where the duties were so numerous, it was morally impossible that they could be performed with that attention and investigation which they required. Impositions might pass unnoticed, and thus the civil rights of individuals might be most materially affected. (Hear.) To illustrate this part of his argument, he would take the liberty of reading two short extracts from a valuable work recently published by the rev. Richard Yates, chaplain to his Majesty's Royal Hospital, Chelsea. That gentleman gave the following account of the performance of a Sunday's duty for a friend:—"I attended at the church* at nine o'clock, on account of expected marriages, the service was once performed; then the full morning service, the rector preaching the sermon: after the departure of the congregation, the service for churching of women twice performed; afternoon, full service, prayers, and sermon; after which, seventeen children baptised; then seven funerals performed, the burial service read over seven times:—concluding between seven and eight o'clock in the evening: the whole of which, except the morning sermon, I performed as the duty of the curate; and this was understood to be no more than the average Sunday employment."—In another part of that work (page 355.) the following statement was made by the rev. Cecil Wray, of the duties performed in the parish church of Manchester. "There are, upon an average, from forty to fifty christenings every Sunday afternoon, besides christenings on the week-days; and on some of the great festivals, as Christmas-day, Easter-day, and Whitsunday, there are generally from one hundred and twenty to one hundred and forty. On the first day of the present year, I myself christened ninety-three children. Nor is it uncommon to have fifteen or twenty marriages at one time in the parish church. On the 6th of February, there were ninety-nine couples married. Throughout the whole of the present year, the banns of marriage published every Sunday morning for the first, second, and third time of asking, have seldom been less than one hundred and twenty in number, on one occasion they were one hundred and fifty-six."—Having thus shewn the extent of the evil which now existed, the right hon. gentleman said, he should proceed to state to the committee the outline of the remedial measure which he intended to submit to them. He proposed that a grant, to the extent of one million sterling, should be raised by an issue of exchequer bills, and applied, as occasion might require, in the erection of churches and chapels, under the direction of commissioners to be appointed by the crown, in the same manner as was adopted in the last session of parliament, for the encouragement of public works. This plan, he conceived, would enable the commissioners to carry the great object into execution with more certainty and effect, than could be done by an annual grant; and would also enable the people to ascertain the extent of parliamentary aid to which they might look. The grant might be exhausted in four or five years, or probably less: and he proposed, that the sums raised in each year should be made good out of the aids of the succeeding year. In the reign of queen Anne, thirty-one commissioners were appointed by the crown: certain duties arising from coals were vested in their hands, and, in the whole, they were enabled to build and complete eleven churches. The present grant would enable the commissioners to build a great number of churches, not in the metropolis and its vicinity only, but in any district in the country in which they might appear to be wanted. In granting aid, they would be regulated by a combined view of the extent and population of the different parishes, the want of accommodation in the existing churches, and the ability of the district to bear the burden requisite for supplying the deficiency. The public money ought only to be given in aid of a fair exertion on the part of the district: where the commissioners were convinced of the inability of the district to complete the undertaking of itself, they would interfere; but rather with a view to assist than to support the whole charge. He had already observed, that, in many parishes, the population was too numerous, and the extent too great, for the pastoral care of one incumbent. It was desirable, therefore, that power should be given to the king in council, to divide any parish into two or more distinct parishes, for all ecclesiastical purposes, but without affecting the poor, or other parochial rates. In all cases, however, the consent of the patron would be required, as the utmost respect should be paid to private rights; and the new churches of such divided parishes should remain chapels of ease during the incumbency of the existing incumbent. On his death, resignation, or removal, they should be rectories, vicarages, or perpetual curacies, according to the nature of the original parish, and be subject to the same laws and regulations, as to presentation and otherwise. In any case, in which the commissioners should be of opinion, that it was not expedient to divide any populous parish into separate and distinct parishes, they should have power to divide them into ecclesiastical districts, or to build, or aid the building of chapels, to be served by curates to be appointed by the incumbent of the parish. In these cases, the patronage of the district church should belong to the patron of the parish-church; the curates should receive such salaries as the commissioners should assign to them, and should not be removable without the consent of the bishop; and no banns should be published, or marriages, &c. had, in any such church or chapel, until after the death, resignation, or avoidance of the incumbent at the time of the consecration of the church or chapel. The objects, therefore, to which the commissioners would have to attend were—1st, The complete ecclesiastical division of parishes; 2dly, The district division of parishes, not affecting the endowments of the existing incumbent; 3dly, The building of parochial chapels; and, as far as possible, aid for these purposes would be afforded by parliament. The evil of the great deficiency of churches must be apparent to every gentleman who heard him, and it must be obvious also, that, without the greatest exertions of parochial funds and private liberality, the munificence of parliament could not provide a sufficient remedy. There were twenty-seven parishes, in each of which, the excess of population above the capacity of the churches and chapels, was more than 20,000 souls; and it was estimated, that not less than seventy-seven churches would be required, to afford such moderate accommodation as to allow one-third of the inhabitants of those parishes to attend divine worship at the same time. He had made no deduction for those inhabitants who were not members of the established church; for, without meaning any disparagement to the dissenters, he thought, that as the church derived support from all, it ought to provide accommodation for all; and he believed that many who did not now attend the established church, had not voluntarily forsaken it, but that the church had shut her doors on them. (Hear, hear.) He had calculated that so many churches would be wanted to provide accommodation for one-third of the inhabitants, because, he did not think it necessary that the church should be sufficiently large to contain the whole of the parishioners at the same time; indeed, it was well known, that, owing to infancy, infirmity, sickness, and domestic avocations, a large proportion were unable to attend: but, in order that all might be accommodated in the course of the day, he intended to provide, that in the new churches and chapels, there should be an additional or third service, with a third sermon, on Sundays, and on Good-Friday and Christmas-day. But, after these churches and chapels were erected, there would remain a prodigious number of parishes which could accommodate only a small portion of their inhabitants; and, therefore, without the co-operation of private funds, the intended measure would be very incomplete. The commissioners, he feared, would not be able to afford assistance to parishes containing less than 10,000 souls; but he looked with confidence to those persons who had expressed a wish to aid the completion of so good a work. A very respectable society had been formed, and, from their contributions, he anticipated great assistance. In the course of a few years, therefore, if the zeal and piety of the present day did not relax, every individual might be enabled to participate in the public worship of the established church; and he fervently hoped, that this most desirable object would be accomplished, as he was convinced, (to repeat the words of the speech from the throne) "that the religious and moral habits of the people are the most sure and firm foundation of national prosperity." (Hear, hear.) It only remained for him to state, in what manner the ministers, serving those new churches and chapels, were to derive their support. He intended to propose, that their incomes should arise from a moderate rent to be set on the pews, and be paid half-yearly, on Christmas and Midsummer-days. It was, however, by no means intended, that the whole of the pews should be allotted to this purpose. On the contrary, he meant to propose, that, before the consecration of any church or chapel, one seat or pew, sufficient to hold six persons at least, should be set apart in the body or ground-floor of the church or chapel, and near to the pulpit, for the use of the minister and his family; that other seats, in some other convenient part of the church or chapel, capable of containing not less than four persons, should be set apart for the use of the minister's servants; and that pews, sittings, or benches, in every such church or chapel, to be marked with the words "Free Seats," amounting in the whole to not less than one fifth, or one sixth, of the whole of the sittings, should be set apart for the use of poor persons, for ever. (Hear, hear, hear.) He had already said, that the utmost respect would be paid to private rights. Whether, therefore, the parish should be divided wholly or partially, the presentation of the new parish, or of the district church, would be vested in the patron of the original church. In the case of parochial chapels, the patronage would be vested in the incumbent of the parish, the person who was spiritually answerable for the conduct of the whole. He believed, that the twenty-seven parishes to which he had already alluded, embraced every species of ecclesiastical patronage. The patronage of four was in the crown; of two, in the archbishop of Canterbury; of three, in the bishop of London; of one, in the archdeacon of London; of six, in colleges; of two, in chapters or lay corporations; in one, the incumbent was elected by the parishioners; and the remaining eight belonged to private patrons. He would not occupy the attention of the committee any longer, and, indeed, he could not but think that the resolution which he intended to submit to them would receive their unanimous approbation. This was a subject which came home to every gentleman, and he hoped, that they would consider it without any party feeling. On questions of such a description, there ought to be the greatest possible unanimity of sentiment and spirit of co-operation. (Hear, hear.)—The right hon. gentleman concluded with moving, "That his Majesty be enabled to direct exchequer bills, to an amount not exceeding one million, to be issued to commissioners, to be by them advanced, under certain regulations and restrictions, towards building, and promoting the building of additional churches and chapels in England."

Captain Waldegrave expressed his approbation of the general plan of the right hon. gentleman. It was most desirable that the large part of our population, now unprovided for, should obtain accommodation in places of public worship.

General Thornton said, the proposed measure had his full approbation. He hoped, that the money voted by parliament for the erection of a monument to commemorate our victories by sea and land, would be laid out in the building of churches and chapels.

Sir Charles Monck thought, that the good effect of the measure proposed by the right hon. gentleman, would, in a great degree, be defeated, unless the manner of performing the service in our established churches underwent considerable modification. Nothing was more likely to reclaim the dissenters—he did not speak this in an invidious sense—to the established church, than an alteration in the manner of performing service*. Without some modification, he was afraid that little moral and re-

* At the Restoration, Charles II. issued a commission to several bishops and non-conformists, directing them to meet in the Savoy, in the Strand, to hold a conference respecting a review of the liturgy. The commissioners met, but, after several debates, the conference ended without an accommodation.—(All the papers relating to this proceeding are collected in a book entitled "The History of Non-Conformity as it was argued and stated by commissioners on both sides appointed by his majesty King Charles II. in 1661." 8vo. edit. 2d. 1703.) In 1668, another attempt to effect an accommodation between the church and the protestant dissenters, was set on foot by Lord-Keeper Bridgman, and others; an account of its failure is given by Burnet. (History of his own Times, Vol. I. p. 249. See also 4 Neal's History of the Puritans.) Shortly after the Revolution, King William was very desirous of effecting an accommodation, and some steps were taken, but unsuccessfully, for that purpose. (See 3 Kennett, 225.)—In 1789, the duke of Grafton published a pamphlet entitled, "Hints to the New Association," and recommending a revisal of our liturgy, &c. In February, 1790, two pamphlets were published in opposition to the Duke's Hints. To these Dr. Watson, the late bishop of Landaff, wrote a reply under the title of "Considerations on the expediency of revising the Liturgy and Articles of the Church of England, by a consistent Protestant." In his Life, written by himself, vol. 1. p. 392, he says, "I had at the time some conversation with the duke of Grafton on the propriety of commencing a reform, by the introduction of a bill into the house of lords, for expunging the Athanasian creed from our liturgy; and we had, in a manner, settled to do it; but the strange turn which the French revolution took about that period, and the general abhorrence of all innovations, which its atrocities excited, induced us to postpone our design, and no fit opportunity has yet offered for resuming it, nor probably will offer itself, in my time." In page 393, he says, in answer to a letter from the Duke, "I concur with your Grace in wishing the motion (respecting the expunction of the Athanasian creed from the liturgy) to be made, and notice of making it to be given in the way you mention. No distance or business shall hinder me from appearing in my place in the House of Lords, on the day the point shall be debated, and standing up with my best ability in support of your motion. You thought of mentioning the subject to the Archbishop of Canterbury; I consider that as a candid proceeding, suited to the importance of the subject; and I suggest to Your Grace's consideration a circumstance of which you can form a much better judgment than I can,—Whether it would not be proper to mention it to the King in the first instance. The Windsor anecdote would induce me to think that the king would have no objection, and his concurrence would facilitate the measure. But if he should object, it may then admit a deliberation, whether, in foro conscientiæ, Your Grace should proceed." In page 395, he says, "The Windsor anecdote here alluded to, was told me by the late Dr. Heberden:—The clergyman there, on a day when the Athanasian creed was to be read, began with Whosoever will be saved, &c.; the king, who usually responded with a loud voice, was silent; the minister repeated in an higher tone, his Whosoever; the king continued silent; at length, the Apostles' creed was repeated by the minister, and the king followed him throughout with a distinct and audible voice."

Bishop Burnet wrote a great deal to illustrate and modify the damnatory sentences of the Athanasian creed; but, Archbishop Tillotson declared to him, "The account given of Athanasius's creed seems to me in no wise satisfactory. I wish we were well rid of it."

Sir William Forbes, in his life of Dr. Beattie, I. 271, says, When Dr. Beattie told the king (in a conversation which he was permitted to have with him) that the Scotch clergy sometimes prayed a quarter, or even half an hour at a time; his Majesty asked whether that did not lead them into repetitions? The doctor said, "it very often did."—"That," said the king, "I do not like in prayers; and, excellent as our liturgy is, I think it somewhat faulty in that respect."

ligious improvement could be expected from additional churches. When he considered the state of things in those parts of the country where there was a want of accommodation, and adverted to the state of morals and religion in those parts which were most splendidly endowed, he was led to entertain considerable doubts as to the benefit which would be derived from new churches, without some farther change. In those parts of the country in which the population had increased most of late years, churches were scarce, but there were many parts of the country where the population was very large in old times, greater indeed than it was now. In Norwich, for instance, there were 39 parishes, while, by the last returns, the population was only 38,000. Was Norwich, with this ample provision of churches, a comparatively moral and religious town? He recollected that Durham had also many churches, yet the population was only from eight to 10,000, whereas Newcastle, a very large town, had not above four or five churches. But he never heard that Durham was more remarkable for morals than Newcastle. In travelling over England, he believed it would be found, that where there were most churches, the people were far from being the most exemplary in their morals. The churches were formerly open at all times, as they were now in foreign countries, and the people were always going to them. There ought to be some modification in the manner of performing the worship—it ought to be more frequently performed in a day. He thought, also, they ought to take into consideration the present endowments of the church, and see whether there was not a large proportion of them employed in a manner not at all calculated to promote the interests of religion, —whether the revenues of prebendaries, &c. might not be applied to the purpose for which money was now asked from the nation at large. Nothing ought to be taken from the nation till an investigation into these things shewed the necessity of the measure. The right hon. gentleman had said, he wished the sum to be granted by parliament all at once, rather than as the exigency of the case might require. He was not exactly of his opinion; because, if they were determined that the provision was deficient, they ought to make up their minds what was necessary to meet the deficiency. He wished to learn why they were to decide at once that 1,000,000*l.* was to be the sum? Why so much as 1,000,000*l.*; or why no more? He should then say a word as to where the money was to come from. He did not exactly know what there might be to spare in the church establishment; but he did not like to see the whole sum taken from the nation at large. He would much rather have had the right hon. gentleman come down to the house with a proposition for providing, in each county, some board of commissioners, or some tribunal that might have made a proper representation to parliament, and have stated that the population was too numerous for their churches, and they were willing to provide some portion of the expense of erecting others. He would rather have had the money raised in such a manner, than from the whole nation, when it would of necessity be applied only to a particular part.

Mr. Gipps asked, whether the right hon. gentleman meant that no part of the money would be allotted to parishes in which the population was less than 10,000.?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that the commissioners would not be able, perhaps, out of the money to be granted by parliament, to afford assistance to parishes containing less than 10,000 souls; but they would not be precluded from doing so. The liberality of private individuals might enable them to provide for the smaller parishes.

Mr. W. Smith wished to know, whether it was intended to make any regulations with regard to Scotland? There were parishes in that country very nearly, if not quite, forty miles in length. He himself knew a church that was thirty miles from some parts of the parish. He had received a letter from Invernessshire, expressing a hope that when the measure was brought forward with respect to England, something would be done with regard to churches in Scotland. In that country, the labours of the clergy were very severe, and very insufficiently requited*. With respect to the observations of an hon. baronet as to the religion

Bishop Hoadley was friendly to an alteration of our liturgy. He says, "Our liturgical forms ought to be revised and amended, only for our own sakes, though there were no dissenters in the land." Mr. Burke was averse to any alteration. In 1772, when a petition was presented "by certain of the Clergy of the Church of England, and certain of the Professions of Civil Law and Physic," praying to be relieved from Subscription to the 39 articles, he said, (See his works, vol. 10. p 1. 8vo. edit. 1812)—"Alter your Liturgy, will it please all even of those, who wish an alteration? Will they agree in what ought to be altered? And, after it is altered to the mind of every one, you are no further advanced than if you had not taken a single step; because, a large body of men will then say, you ought to have no liturgy at all. And then these men, who now complain so bitterly that they are shut out, will themselves bar the door against thousands of others. Dissent, not satisfied with toleration, is not conscience, but ambition."

* Mr. Cove, vicar of Sithney in Cornwall, in his "Essay on the Revenues of the Church of England," second edit. 1797, says, that the whole provision of the ministers of the Kirk of Scotland, was estimated, in the year 1755, at about 68,500*l.* per annum; which, being divided between 944 ministers, afforded to each of them, on an average, an annual income of 72*l.* This provision may have been augmented since; but, unless it has been considerably increased, the ministers are very insufficiently paid.—But the general state of our own clergy is not much better. In Wales, they are very badly provided for, and are consequently very illiterate. The late celebrated bishop of Rochester, when bishop of St. David's, used and morals of different places, he wished only to say, that it was somewhat more difficult to obtain a knowledge of them than of the population. He believed, that if the hon. baronet had known the city of Norwich better, he would have spoken with more respect of its morals. Besides its numerous churches, it had a considerable number of chapels, belonging to dissenters, which were capable of containing a larger proportion of people than those of any other city in the empire.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, the church of Scotland had, in proportion to its wants, equal claims to national support; but, as the forms of ecclesiastical government in that part of the kingdom were so different from those of England, it would be impossible to embody in the same act the provisions applicable to each country. His majesty's government, however, would not lose sight of the application.

Dr. Phillimore said, he perfectly agreed with the right hon. gentleman as to the great importance of the subject. The plan of dividing parishes was most material; it would give the inhabitants of those places a better opportunity of attending divine worship; and it would afford them the advantage of the more immediate pastoral care of the several incumbents. With regard to patronage, the right hon. gentleman had pointed out the only proper mode of its being regulated, and he most completely agreed with him.

The resolution was then agreed to, and the report was ordered to be brought up to morrow.

TITHE LAWS AMENDMENT BILL.] The following petition of landowners, farmers, and inhabitants of Grappenhall, was presented, and ordered to lie upon the table. "That the petitioners have long been subjected to the grievous burthen of the tithing system, which they have patiently submitted to in the hope that the wisdom of the house would devise the means of freeing the people of these realms from a grievance so oppressive; that the petitioners are called upon at this time, with increased promptitude and energy, to lay their complaints before the house, inasmuch as they are now required by the rector of the parish of Grappenhall, to pay annually, in kind, the full amount of tithe for every species of animal and vegetable production arising from the lands in the said parish, in lieu of the moduses, compositions, or other payments which have been demanded and received for more than a century past, and which are recognized in several terriers which appear to have been exhibited at visitations held in the years 1696, 1709, 1728, 1778, and 1783, which moduses, compositions, or other payments, are small in comparison to the demand now sought to be exacted; that the tithe system at all times, and more especially when enforced with the rigour which is now attempted, cannot fail to be a fruitful source of vexation, animosity, and of disgraceful quarrels, between the clergy and their parishioners, and to oppose an insuperable bar to the benefits which might and ought to flow from the duties and functions of the christian ministry; that the weight and burthen of tithes are peculiarly grievous and oppressive in these times of general distress, and are a subject of loud and general complaint throughout the nation; the petitioners, therefore, earnestly pray the house will take this subject into their serious consideration, and that they will devise the most effectual means to relieve a loyal, a patient, and a suffering people from a burthen which entails only misery and vexation, which is the bane of religion, peace, and good neighbourhood; and which fosters discontent, ill-will, and strife."

Mr. Curwen moved the second reading of this bill. In making that motion, he said it was not his intention to trouble the house with more than a few words. Considerable misunderstanding had taken place with regard to the bill, which he hoped would not exist, when its provisions were well understood. The question was not whether any thing was to be taken from the church, but whether it had a right to take what never properly belonged to it? It was not his intention to attempt in any way to injure the clergy, but it was his wish that justice should be done to all parties. Having stated thus much, he would merely repeat, that he did not intend to press the first part of the bill, relative to moduses.

Sir William Scott took the bill in his hand, and objected to it clause by clause. He thought its provisions would seriously affect the interests of the clergy. The most important part of it, he said, had been given up as untenable, after all the pains that had been taken to prepare the minds of the public for its reception by elaborate arguments, which, it was now admitted, had totally failed of their intended purpose. However, he was not disposed to forget the charitable maxim of de mortuis nil nisi bonum, and, therefore, should not fling a single reflection upon its grave. He should only venture to express a hope, that it might impress a lesson of caution to complain, that he was compelled to ordain many persons who knew no language but that of their mothers, and could scarcely read and write, because he could procure no others, and the stipend of the curates would not afford a superior education. In many parts of England, we have clergy, who, with all the Greek of Cyril, have not more than 100*l.* a year.—The revenue of the church of England has been stated by two writers—the late bishop Watson, in his "Letter to the Archbishop of Canterbury," printed in 1783, and Mr. Cove, in his work above mentioned. The learned prelate says, that the whole income of the church does not exceed 1,500 000*l* which would not yield, if it were equally divided, above 150*l.* a year to each clergyman. It is so inconsiderable, therefore, as not to admit of any diminution; but, he adds, that a somewhat better distribution of it might be introduced, with much advantage to the state, and without the least injustice to any individual. (See also his Life, vol. i. p. 159.)

and diffidence with respect to the other provisions of this bill, all of which appeared to him liable to objection, though not in the same degree with the one, which, after being considered as the great foundation of a reform, had been abandoned by its authors, as unfit to be further urged. He said, it would be necessary for him to go through the remainder of the bill clause by clause, for his intention was to dispute the propriety of its going to a second reading, and he had no other way of reaching that purpose, than by disputing the propriety of the several clauses, for general principle it had none; the only principle stated, was that which applied solely to the first clause, and that clause being now given up, and, of course, the principle on which it was bottomed, there remained no general principle which professed to support the remaining clauses, and, therefore, they could only be attacked separately, on their own provisions. He was sensible that this necessity would impose a burthen upon himself, and a still heavier upon his audience; but there was no choice; the bill offered no general principle on its behalf, and, therefore, could only be combated in its details.—The first remaining clause, (said the right hon. and learned gentleman,) is that which regards real compositions, and it professes to enact, that it shall not be necessary to produce the instrument under which such compositions took place, but that it shall be sufficient to state it generally, and prove it by usage only. Real compositions were agreements, by which the parson, with consent of patron and ordinary, granted a discharge for tithes in consideration of land or rent. These compositions were practicable till restrained by the statute of the 13th of Elizabeth: and they had had the effect of reducing in an enormous extent the patrimony of the church. 'The statute was made,' says Lord Coke, 'to prevent the decay of spiritual livings, dilapidations, the decay of hospitality, and the utter impoverishment of successors;' for vain was the triple fence which the law had erected against improvident compositions in the vigilance of the parson, the patron, and the ordinary. The parson is a man often in a state of dependence, ignorant of his rights, or, from a variety of causes, unable to maintain them. The patron has often an interest directly adverse to that of the benefice, if, as very frequently happens, he has lands in the parish upon which the rights of the benefice are to operate. And as to the case of the ordinary, it is evident that that can reach a little way towards the protection of the church. Several of these ordinaries are lay-persons, with no other connexion with the church than as possessing a most anomalous authority over it. And those who are the proper ecclesiastical magistrates of the church, can hardly be expected to give that personal attention which the urgency of the case requires. They are persons frequently living at a distance from the particular spots where the compositions take effect; sometimes persons of an advanced time of life, and very generally persons little conversant in business of that nature, or enabled to act upon their own knowledge and judgment in the particular transaction. Those who are at all acquainted with what has passed under the land-tax redemption act, or with what passes frequently under inclosure acts, can be no strangers to the very scanty protection which can be given to the property of the church, by the united care of all these guardians together, although the best which either the ancient or the modern law has been able to provide. After the first fervours of the reformation had subsided, when men began to look about them more coolly, and to survey the wrecks of church property which that great event had, through the influence of human passions, unavoidably produced, it was found necessary to stop the further progress of evils, by restraining the power of alienation; and this blessed statute, as it has been justly called, was one of the first-fruits of a settled reformation. Since that time no real compositions have been made; but those which were made before have been respected, where proved to have been so made. But the law expects a proof that they were actually made—that a mere non-usage of payment, which may have silently crept up, without any authority at all, without any other foundation than the negligence or other default of an incumbent or two, shall not be considered as a demonstration that the parson, the patron, and the ordinary had all executed a contract, but, that some proof must be afforded that such a contract had actually existed, if it now existed no longer. And surely, this is no unreasonable requisition; when it considered, that a mere non-payment is just as consistent with a temporary agreement between the parson and parishioners, as one that is perpetual, as being made under the proper authorities for that duration. Now, the intention of this clause is to throw down this barrier, to make it not at all requisite to shew that such composition ever was made, but that its existence is to be inferred from the mere fact of a non-payment. 'It shall be sufficient,' says the clause, 'to plead and allege generally that a composition real was made before the 13th of Elizabeth, the deeds or instruments of which have been lost or destroyed;' the mere pleading of all this shall be sufficient, without proof either of the existence, or of the destruction. Surely, nothing can be more evident, than that every bad modus will now be established in the form of a real composition. For if it be sufficient merely to plead it, this may be done, and will be done, in all cases: no payment of tithes before the 13th of Elizabeth will overthrow it; for the mere plea will sustain it that such a composition did take place in due time after the date of that payment; and thus the whole family of bad moduses will gain a settlement under the style and title of real compositions. Find that your modus will not do in its own real character, and you have nothing to do but to christen it a real composition, and then, by virtue of this clause, it will pass muster in spite of any anterior evidence that would have affected its existence as a modus. This is no vain terror; for the attempt has been repeatedly made to put this change of character upon pleas of discharge in courts of justice; but the enlightened vigilance of those courts has always resisted such attempts, and determined each plea by the rules that belong to its own original and genuine character, the modus by the evidence of immemorial usage, and the real composition by some evidence of the former existence of an actual contract.—The following clause appears in a still stronger degree liable to the same objection, of its being an attempt to supersede the necessity which the existing rules of law have established of producing some written evidence to support an exemption, which must have had a written and formal foundation. The preamble states, 'that whereas many lands, &c. were parcels of the possessions of the dissolved monasteries, and were granted away by the crown to be held under the same discharges from tithes under which they were held by the monasteries, and whereas by the loss of deeds and muniments, it is become difficult to deduce regular titles to the descent of such lands from the privileged monasteries, in consequence whereof (it is said) such discharges are likely to be lost, and the clergy to acquire tithes which the church never possessed.' What is meant by this last assertion it is very difficult to discover, because the tithes, before appropriation to the monasteries, must have belonged to the parochial churches from which they were taken, and even after they were appropriated to these religious houses, they belonged to bodies which were as essential portions of the church establishment as the parochial churches themselves, and, in the notions of those times, much more essential; the members of these bodies being deemed and denominated, the Religious, and the others, the mere Secular, clergy. In general, the original descent of such lands from the religious houses is by no means so difficult of proof as is insinuated in this preamble. The transfers of property from the monasteries to the crown, and from the crown to the grantees, were executed in formal and authenticated modes—by deeds registered in public offices still existing, where searches may be made, though not, it may be said, without trouble and expense. But upon whom is that burthen of trouble and expense to fall? Upon the party who has the general common-law-right to tithes, or upon him who has no such right, to an exemption, but who sets up a particular exemption from the general law, which he is bound to prove? Surely, nothing can be more reasonable than that he should be charged with the production of his own evidences, and that it should not be thrown upon the other party to prove, in the first instance, the negative of a plea of privilege. Now what is proposed in the present clause for the just security of church property? It is proposed by these careful guardians of the church, that, wherever it can be shewn that such discharges have been enjoyed, and reputed to be lawfully enjoyed as far back as living memory can go, it shall throw the onus on the other side. Is it possible to place such a matter upon a more insecure foundation? It is within the reach of a single life to establish such an exemption. A patron, the landed proprietor of a parish and residing in it, has nothing to do but to present a subservient pastor (or two in succession) and to put about a report; which his tenants will very readily receive and propagate, that his lands ought not to pay tithes as having formerly belonged to some distant abbey; and it is a complete recipe under this clause for a perpetual exemption, unless the clergyman (presented probably by the same patron) will take upon himself the burthen of giving it a most troublesome, a most invidious, and a most expensive contradiction. Strong nerves, a weighty purse, and persevering habits of inquiry, are, at least, necessary for such an undertaking; and the history of the church too often exhibits a lamentable deficiency in these qualifications. If this clause passes, there can be little doubt that the love of ease, and the fear of reproach and expense, will carry it into very effective execution.—The next clause certainly does not affect the church, for it is levelled only against lay-impropriators, who have better means of fighting their own battles, both in this house and out of it*. But it introduces the new and dangerous alteration into the law of tithes, of making mere living memory a valid foundation of these perpetual discharges; and there is too much reason to expect that such an alteration, so introduced into the law, will not confine itself long within the sphere of lay possessions of this kind; the analogy will be too tempting not to extend itself to ecclesiastical possessions.—The next clause purports to legalize all the illegal alienations of church property that have been made in violation of the statute of the 13th of Elizabeth, between the date of that statute and the year 1766, after such agreements, however sanctioned by the ordinary and patron, or by confirmatory decrees of chancery, were declared to be invalid by a solemn decision of that court. And it certainly is a very extraordinary thing how such a practice could have grown up under such sanctions in the face of that statute: but the fact is certainly true, that many exchanges had been made of tithes, or lands, for lands within that period of time, and which are now upon better consideration pronounced to be illegal. It has, I believe, happened but in a very few cases indeed, that there was a difficulty in finding the representatives of the family which had been the party to the exchange, and which certainly ought to be restored to those representatives if forthcoming, (for I agree perfectly that it would be a monstrous injustice for the clergyman to keep both,) and if such representatives could not be found, I presume that the crown, upon an office found, would be entitled. Let that matter be duly provided for in a separate and substantive bill; nobody could object to it; but I do not object to it, in the present case, merely on account of the society in which it is found; for it is objectionable in its own provision, that the exchange, however mischievous and detrimental to the church, and impugned upon the ground of original injustice, is, nevertheless, to be confirmed. Surely, it is exposing the property of the church to a most unreasonable hazard, to say, that, because the mere fiduciary possessor of a benefice (for such he is in legal consideration as applied to such a subject) has thought proper to make the most unjust sacrifice of the rights of his benefice for some private convenience of his own, that shall bind the benefice in all time coming, be the sacrifice ever so gross and palpable. The more equitable mode of disposing of such a subject is to rescind the bargain, and to remit the parties to their former possession. It could hardly operate with injustice in any case to the family who resumed the lands; for they must have had possession of the other lands long enough since the year 1765, or before, to bring them back more than a sufficient indemnification for all voluntary expenditures in inclosures, and drainages, and other improvements enumerated in the preamble to the clause.—The three following clauses being merely subservient to the execution of the clause just recited, will, of course, be involved in its fate, if it should be deemed unfit to be adopted.—The next substantive clause provides 'that where by reason of inclosures, or other alteration of lands, the precise limits of lands covered by moduses cannot be precisely ascertained, there the court shall issue commissions to ascertain the lands so-covered, or set out other lands of the same owner sufficient to secure the same.' How these commissions are to ascertain precisely lands covered by a modus, which lands are described to be precisely unascertainable, is not pointed out, nor how other lands of the same owner are to be substituted, if the same owner has no other lands. These are both very material desiderata in the execution of this project, if it be otherwise fit to be adopted. If the lands can be precisely ascertained by a commission, they are certainly already within the reach of the powers of the court. But where is the justice of releasing the owners of property from preserving the evidences of it, in the different arrangements of it which, for their own advantage, they choose to make? Why is the clergyman to meet a claim which neither the claimant nor himself knows for what? If a man pleads a composition, it is his duty to know, and to set forth, for what he compounds. Why is the tithe-holder to be dragged into a litigation, without knowing what demand he is to meet? and the explanation of the demand is only to be ascertained after the course of a long litigation, and of all the expense and anxiety that may belong to such an inquiry.—The last clause provides, 'that where issues are directed for trial of moduses, compositions or exemptions informally pleaded, the court shall direct them according to the true sense and meaning of the parties pleading the same, and shall not be obliged to direct them in the same terms as pleaded;' that is to say, that the court is to know the meaning of the party in the claim he makes better than the party himself, and are to shape his claim for him, not as he propounds it, but as they choose to propound it for him. Certainly, if this is confined to mere correction of form, it cannot be deemed otherwise improper than as it is perfectly unnecessary; for the courts have such a power already. But if it be meant to extend to a correction of substance, surely nothing can be more unjust than that the tithe-holder is to resist one demand, and after all the inconvenience incurred in that resistance, he is to find that the real claim is of a different nature and extent, and that the sagacity of the court is to provide him with a totally new subject to which his powers of resistance are to be applied."—Having thus examined the several clauses of the bill, the right hon. and learned gentleman asked the house, where could be the use of going into a committee? If he was right in his view of them, they could only be corrected by una litura, one entire obliteration. If referred to a committee, it could be only for the purpose of framing an entire new bill, differently constructed: that surely ought not to be attempted in a committee; a bill professing to regulate property of a very sacred nature, and which the legislature had always regarded, in spite of popular clamour, with peculiar tenderness, ought to undergo the most deliberate consideration of the house in all preliminary stages of legislation. It was enough for this bill that it was radically vitious in all its provisions; it was formed upon principles that admitted no prospect of reasonable reformation. He should therefore move, that the

* "At the dissolution of monasteries by statutes 27 Hen. VIII. c. 28. and 31 Hen. VIII c. 13. the appropriations of the several parsonages, which belonged to those respective religious houses, (amounting to more than one third of all the parishes in England) would have been by the rules of the common law disappropriated; had not a clause in those statutes intervened, to give them to the king in as ample a manner as the abbots, &c. formerly held the same, at the time of their dissolution. This, though perhaps scarcely defensible, was not without example, for the same was done in former reigns, when the alien priories (that is, such as were filled by foreigners only) were dissolved and given to the crown. And from these two roots have sprung all the lay-appropriations or secular parsonages, which we now see in the kingdom; they having been afterwards granted out from time to time by the crown. Sir H. Spelman says, these are now called impropriations, as being improperly in the hands of laymen." (See 1. Blackst. Comm. p. 386.)

but to christen it a real composition, and then, by virtue of this clause, it will pass muster in spite of any anterior evidence that would have affected its existence as a modus. This is no vain terror; for the attempt has been repeatedly made to put this change of character upon pleas of discharge in courts of justice; but the enlightened vigilance of those courts has always resisted such attempts, and determined each plea by the rules that belong to its own original and genuine character, the modus by the evidence of immemorial usage, and the real composition by some evidence of the former existence of an actual contract.—The following clause appears in a still stronger degree liable to the same objection, of its being an attempt to supersede the necessity which the existing rules of law have established of producing some written evidence to support an exemption, which must have had a written and formal foundation. These are both very material desiderata in the execution of this project, if it be otherwise fit to be adopted. If the lands can be precisely ascertained by a commission, they are certainly already within the reach of the powers of the court. But where is the justice of releasing the owners of property from preserving the evidences of it, in the different arrangements of it which, for their own advantage, they choose to make? Why is the clergyman to meet a claim which neither the claimant nor himself knows for what? If a man pleads a composition, it is his duty to know, and to set forth, for what he compounds. Why is the tithe-holder to be dragged into a litigation, without knowing what demand he is to meet? and the explanation of the demand is only to be ascertained after the course of a long litigation, and of all the expense and anxiety that may belong to such an inquiry.—The last clause provides, 'that where issues are directed for trial of moduses, compositions or exemptions informally pleaded, the court shall direct them according to the true sense and meaning of the parties pleading the same, and shall not be obliged to direct them in the same terms as pleaded;' that is to say, that the court is to know the meaning of the party in the claim he makes better than the party himself, and are to shape his claim for him, not as he propounds it, but as they choose to propound it for him. Certainly, if this is confined to mere correction of form, it cannot be deemed otherwise improper than as it is perfectly unnecessary; for the courts have such a power already. But if it be meant to extend to a correction of substance, surely nothing can be more unjust than that the tithe-holder is to resist one demand, and after all the inconvenience incurred in that resistance, he is to find that the real claim is of a different nature and extent, and that the sagacity of the court is to provide him with a totally new subject to which his powers of resistance are to be applied."—Having thus examined the several clauses of the bill, the right hon. and learned gentleman asked the house, where could be the use of going into a committee? If he was right in his view of them, they could only be corrected by una litura, one entire obliteration. If referred to a committee, it could be only for the purpose of framing an entire new bill, differently constructed: that surely ought not to be attempted in a committee; a bill professing to regulate property of a very sacred nature, and which the legislature had always regarded, in spite of popular clamour, with peculiar tenderness, ought to undergo the most deliberate consideration of the house in all preliminary stages of legislation. It was enough for this bill that it was radically vitious in all its provisions; it was formed upon principles that admitted no prospect of reasonable reformation. He should therefore move, that the second reading be postponed till this day six months.

Sir S. Romilly observed, that the course which the right hon. gentleman had taken was not quite according to parliamentary usage. Instead of discussing the principle of the bill, as was usual, upon the second reading, the right hon. gentleman had examined each particular clause, as if the bill were in a committee. As a justification for this he had been pleased to say, that the bill proceeded upon no general principle, or, if any principle was to be found in it, it was confined to the first clause, which was now abandoned. This, however, was a most unfair representation. The principle of the bill was to place tithes, as far as they were alienable like other property, upon a similar foundation with respect to evidence and to presumptions as other property rested on; and this principle would not be at all affected by the rejection of the first clause. To that clause he had always been unfavourable; he saw no reason why every landholder who chose to set up a modus, though there might be no evidence to support it, should have a right, as matter of course, to have it sent to be tried by a jury. If the present state of the law as to the directing of issues were to undergo any change, he would rather take away from a rector that right, which, he could hardly say by law, but certainly by the present practice of the courts, he was in possession of—that of having every modus, however clearly established in proof, sent to be tried by a jury, merely because it was his pleasure to require it. To the rest of the bill, however, he was in general friendly, though there were some clauses upon which he entertained doubt, and others which, he thought, might be considerably improved in the committee. He could not understand why tithes in lay hands, or during the time they were alienable by the church, should not be open to similar presumptions with all other property; and why a title to tithes in a layman, instead of acquiring strength, like a title to land, from a long possession, should, on the contrary, by the lapse of centuries, and the consequent loss of muniments, be rendered precarious and invalid. He considered tithes, whether in the clergy or the laity, as sacred as any other species of property. The abolition of tithes, instead of being an act of justice to the land-owner, would be the grossest injustice done in his favour. It would be to give him, who, by himself or his ancestors, had purchased only nine-tenths, the remaining tenth, to which he had not the shadow of right. But, as tithes ought to have the same protection in the hands of the owner as any other inheritance, it ought not to have that extraordinary and superstitious protection which, in innumerable cases, must produce great injustice. With other property, an undisturbed possession of sixty years gives a title against all the world, even against the crown. But where the church is concerned, a possession of ten times that length is not sufficient to afford a proprietor any securities. If a modus is set up as a defence to a demand for tithes, and if it can be shewn that that modus had its origin at any time since the days of Richard I., (that is, within the last six hundred years) the modus is void.—With respect to compositions real, the statute of the 13th of Elizabeth, which restrained them, had only a prospective operation. The legislature did not venture to do an act of such flagrant injustice as to annul the contracts which had been made by persons who were at the time by law fully competent to make them. But the injustice at which the legislature scrupled, had been done by the courts of justice, which, by refusing to receive any evidence of a real composition but the production of the instrument itself, had given to the statute a retrospective operation. The right hon. gentleman had been pleased to say, that there was no great hardship in this, because these real compositions were preserved in the registries of the bishops. But, with great submission, he believed that the right hon. gentleman was mistaken. Very few were in existence: in the course of a long practice, he had never seen more than four or five of them, and the very statement therefore, which was made by the right hon. gentleman, that, before the statute, such compositions had become very frequent, and that the evil was then rapidly increasing, contrasted with the very few instances in which they had since been established in courts of justice, proved, in the strongest manner, to how great an extent those decisions must have operated retrospectively.—With respect to those lands which were formerly part of the possessions of dissolved monasteries, and which in the hands of those monasteries were exempt from the payment of tithes, it was only proposed by the bill to dispense with the necessity of proving, by the production of deeds, that the lands were so held, and to leave the same room for presumption, from a long enjoyed exemption, as applied to other property. To require the production of deeds in all such cases, was to require that which must often be impossible. The law as now acted on often operated to divest individuals of the inheritance which had descended to them through a long series of generations, because their ancestors had not preserved, and transmitted to them, those documents which, in the accidents of private life, and the confusion of civil wars and public tumults, must necessarily have been lost or destroyed.—To so much of the bill as related to lay impropriators no plausible objection could be raised; and though, since the great case of the corporation of Bury*, it had been held by the courts of justice, that nothing should be presumed against a lay any more than against an ecclesiastical rector, yet the ground of that decision it was extremely difficult to discover, or why the alienation of this species of property by those who had full right to alienate it, should be to be proved in a different way from that of all other possessions. And all, indeed, that the right hon. gentleman could say upon this part of the bill was, that it was an innovation, and therefore dangerous, and that, if the law were so altered with respect to the laity, the example might be followed hereafter so as to affect the clergy. The pretended innovation, however, was only to abolish an extraordinary anomaly in our law, and to make this part of it consistent with the rest of our judicial system; and there could be little danger that the example would be followed, unless it were recommended by its beneficial effects. The truth was, that the present state of the law of tithes was injurious to the laity, to the clergy, and, what was still more important, to the true interests of morality and religion. It was such as to occasion and invite tedious, expensive, and vexatious litigations, often ruinous to the clergy who were induced to embark in them, and always prejudicial to their parishioners, by exciting hostility and animosity towards their pastors, in the place of respect and confidence.

Mr. Wetherell said, that his right hon. friend who opened the debate had with so much force and accuracy developed the injurious tendency and operation of the bill, that he conceived it hardly possible to add any further explanation on the subject; he should, therefore, presume to trouble the house for a very few moments only. The bill, as originally framed, proposed to subvert the law of tithes in every one of its material branches—in its general principles and maxims, in its rules of evidence and presumption, and in its rules of pleading. The whole system was to be completely expunged, and a new one substituted. Now, upon what notion was all this to be done? The law as it stood at present had been long established. The doctrines and practice which were now represented to be so unjust and oppressive upon the land-owner, the farmer, and occupier, carried with them the sanction of upwards of two centuries—they were most of them as old as the time of Queen Elizabeth. Surely, it was most strange to imagine, that the judges who had administered this system of law, should never have found out this imputed injustice and oppression, and that they who ought to be indifferent between the payer and the receiver of tithes, should have gone on, invariably and uniformly, in a course equally reproachful to their understanding and their impartiality. And yet, this reproach belonged to them, if the ideas of justice entertained by the hon. gentleman who introduced the bill were well founded. He respected the opinions of that hon. gentleman very much on all subjects connected with the interests of the landed property of the country, and, any bill connected with those interests came under very favourable auspices, if it was recommended by that hon. gentleman. But he must be allowed, on a very extensive subject of legal right and property, in the first place to inquire, what were the sentiments of those enlightened men, who, from the time of Queen Elizabeth to the present day, had graced the seat of judgment in all the tribunals of the country. If they looked at that question, they would find a perfect uniformity of opinion. The fact was very remarkable, that no one judge, in any court, or upon any occasion, had ever complained of, or suggested the most distant idea of, the unfairness or hardship of any one of those principles, or those rules, which, by this late and modern discovery, were now stigmatised as so grievous and intolerable. That house was not, indeed, bound to wait till the judges called upon it to legislate. But, it was most singular, that, in the lapse of two centuries, no man on the bench had ever had sagacity enough to make this discovery, or spirit enough to avow it. With regard to the provisions of the bill which were not given up, he thought they were of a kindred quality with those which had been abandoned, and he trusted that they would follow the same fate. One of those provisions related to a point of very ordinary occurrence, namely, the mode of proving what is termed a real composition; that is, a deed commuting tithes for an annual pecuniary payment, and supposed to have been entered into by the parson, the patron, and the ordinary before the restraining statute of Queen Elizabeth. If the occupier sets up a pecuniary payment of this sort, in lieu of the right to tithes in kind, he must, as the law now stood, either produce a deed, or prove, by reasonable evidence, that such an instrument once existed, though it might have been lost and could not now be produced*. The rule of law on this subject was the rule of evidence, and the question was, what ought to be deemed reasonable and fair evidence that such an instrument had formerly existed. Now, it was proposed by the clause in question, to dispense with all evidence whatever, and to allow mere naked assertion, without the slightest circumstance of proof, to be sufficient. How was this to be done? Why, the occupier of land was to be at liberty to allege, and plead generally, that there was a real composition before the 13th of Elizabeth, that is to say, in plainer terms, he would have nothing more to do than barely to affirm that there once existed a deed of composition, and that the deed had been lost. All historical facts of times, dates, places, and names, were to be dispensed with—all the common media of circumstances, or probabilities, were to be rendered unnecessary, and supplied by an arbitrary and absolute presumption. The original existence, and subsequent loss of the deed, was not to be matter of history or proof, but of simple imagination. It was to be an idea which, to borrow an expression of Mr. Burke, was to stand aloof "in all the nakedness and solitude of metaphysical abstraction." Surely such a strange doctrine as this, whatever term might be given to it, was nothing short of a direct spoliation of the rights of the clergy.—The next clause of the bill was much in the same spirit with the former. It related to that species of defence, against the claim of tithes, which consisted in shewing, that the land from which the tithes were demanded formerly belonged to one of the larger monasteries suppressed by the statute of Henry VIII. and entitled to an exemption from tithes on that ground. A defence of this kind depended on making out the proposition of fact, that the lands in question did belong to one of the suppressed monasteries. Now, it was notorious, in cases of this sort, generally speaking, that the land owner, if his defence were real and genuine, could adduce evidence, not perhaps demonstrative, but evidence upon which a jury would be authorized to find, that the land did belong to one of those monasteries. The archives of the court of augmentations, the proceedings under commissions, letters patent, and many other documents of a public nature, as well as the private conveyances from the parties who originally acquired the abbey lands from the crown, and other evidence of a documentary nature, were the sources of proof usually resorted to. Reputation might fairly be coupled with documents of this sort, and by these means a fair and rational conclusion, as to the identity of the lands as entitled to exemption, might be come to. Now, what was to be the new rule of evidence on this subject? Why, all historical traces and descriptions, all deductions of the title to the property were to be done away with. The occupier was not to be called upon to identify the possessions of any given monastery by any ordinary means of identification, but it was to be enough, if he brought forward a reputation, as far back as living memory extended, that the land belonged to one of the larger abbeys. Now, what was this, but to allow the most wild and vague rumour to ascribe to a monastery the possession of any particular estate, without any one link or circumstance of title, or connection, direct or indirect? Here again bare and naked assertion was to be substituted in the place of historical evidence. Upon the next clause in the bill he would make a few observations; it related to cases of commutations entered into by an incumbent, by which he took land in lieu of tithes. Bargains of this kind had been constantly treated by the courts of law as not binding in the successor, and he conceived the principle of allowing the successor to annul transactions of this kind to be so obvious, that it required no reasoning to support it. He said, many instances had occurred, in which a clergyman had been induced, or perhaps compelled, to take a scrap of land, in lieu of the most valuable tithes. It was true, that when a subsequent incumbent re-claimed the tithes, a difficulty sometimes occurred with respect to the restitution of the land given as an equivalent; for, it was difficult to find out who was entitled to the land, or, sometimes, the parties entitled to it were so numerous, that, practically speaking, there was no one to take it back again. Under those circumstances it undoubtedly sometimes occurred, that the clergyman re-possessed himself of the tithes in kind, and also retained the land given as an equivalent. Upon this subject he could only say, that he would willingly concur in passing a bill adapted to particular cases of that sort, in order to compel the land to be given up to the poor of the parish, or in any other mode, to be devested out of the clergyman. And, indeed, among the various and extensive provisions of the bill, this single point was the only one in which he could give it his concurrence.—There was another part of the bill which he could not refrain from adverting to. Upon every other subject of property and title, upon every other subject of civil right, certain rules of allegation and pleading were laid down, to which it was necessary to conform. And the rules of pleading had not imposed any peculiar hardship on those who set up a defence against claims to tithes. But the law in this respect was founded on general principles, applying indiscriminately. But when he looked into this bill, he found a most remarkable and extraordinary innovation. The bill went almost the length of saying, that, in setting up a defence against tithes, the party was to be absolved from all rules whatsoever. Now, if these rules were founded in good sense upon every other occasion, why were they to be considered as operating too strictly on this particular subject? Before he sat down, he would notice an argument of a general nature urged by his hon. and learned friend opposite (Sir S. Romilly) who seemed to think, that purchasers of landed property were often exposed to loss, in consequence of latent and unexpected demands to tithe being brought forward. He, however, differed with him in that respect. Whenever property was sold as tithe-free, it was always sold at a much higher price, and the exemption from tithe was always presumed by the purchaser to be most strictly made out. But, if land was not sold with that guarantee, the purchaser took it at a less price, and subject to all contingencies. It was not often that the purchaser was injured. The learned gentleman concluded with declaring, that he had now attained considerable experience in the law of tithes—that he could safely assert, that he had rarely known any fair, genuine, and well-founded defence, either by way of modus, or composition real, or by way of discharge as abbey land, or upon any other legal and regular ground of exemption or discharge, fail or miscarry. If he had thought that the law, as it stood, prevented a good defence, when in reality there existed one, and intercepted or obstructed its success; he should have been ready to consent to new-model the law of tithes. But, being convinced as he was, that the operation of this bill would be to give validity to every bad and fictitious defence, and destroy the undoubted rights of the church, he could consider it as little less than a bill of direct deprivation, under the colour of a bill to amend the law, and should give his most cordial support to the motion of his right hon. friend.

* In the case of Knight v. Hatsey, which was an appeal from the Court of K. B. to the House of Lords, the rule laid down was, that where the deed cannot be produced, some evidence must be given referring to the deed, or shewing that it did exist, independent of mere usage. (2 Bos. and Pul. 172.)

Mr. Smyth said, he could not give his assent to the bill. He had stated, when it was introduced, that he thought there were some difficulties on the subject, which it might be impossible to overcome, and he was satisfied, from the speeches of the right hon. gentleman (Sir W. Scott) and of the hon. and learned gentleman who had just sat down, that those difficulties could not be surmounted. The provisions of the bill were of a most injurious nature, as they tended to invade the rights of the church, which ought to be sacred, and, therefore, he felt it his duty to oppose the second reading.

Mr. Curwen rose to reply. He said, he was far from being satisfied by what had been advanced on the other side, that the house ought not to go into a committee on this bill. The principle of the measure was not at all affected by the abandonment of the first clause. The principle which pervaded the other clauses was, to assimilate the law of tithes to that of every other property; and he had not heard any thing to convince him, that the claims of the church, or of the lay impropriator, ought not to be limited. The right hon. gentleman (Sir W. Scott) had rejected every kind of limitation; but it should be remembered, that the clergy had been secured in the quiet possession of their property by the acts which limited the dormant claims of the crown *; and was it too much now to ask, that the land-owner should be secured against similar claims on the part of the church? Against limiting the claims of the lay impropriator, no satisfactory reasons had been urged. The hon. and learned gentleman (Mr. Wetherell) had said, that no one judge, in any court, or upon any occasion, had ever suggested the most distant idea of the unfairness or hardship of those principles or those rules by which the law of tithes was governed. When he moved for leave to introduce the bill, he had cited several cases to shew, that the greatest law authorities had, at different times, expressed dissatisfaction at the doctrine laid down in the case of the corporation of Bury v. Evans, that nothing should be presumed against a lay, any more than against an ecclesiastical rector †; and those authorities had not been weakened by any thing that had been said by the hon. and learned gentleman. The hon. and learned gentleman had borrowed an expression of Mr. Burke, and had been pleased to add, that this measure was a direct spoliation of the rights of the clergy. He was surprised, however, that the hon. and learned gentleman had forgotten, that Mr. Burke, who was certainly no enemy to the establishment, had strongly supported the motion which was made in that house in 1772, for leave to bring in a bill, for quieting the people against the dormant claims of the church ‡. It was a great mistake to say, that any injustice was intended to be done, either to the church or to the lay impropriator. The sole object of the bill

* The first act that limited the claims of the crown was the 21 James I. c. 2. Lord Coke (3 Instit. 188,) says, " Before the making of this statute, in respect of that ancient prerogative of the crown, that nullum tempus occurrit regi, the titles of the king were not restrained to any limitation of time: for that no statute of limitation that ever was made, did ever limit the title of the king to any manors, lands, tenements, or hereditaments, to any certain time. And where many records and other muniments, making good the estate and interest of the subject, either by abuse or negligence of officers by devouring time, were not to be found; by means whereof, certain indigne and indigent persons prying into many ancient titles of the crown, and into some of later time, concerning the possessions of divers and sundry bishopricks, dean and chapters, and the late monasteries, chauntries, &c. of persons attainted, and the like, have passed surreptitiously in letters patent, oftentimes under obscure and general words, the mannors, lands, tenements, and hereditaments of long time enjoyed by the subjects of this realm, as well ecclesiastical as temporall: now to limit the crown to some certain time, to the end, that all the subjects of this realme, their heirs and successors, may quietly have, hold, and enjoy, all and singular mannors, lands, tenements, and hereditaments, which they, their ancestors, or predecessors, or any other, by, from, or under whom they claime, have of long time enjoyed; this act was made and named from the house of commons, the body whereof consisteth of three parts. The first part is negative, and exclusive of the right and title of the king; the second part is affirmative, and establishing the estate of the subject; the third part secures the subject against the subject, viz. against patentees and grantees of concealments, defective titles or lands not in charge, and all claiming under them. A beneficial law, both for the church and commonwealth, in respect of the multitude of letters patent, and grants of these natures and qualities, and many of them of large extents and in generall words, and had passed through the hands of many indigent and needy persons, &c." And, in folio 191, he says, " Of the benefit of this act, the poor doe participate as well as the rich; for hereby (amongst other things) above an hundred lay hospitals, having had priests within them in those days to pray and sing for souls, &c. (if need were) are established against all vexations, and pretences of concealment."

By this act, the king was disabled from claiming any manors, lands, or hereditaments, except liberties and franchises, under a title accrued 60 years before the beginning of the then session of parliament, unless within that time there had been a possession under such title. But the efflux of time rendering this provision continually more ineffectual, the 9th of George III. c. 16, introduced one of a permanent kind, by limiting the king to 60 years before the commencement of the suit, or proceeding for recovery of the estate claimed.

‡ On the 17th of Feb. 1772, a motion was made by Mr. Henry Seymour, for leave to bring in a bill, "for quieting the subjects of this realm against the dormant claims of the church." The debate which followed is well summed up in the Annual Register. "A motion was soon after made, for leave to bring in a bill to quiet the possessions of the subject against dormant claims of the church. Many arguments were brought upon this occasion, to shew, that a limitation of this nature was as necessary with respect to the church, as it had been in regard to the crown; and that there was no more reason why the people was, to make the decisions of our courts consistent with the general rules of law; and for that purpose, he hoped that the house would consent to go into a committee, when such alterations could be made in the enactments, and such periods of limitation fixed, as might be deemed most just and reasonable.

Mr. Brougham said, he admitted that the rights of the church ought to be sacred, that is, they ought to be as sacred as those of other property, but, he denied, that they ought to be more sacred. The rights of individuals ought to be respected; but, how often had the legislature interfered with them, for the benefit of the community? It possessed the same power over the rights of the church. To shew that this power had been exercised in every part of the empire, he referred to the act of the Irish parliament, brought in by the noble lord opposite (Lord Castlereagh) which abolished the tithe of agistment:—to the act of Charles I. who, on coming to the crown of Scotland, carried through a measure for the universal abolition of tithes in that country;—and to the acts passed in England, in the reign of Edward VI. for exempting newly-cultivated land from tithe, for seven years: in the reign of William III. for fixing the tithe of hemp and flax at a certain small sum; and, in the reign of Geo. II. for exempting madder from tithe. In all those instances, the legislature had interfered with the rights of the church, for the sake of the public good. Why, then, should not the property of the church be left to the same legal protection which was deemed sufficient for every other right? By the 32 Henry VIII. an undisturbed possession of sixty years gave a title against all the world; and, by the 9th of George III. the claims of the crown were limited to the same period. But, in the case of the church, where a modus was set up as a defence to a demand for tithes, the land-owner must go back to a period of six hundred years *. He contended, that the claims of the church ought to be limited to a shorter period, in order that the laity might be secured in the quiet possession of their property. The gentlemen opposite seemed to forget, that the clergy were the first to oppose the maxim, that nullum tempus occurrit regi, and, accordingly, in the 39th of Elizabeth, an act should be disturbed in their possessions under the plea of immemorial time of the one, than under the nullum tempus power of the other. That the church now stood single, acting against the lay subjects of the crown, and superior, in point of law claims, to the crown itself, and that every subject in this free country should be put upon the same footing, in point of common law. Instances were pointed out of the heavy grievances that attended the revival of these dormant and obsolete claims; and one in particular, of a gentleman then present, whose family were losers to the amount of 120,000*l*. by a bishop's reviving a claim of this nature, though they had been in quiet possession of the estate in question above an hundred years.

"On the other hand it was said, that this power of reviving claims was absolutely necessary to the church, to preserve her from those encroachments, which the laity were always willing, if not endeavouring, to make upon her, that she had been sufficiently stripped at the Reformation; and that as our forefathers then saw the necessity of what was left being for ever secured to her, they for that purpose ordered that no length of time should be a bar to her claims. That the effects of this bill would fall particularly upon, and be peculiarly injurious to the poorer clergy, who were frequently unable to defend their rights, against the combination of rich farmers and the oppressions of their great neighbours; that the peculiar situation and quick succession of incumbents, made them particularly liable to suffer encroachments, and that it would be very hard, that the weakness or inability of the present possessor should deprive his successors of their property, and of the only means they had of support. That the nullum tempus claimed by the crown, was an engine in the hands of the strong to oppress the weak; but that the nullum tempus of the church, was a defence to the weak against the strong.

"It was replied on the other side, that most of these objections were guarded against by the provisions of the bill, in which the limitation is considerably extended in favour of the clergy, and a period of three incumbencies added to the sixty years which are allowed to the crown in the same case; that the gentleman who moved for the bill, and those who supported it, wished, and were ready, to admit of any further ease or advantage to the poor parochial clergy that could be pointed out, and that did not strike at the principles of the bill; and that the first of these had already made his proposal to the two metropolitans, and desired their lordships' assistance in it. But that, in fact, the poor clergy were only the mask upon this occasion to screen the rich; that poverty was used as an instrument to protect riches, and necessity employed, to guard and defend luxury and superfluity. The motion was opposed by the whole force of administration, and it was much complained of, that a bill brought in upon public grounds, and apparently for the public benefit, should not be allowed a reading. The majority, however, was not so great as might have been expected the numbers being 117 to 141, who opposed the question."—The Lord Advocate of Scotland gave as a reason in favour of the bill, though he voted against it, "that a law of a similar nature had passed in Scotland, and that the whole kingdom, clergy as well as laity, found the very best effects from it."—It may be proper to mention here, that the clergy in Scotland receive no tithes, but are paid certain fixed sums by the possessors of church lands. Their claims are not strictly speaking, limited to any period of prescription, but are subjected to the discretion of the court of session, constituted by the act alluded to by the learned lord into a court of commissioners of teinds, or church claims. There is a further modification of those claims, by the right of all proprietors of church lands to have their lands valued by a regular process for that purpose, beyond which valuation no claim can at any period be set up by the church. The only subject of litigation with them therefore is, what is called a process of augmentation, that is, an action before the court of commissioners for an increase of stipend at the pleasure of the court, upon shewing that the actual stipend is less than the valued teinds in the parish.

* In Chapman v. Smith (2 Ves. 506) Lord Hardwicke, speaking of the time at which a modus must was passed, "for the establishment of the bishoprick of Norwich, and the possessions of the same, against a certain pretended concealed title thereunto *." He denied that any innovations were intended on the property of the church. The clergy had gained much by lapse of time, and he did not wish to deprive them of what they had acquired. Formerly, and, indeed, down to the reign of Elizabeth, they were bound to provide for the poor out of their tithes. The act of 21 Henry VIII. c. 13. which regulated the residence of the clergy, was made, not only for the increase of devotion, and the good opinion of the laity towards spiritual persons, but also "for the maintenance of hospitality" and "the relief of poor people." But they were now exonerated, from the burthen of providing for the poor:—they were also released from the charge of repairing the whole fabric of the church, another condition on which they formerly held tithes, being now bound only to repair the chancel.—With respect to lay impropriators, there existed no reason whatever why they should not be subject to the same limitation which governed the property of all other persons; and, upon this point, at least, if on no other, the house ought to go into a committee.—Upon the whole, there was nothing in the principle of the bill either to injure, or alarm, the clergy. On the contrary, he most conscientiously believed, that an alteration of the present law of tithes would be most beneficial to them, as well as to the laity. It would put an end to those disputes and animosities which too frequently occurred between pastors and their parishioners; it would render the former more respectable in the eyes of the latter—harmony and peace would prevail between them—the one would be more useful and successful in their ministry—the other more sincere and religious in their conduct. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Peel said, he assented to the proposition of the hon. and learned gentleman, that the property of the church was not more sacred than any other kind of property, considered in point of absolute security; but there were some peculiarities in it, which distinguished it above all secular property. The municipal laws of all countries had provided a decent maintenance for their clergy; ours had established this of tithes, and it ought not to be rashly or wantonly attacked. Tithes were due of common right, unless by special exemption, either by a real composition, or by custom or prescription. The courts of law had decided what evidence should be sufficient to prove this exemption, and the nature of that evidence could not be altered, without greatly endangering the rights of the church. It had been justly said, that a perpetual body with a perpetual duty ought to have a perpetual provision; but the hon. member's bill, to say the least of it, exposed their claims to a most unreasonable hazard. With this view of the subject, he felt it his duty to support the motion of his right hon. friend.

The house then divided on the question, "That the bill be now read a second time."

Ayes 15, Noes 42.

The bill was consequently lost †.

LONGITUDE AND NORTHERN PASSAGE BILL.] The house went into a committee on this bill.

Mr. Croker proposed, that the blanks regard-be supposed to commence, says,—"which the law of England, by a pretty extraordinary stretch, and which, I believe, no other country does, makes from the transportation of king Richard I. to the holy land."—Sir W. Blackstone observes, that, "This rule was adopted, when by the stat. of Westm. 1. (3 Edw. 1. c. 39.) the reign of Richard I. was made the time of limitation in a writ of right. But, since by the sta'. 32 Hen. VIII. c. 2. this period (in a writ of right) hath been very rationally reduced to sixty years, it seems unaccountable, that the date of legal prescription, or memory, should continue to be reckoned from an æra so very antiquated." (2 Comm. 31.)

* See the observations of Lord Coke on this statute, in his 3d Instit. 191. In his 4th Instit. chap. Consistory Courts, &c. he has given the case of the bishop of Norwich at large.

† As the subject of tithes is very important both to those who receive and those who pay them, and as it has been recently ventilated from the press in a variety of shapes, the Editor will take the liberty of extracting a few passages from a writer, whose opinions on this matter were solicited by persons of the highest rank in church and state. The late Bishop Watson, in a letter to the Duke of Rutland, then Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, (Sept. 1786,) says, "It is of use to bear in mind the true principles of legislation, though it may not be always expedient to practise them. The clergy are hired by the state, and they are paid by tithes. When these tithes were first granted, there was but one sect of Christians, the Catholics. Whether the mode of paying the clergy, which was then established, was the best which could have been thought of, has been doubted by many. I think there was none preferable to it at that time; when all men were of the same religion, and when that religion had some hold on men's minds. The case is now much changed in both these points; a variety of sects have sprung up in England and Ireland, and religion itself is not so highly esteemed as it was formerly. Most men of fortune care little about religion, and they grudge the clergy what is due to them, by laws which were made long before they or any of their ancestors possessed the estates, which are now saddled with the incumbrance of tithes.—It does not become any legislature to give way, on principles of equity, to the demands of these men: they are as evidently founded on avarice and injustice as if all the copy-holders in the kingdom were to demand an exemption from the payment of the lords' rents, to which their estates have for many centuries been subject. But, on principles of utility, it may be expedient to sooth their prejudices, if their combination is a powerful one, by listening to any change which they may propose in the mode of paying the clergy; provided the change be grounded on a principle, which they will not readily admit, that the clergy be not plundered, and that the gentlemen who propose the change be not benefited by the plunder. —The other point, which respects the payment made by sectaries, has more difficulty in it; and it being rewards should be filled up by the same sums as in the preceding acts.—The resolution was agreed to, the house resumed, and the report was ordered to be received to-morrow.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

ROYAL ASSENT.] The Royal Assent was given by commission to the indemnity bill, the mutiny bill, the mutiny act mistake bill, the marine mutiny bill, and the West Indies indemnity bill. The commissioners were the Lord Chancellor, the Earl of Shaftesbury, and Lord Melville.

GREENLAND FISHERY OATHS BILL.] This bill was read a second time, the commitment comes perplexed indeed, when a great majority of a country is not of that sect which is established by government. The just principle is this: every man should contribute his due proportion to the maintenance of the ministers of religion, (for no state can subsist without some religion,) and a Christian state should allow a co-establishment of the different sects of Christians; that each individual might have an opportunity of frequenting his own place of worship, without being burdened by any additional payment to his own minister, exclusive of what he paid to the minister established by the state.—This co-establishment cannot, probably, take place in countries, which have been long accustomed to patronise one particular mode of worship, with a simple toleration of others, nor is there any injustice in its not taking place, whilst the majority of the persons of property in the country are of opinion, that it is more for the interests of the state to support one sect exclusively, than to support all sects promiscuously. The dissenters in England constitute, it has been said, a fourth part of the whole community; but they do not possess, I think, a fiftieth part of the property of the whole kingdom. Whether it would be advantageous to the state, that their ministers should be paid by the state, is a question on which I have had no occasion to form an opinion; but I am clear in this, that they suffer no injustice in paying tithes, because the lands, out of which the tithes issue, were subject to that payment ages before the name of a dissenter was heard of. They may as justly be compelled (not to frequent a place of worship which they dislike, that is quite another thing) to pay towards a religious establishment which they dislike, as your Grace and I, and many other good whigs, were compelled to contribute to the support of the American [illegible] h we reprobated from the first as impolitic [illegible] t. The minority in all such cases is rightly [illegible] l by the majority."—In a subsequent letter, the bishop says, "With respect to the subject of a commutation of tithes, I will state what I think just, and perhaps, expedient on that head. I am a friend to a commutation, because I am a friend to charity and good neighbourhood; I wish the commutation to be in land, because I would have the means of the clergy certain, and not dependent on the fluctuation in the value of money. The cry against tithes has not arisen from any extortion of the clergy, either in this kingdom or in Ireland; but it does now subsist in both countries, and it obstructs in both the Christian utility of the ministry, and on that account I wish to see the occasion of such obstruction removed. —The quantity of land which should be given in exchange I pretend not to ascertain. The clergy must be contented, in the present temper of the Irish, with what they can get: yet it ought to be so liberal a commutation, as will enable every parson to live creditably and hospitably in the midst of his parishioners. A proper provision being made for every minister, his residence should be made an absolute condition of his receiving it.—Pluralities and non-residence are scandals in the Christian church, as a church, and injurious to those interests of the state, for the promotion of which it is at the expense of maintaining a clergy.—One thing I beg to recommend to you, and it is an act of only pure justice—that none of the present clergy be compelled to accept the commutation. If an act is passed, let it take place, either in such cases, as the present incumbents shall of themselves desire, or as they shall severally die. There is no injustice in altering either the value of the benefice, or the mode of raising that value, when the property of the benefice reverts as it were to the state on the death of an incumbent; but there would be injustice in compelling the present incumbent of any church to accede to a change of property which he disliked.—In another place, the Bishop gives us the following information. "In January, 1799, I received from the Archbishop of Canterbury a paper which had been sent to him by Mr. Pitt, and was desired to deliver my opinion on the subject The paper contained a plan for the sale of the tithe of the country, on the same principle that the land-tax had been offered for sale in the preceding session of parliament. It was proposed, that the money arising from the sale of the tithe should be vested in the funds, in aid of public credit, and the clergy were to receive their income from the funds; the income, however, was not to be a fixed income which could never be augmented, but was to be so adjusted as, at different periods, to admit an increase according to the advance in the price of grain. This plan was not introduced into parliament; it met, I believe, with private opposition from the bishops, though I own it had my approbation; but that approbation was founded on very different principles from that of aiding public credit; I did not indeed clearly see how, if the full value was given for the tithe, that credit would be assisted thereby. I remember having said to Mr. Arthur Young on the occasion, that I for one never would give my consent, and that I thought the houses of parliament never would give theirs to the sale of the tithe, unless its full value was paid for it. "Then," said he, "there is an end of the whole business; for unless the people in the west, who are now most clamorous against tithe, are allowed to purchase at the price they now pay by composition, they will on their knees beg Mr. Pitt to let things continue as they are." I sent to the Archbishop the following observation on the proposed plan, to be communicated to Mr. Pitt:—

"The Bp. of Landaff is of opinion, that an income arising from the funds will neither be so permanently secure, nor so independent, as one arising from tithe.

"He is further of opinion, that the proposed change will much augment the influence of the Crown; which augmentation, he conceives, will be ultimately ruinous alike to the just prerogative of the Crown, and the liberty of the subject.

"Notwithstanding these distant and contingent dangers, he approves of the plan, on the ground of its tendency to amend the morals of the people, by extinguishing the discontents often subsisting between the clergy and their parishioners, on account of tithes, and on the principle of its promoting the agriculture of the kingdom.

negatived, and the bill ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, March 17.

LONDON NEW PRISON.] Sir James Shaw presented a petition of the prisoners being freemen of the city of London, and others arrested therein, confined in the wards of Ludgate, Giltspur, and Poultry, in the debtors' prison for London in Whitecross street: setting forth, "That they are confined for debt in the debtors prison under writs issuing out of his majesty's courts of King's Bench, Common Pleas, and exchequer, and by process of the lord mayor's and sheriffs' courts, whereby they are excluded from the important and highly valued privilege of day rules during the four terms of court which enable the prisoners confined either in the King's Bench or Fleet Prison to personally communicate with their creditors in a much more efficient manner than can be done by letter or otherwise through the medium of attornies; and the petitioners most humbly beg leave to state to the house, that if in their wisdom they may be pleased to grant the same privilege to the prisoners, being freemen of the city of London and others arrested therein, confined in the prison of Whitecross street, they would then be enabled personally to wait upon their creditors, and make arrangements that would in many cases be highly advantageous to their creditors and productive of much happiness to the petitioners, their wives, families, and relatives; and they beg leave further to state to the house, that circumstances frequently occur to unfortunate debtors which require that a full statement of their affairs should be laid before a general meeting of their creditors by the debtor in person, and which the petitioners are prevented from doing, being deprived of the aid and benefit of day rules, and thereby accomplishing settlements which might prove highly satisfactory and beneficial to their creditors, and in many instances prevent their being obliged to have recourse to the benefit of the insolvent act, by explaining their misfortunes and awakening commiseration in the breasts of their creditors; the petitioners could urge other strong arguments in favour of the indulgence they most humbly solicit from the house, but they abstain therefrom, confining themselves solely to the interests of their creditors, on which grounds they most humbly pray that the house will be pleased to grant the privilege of day rules to the citizens of London and others confined in the prison of Whitecross street during the four terms of court, under such security and upon paying such fees to the sheriffs of London, or to such other authority, as the house in their wisdom may appoint, and as are now given and paid to the marshal of his majesty's prison of the King's Bench, or to the warden of his majesty's prison of the Fleet."—The petition was ordered to be printed, and to be referred to the committee on prisons of London and Southwark.

LONGITUDE AND NORTHERN PASSAGE BILL.] This bill was reported, and ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Mr. Lambton presented a petition from Newcastle-upon-Tyne, setting forth, "That the petitioners are ardent admirers of the British constitution, and of those principles of government which placed the house of Brunswick on the British throne, and therefore view with deep concern and regret any dilapidations of that fair fabric reared by the wisdom and virtue of their ancestors as the best means for preserving the natural, civil, and political rights of Britons; that the petitioners view with much concern the great waste of public money by useless sinecures, unnecessary places, unmerited pensions, and exorbitant salaries attached to offices executed by deputies, and also greatly deprecate the undue influence exercised

"He considers the particulars of the plan as well arranged in general; but he thinks that a fair valuation of the great and small tithes of each living should be made by proper commissioners; apprehending that the mode adopted, when enclosures are made, is not applicable to lands now in tillage, and destitute of commons.

"He does not see that the abolition of tithes, on the enclosures of commons, (in futuro), is taken into consideration.

"He wishes that some provision might be made for the recovery of tithes which are now due by law, though the right to them may not, for various reasons, have yet been prosecuted.

"He is desirous that the following points may be ascertained, before the measure is submitted to parliament:—

"1st, What number of parishes in the kingdom are now entirely exempted from the tithe of corn and hay?

"2d, In what number of parishes, subject to the aforementioned tithes, are the tithes in the possession of the parochial clergy?

"3d, In what number of parishes, subject to the afore-mentioned tithes, are the tithes in the possession of spiritual or lay corporations?"

I heard no more of this matter. If ever it is resumed, it will be proper to obtain accurate answers to the three questions here proposed, that it may appear how small a part of the grievance of tithes is attributable to the parochial clergy. In the answer to the petitions which were exhibited to parliament and Cromwell, for the taking away of tithes in 1652, it is said—"There are in England and Wales 9,725 parishes; and, though the one half of these rectories were not appropriated as to the number, yet certainly as to the yearly values, the ministers at this day have not one half of the profits of the tithes of corn and grain."

If acts of parliament for enclosing commons and open fields, go on for twenty years more, as they have done for twenty years past, the grievance of tithe will be almost wholly done away; as in these acts the lay and spiritual owners of tithes, generally acquiesce in receiving a portion of land in lieu of their right of tithe.—(See the life of Dr. Watson, written by himself, vol. 1. pp. 243. 256: vol. 2. p. 56.)

by placemen, pensioners, and sinecurists in the house, contrary to the constitution and to the express letter of the act of settlement for the limitation of the crown and better securing the rights and liberties of the subject; that the petitioners regard the suspension of the habeas corpus act as contrary not only to the British constitution, but to the legitimate end of all government, namely, to protect the people from wrong, and as depriving the subject of the benefit of those laws which are his rightful and most invaluable inheritance, by which alone his life, liberty, and property, are protected; that the petitioners have deeply to deplore the great abuse of the power exercised by his majesty's ministers during the late suspension of the constitution, by which many of his majesty's subjects have suffered much wrong, cruelty, and injustice, without even the ordinary forms of law, or any means whatever of redress; and the petitioners therefore pray that the house will be pleased to summon to their bar all persons however high in office, who may have been guilty of such wanton abuse of power, and of such flagrant injustice and cruelty, that they may suffer the punishment due to their enormous crimes; that the petitioners know of no other remedy for the complicated evils which the nation suffers, and the wrongs to which they are constantly exposed, than a full, fair, and free representation of the people in parliament co-extensive at least with direct taxation; they therefore pray, that in order to secure these important purposes, the house will without delay pass a law to this effect."—Ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

Mr. Alderman Wood presented a petition from Rochdale, in the county of Lancaster, setting forth, "That the petitioners, deeply impressed with the evils that have resulted, and the ruin that threatens to follow, from the injurious state of the representation of the people, intreat an early attention to the question of parliamentary reform; a great proportion, perhaps a majority of the house, so far from being the representatives of the people, are notoriously known to represent the interests of wealthy peers or trading borough-holders, or to have purchased seats in the house for the express purpose of disposing of them to the best advantage to the ministry of the day: such a state of pollution has entailed upon this injured country all the mischiefs attendant upon a state of corruption so gross; and being firmly convinced a radical reform in the representation, a recurrence to annual parliaments, and the adoption of universal suffrage, are the only means of preventing a fatal revolution, they ask from the wisdom of the house those measures which can alone restore the confidence and secure the tranquillity of the nation; the petitioners further entreat the house not to suffer any bill of indemnity to pass by which his majesty's ministers may be screened from the legal consequences of their injustice, because, if they have done right, let them face inquiry, and depend upon their integrity and the attachment of their country; but, if they have done wrong, if they have violated the constitution, if they have insulted the sacred rights of their countrymen, if they have thirsted for blood and shed it in indecent triumph, let them be amenable to the still remaining laws, and, as well as the people, be answerable to God and man for their conduct."—Ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

Sir Francis Burdett presented a petition of inhabitants of St. Matthew, Bethnal-Green; also, two petitions of inhabitants of Newcastle-upon-Tyne; also, six petitions of inhabitants of Ashton-under-Line; also, of inhabitants of Sheffield; also, twenty-five petitions of inhabitants of Burslem, in the Staffordshire Potteries; also, of inhabitants of Marksbury; also, fifteen petitions of inhabitants of the county of Middlesex; praying for a reform of parliament.—They were ordered to lie upon the table.

RIGHT OF VISITING PRISONS.] Lord Folkestone observed, that, pursuant to notice, he rose to move for leave to bring in a bill to remove certain doubts, supposed to exist, as to the right of magistrates to visit common or county gaols, under the act of the 31st of the present king. Whether it might be thought by some, that such a power should exist in the magistracy—whether it might be thought, by others, that such power should not exist, or whether it should exist in some cases, and not in others; all, he should suppose, would agree as to the propriety of having the law on the subject clear and explicit, and no longer capable of doubtful or forced interpretation. As the object of his motion was to settle the question, he could not expect any opposition. Certainly, the bill which he should feel it his duty to introduce, would give to the magistracy of the county the right to visit common gaols. But if the gentlemen opposite did not wish to afford that right, or wished to limit its exercise in certain cases, it would be open to them in the committee to submit enactments to those purposes. That doubts now existed on the subject was undeniable, and his great object was to put an end to them. The house would recollect, that, on the 18th of June, in the last session, he submitted a motion to their consideration, relative to the refusal given to the magistrates of Berkshire, who wished to visit the county gaol. (See Vol. 1. p. 1436.) That motion having been refused, he had preferred an indictment against the gaoler of Reading. The verdict of a jury had since acquitted him *. The whole question depended on the construction of the act of the 31st of the king, which was intituled, "An act for the better regulating of county gaols and other places of confinement." Some of the clauses of this act, referred to houses of correction and penitentiaries; but the fifth section enacted, "that certain justices of the peace, appointed by the general or quarter sessions, shall, either together or singly, personally visit and inspect both the common gaols and other the houses of correction or other places of confinement, at least three times in each quarter of the year, and oftener if occasion shall require, and shall examine into the state of the buildings, and the behaviour and conduct of the respective officers, and the treatment and condition of the prisoners; and furthermore shall, at any general or quarter sessions, make a report in writing of the state and condition of the same, and of all abuses which may occur to their observation; and the chairman of the said sessions is hereby required to call upon the said visitors for such report." It is moreover in the same section expressly declared, that "It shall be lawful for every justice of the peace for such county, riding, or division, of his own accord, and without being appointed a visitor, to enter into and examine the same at such time or times, and as often as he shall think fit, and if he shall discover any abuses therein, he is required to report them in writing at the next general or quarter sessions of the peace." By the first part of this clause, it appeared to him, that the law was express, and not only gave permission, but rendered it imperative upon magistrates to visit the prisoners. There was no exception as to state prisoners: it was a general imperative direction, that they shall visit the gaols, and inquire into the state of the prisoners. The second part of the clause was not imperative, but it authorized magistrates to enter into gaols, and examine into the treatment of the prisoners. With respect to that verdict, having himself attended most minutely to the trial, he must say, that if the charge of the judge who presided, did not actually direct, it bore so strong to the one side as to lead to the acquittal of the defendant. He felt that he should not have done his duty, if he had not complained of what fully and solemnly struck him as the partiality of the judge, not a personal partiality, but a marked partiality to one side of the question. This impression of his conduct, he felt at the time—he felt it the stronger the more he considered it, as being demonstrated in the whole of the summing up. Though it was a question, on each side of which, it appeared to him, a great deal might be advanced—though it was a subject the most removed from any very decisive opinion, yet it was remarkable, that the learned judge who tried it, who confessedly had turned his attention to it, and consulted authorities, could not find any one argument, but what bore on the one side. He verily believed, that on any question where the government was the one party, and himself the other, he should not stand a chance of a verdict. If this act did not apply to common or county gaols, why did the legislature pass it? If these prisons were excluded, the act was wholly unnecessary. By the 24th of George II. and the 19th of George III. houses of correction and other prisons of that character, were open to the visiting magistrates—so that, as applicable to them, it was not wanting. At the late trial, the lieutenant of the tower was brought forward, with his portmanteau stuffed with warrants, from the year 1660 down to 1817, for the sole purpose of establishing the interpretation to be put on the terms, safe and close custody. He (Lord F.) denied the propriety of the interpretation that had been put on those words. In the common acceptation of the English language, the word close did not bear the meaning of solitary *. From the year 1791 down to the present time, the magistrates had always visited the prisons; and, indeed, under the recent suspension, in various other counties, no such obstruction as was given to the Berkshire magistrates, had taken place. But, even if the usage had

* Neither does it bear that meaning in our ancient writers. Solitary confinement was unknown to the old laws of England. When a person was committed to prison for an offence that was not bailable, or he could not find bail, he was committed, there to remain, sub salvâ et arctâ custodiâ, till delivered by due course of law. Those words by no means justified solitary imprisonment. He was in salvâ custodiâ, while he continued in the custody of the gaoler, and he was in arctâ custodiâ, while he was within the four walls of the prison. Still less did those words justify a gaoler in fettering a prisoner, unless he was unruly, or had attempted to escape. The following is the humane language of our ancient law givers: "Custodes pœnam sibi commissorum non augeant, nec eos torqueant; sed omni sævitia remota, pietateque adhibita, judicia debite exequantur. (Flet. lib. 1. c. 26.)—Lord Coke, in his 3d Institute, fo. 34, says, "It is now necessary to be known, how prisoners (to speak once for all) committed for treason, or any other offence ought to be demeaned in prison. Bracton (lib. 3. fol. 105.) saith, Solent præsides in carcere continendos damnare, ut in vinculis contineantur, sed hujusmodi interdicta sunt à lege, quia carcer ad continendos, non ad puniendos haberi debeat." Fleta says, (lib. 1. c. 26.) "Omnes autem attachiabiles licet vicecomiti in prisona custodire, &c. non tamen ad puniend', sed ad custodiend', &c." The Mirror of Justices says (c. 5. s 1,) "It is an abuse that prisoners be charged with irons, or put to any pain before they be attainted." So far Lord Coke. It may be proper, however, to cite the Mirror more fully. The author says, "And because it is forbidden that none be pained before judgment, the law requireth, that none be put amongst vermin, or in any horrible nor dangerous place, nor in any other pain; but it is lawful for gaolers to fetter those they doubt, so as the fetters weigh no more than 12 ounces for those who are outrageous, violent, &c."—In the 3d Inst. fol. 52. Lord Coke says "If a prisoner by the dures of the gaoler, cometh to untimely death, this is murder in the gaoler, and the law implieth malice in respect of the cruelty. And this is the cause, that if any man dieth in prison, the coroner ought to sit upon his body, to the end it may be inquired of, whether he came to his death by the dures of the gaoler or otherwise." And, again, in folio 91, he says, "If the jayler keep the prisoner more straitly than he ought of right, whereof the prisoner dyeth, this is felony in the jayler by the common law. And this is the cause, (as before hath been said) that if a prisoner die in prison, the coroner ought to sit upon him."

anciently been different, as was endeavoured to be established by the production of the warrants, the statute of the 7th of William III. c. 3. which allowed the benefit of counsel to persons charged with high treason, and provided free access for them to the prisoners, had overthrown it. The act of the 31st of the king had violated that usage still further, by extending the power of access to the visiting magistrates. The house would recollect, that this act was the first of a series of laws introduced at a time when the attention of parliament was more directed, than it formerly had been, to the correction of abuses in prisons. Should it now deprive the magistrates of the right of inspecting gaols, they would become nurseries of crime and oppression. The noble lord concluded with moving, "That leave be given to bring in a bill for removing doubts, whether Magistrates may visit Common or County Gaols, not being houses of Correction."

The Attorney-General expressed the astonishment which he had felt at hearing the noble lord, in the House of Commons, accuse, in plain terms, the learned judge who had tried the cause in question, of partiality. It was impossible that any man, exercising the functions of that high office in the state, could have a more serious charge brought against him, for it implied every thing that was base and unworthy. If an individual, who had sworn to administer the law with strict impartiality, lent himself to any purpose, political or otherwise, he did that which ought to subject him to universal reprobation. Although he (the Attorney-general) was not present at the trial, he had the most accurate information of all that had passed; of the patient and laborious attention, without any interruption on the part of the judge, to the learned and ingenious, though fallacious statement of the noble lord's counsel, and to the evidence in every point of the noble lord himself, as well as of the patient and laborious attention which he gave to the statement on the part of the defendant. And this last he supposed the noble lord would not deny, that the learned judge was bound more especially to do, when a man was charged with a crime (whether by the noble lord or any one else) who had (he spoke it parenthetically) been punished already on ex-parte evidence, by the magistrates of the county in which he was faithfully discharging the duties of his station. If ever there was an individual entitled to call on a learned judge for protection from the prejudices excited against him, the defendant was assuredly the man. When, therefore, the noble lord vented a charge of partiality against a learned judge, let him not be quite sure that he himself, at two successive quarter sessions, did not exhibit great bias, partiality and prejudice; more especially when he and the other magistrates voted this person guilty before he was tried—a person placed undoubtedly in a situation of the greatest embarrassment and difficulty, having the whole—no, that would be an unjust accusation against the magistracy of Berkshire, but a large portion of the magistrates of that county pressing him on one side, and the orders of the sheriff, and the directions of the secretary of state, pressing him on the other—a person, too (he was sure there was no one who could contradict the assertion), who, from the first moment of his appointment to the situation which he held, and during the whole of his previous life, had borne the highest character, and who, in the exercise of the functions of his office, had never been exceeded by any of his predecessors in his claims to the approbation of his superiors, to the respect of his equals, and to the gratitude of the unfortunate individuals who were committed to his custody. So far, however, was the learned judge from having manifested any partiality towards the defendant in this case, that if he (the Attorney-general) might presume to find any fault with his conduct, it was, that he had not stated the law quite so strongly against the prosecution, as, in his humble judgment, would have been warranted.—The house would suppose, from the statement of the noble lord, that the question was, whether or not the magistrates (visiting or other) had the right of entering the gaol of Reading, for the purpose of visiting it? No such thing. The noble lord himself had visited it; and was told that he might visit it again. That, however, was not his object. His object was, to see if he had a right to hold communication with the state prisoners confined there. Although he (the Attorney-general) admitted, that the statute of the 31st of the King was in some respects strangely constructed, yet, in his humble opinion, there was not the slightest doubt, that the clause in question had nothing like the meaning attached to it by the noble lord; nor was such a construction ever put upon it until the noble lord's time. If, indeed, it was actually liable to such a construction, instead of opposing the noble lord's motion, he should feel it his duty to move for leave to bring in a bill to repeal the act. What! was it possible to suppose, that this or any other statute gave to any and all the magistrates the right of entering the King's gaols, and holding communication, when and how they pleased, with the prisoners confined in those gaols on charges of high treason? That all these common gaols were the King's, for the benefit of the state, was established or rather recognised (for the establishment was too remote to be traced) by the earliest statutes. The sheriffs having been for a time dispossessed of their ward of these gaols, the statute of the 14th of Edward III. c. 10. restored things to their ancient footing. In the 19th of Henry VII. another statute of a similar description was passed, in which those gaols were expressly termed the "King's gaols." What evils might not result from admitting the interpretation given by the noble lord to the statute of the 31st of the King? There had been, and there might again be, times of treason and rebellion, in which, on the question of a disputed succession, or, on other topics, there might be a very divided opinion among the better orders of the community. What would be the consequence, if the whole of the means which the law had provided for the custody of persons accused of high treason, were, in such times, to be beaten down? By the existing statute, the magistrates had power to visit the gaols, in order to see that they were in good repair and well conducted, and nothing further, and by no means to hold such communications as those to which the noble lord imagined they were entitled. The ancient warrants for commitment to gaols, in the difference of terms which they exhibited, proved the distinction between persons imprisoned for other crimes, and persons imprisoned for high treason. In the one, they were ordered to be kept safe, in the other to be kept close. Even in modern times, so lately as 1794 or 1796 (he did not remember which) a person was committed by the Court of King's Bench on a charge of high treason and other offences, and the warrant directed, that he should be kept safe and close, as to the treason with which he was charged; and as to the other matters with which he was charged, that he should be kept safe. The object of this close confinement was, to cut off that communication with others, which might promote the purposes of a conspiracy detrimental to the state. In 1722, Christopher Layer, Esq. was confined for high treason in the Tower. Lord Chief Justice Pratt then made a rule, that Mr. Layer's wife should be admitted to see him, but all other persons were excluded, without an express order from the gaoler; and the prisoner was kept in irons *. He humbly contended—nay, he confidently contended, that, in the case of Eastaff, the learned judge was perfectly right in his construction of the law. Were he not so, the statute ought to be repealed. He had the highest respect for the magistracy of the country. He was perfectly aware of the importance of their duties, and of the exemplary manner in which those duties were generally discharged. But to say, that because a man happened to be in the commission of the peace, he had, therefore, a right to do that which would be destructive of the prerogative of the crown, and dangerous to the safety of the state, was to advance a proposition which never ought to be, and he was persuaded never would be, listened to by parliament. The noble lord had said, that, previous to the statute of the 31st of the King, there were statutes empowering the magistrates to visit the gaols. Yes; but for what purpose? One statute gave the magistrates the power of whitewashing the gaols once

* It is true, that irons were put upon Mr. Layer during his imprisonment in the Tower, and that he was brought into court, under a guard, and in irons. It appears, however, that when he was first arrested, he not only attempted to escape, but actually escaped: he got out of a window, two pair of stairs high, and from thence over the water into Southwark. Under those circumstances, the use of irons by the lieutenant of the Tower might be warrantable. When he was brought into court to be arraigned, his counsel moved, that the irons should be taken off, and cited Lord Coke, in his 3d Instit. fol. 34 who says, that "when prisoners come in judgment to answer, they shall be out of irons, and all manner of bonds, that their pain may not take away their reason, nor constrain them to answer, but at their free will." The chief justice, however, (Sir John Pratt) made a distinction between the time of arraignment, and the time of trial; and, as the prisoner had escaped after he was taken, his lordship would not suffer the irons to be taken off. But, on a future day, when he was brought up to be tried, his counsel desired, that the irons might be taken off. The chief justice said, "The irons must be taken off, we will not stir till the irons are taken off:—they should have been taken off before he came to the bar." The attorney-general (Sir Robert Raymond) said, "There was direction given for their being taken off before; how they came not to be taken off, I cannot tell."—There is nothing, therefore, in this case, to impugn the principle, stated in the note, page 1109, that prisoners are not to be charged with irons before they are attainted. The special circumstances of this case made it an exception to the general rule. In a later case, reported by Sir James Burrow, it appears that three prisoners (Rogers, Matthews, and King) were kept chained during the trial of issues concerning their identities; but, in that case, the prisoners had been capitally convicted for felonies in robbing on the highway, and received sentence of death; and while they were in custody upon those convictions, they murdered their keeper, and then broke out of their prison, and were during a considerable time a terror to the neighbouring country. However, while the issue in the case of one prisoner was tried, the two other prisoners were permitted to sit down.—Upon the whole, then, it appears, that, in no case whatever, except where the prisoner has attempted to escape, or has become violent and ungovernable, is a gaoler justified in putting irons upon him; and if irons be put on, where none of those circumstances seem to warrant them, it is conceived, that the gaoler would be answerable. Lord Coke says, that if a gaoler keep a prisoner more straitly than he ought of right, and the prisoner dieth, this is murder, and the law implieth malice in respect of the cruelty. It should seem to follow, that if a gaoler puts on irons, where he ought not, he is responsible for such treatment. The law, in that case, must also imply malice. Irons are a species of torture, and Lord Coke says, (3d Inst. fol. 35.) "there is no law to warrant tortures in this land; and, accordingly, all our ancient authors are against any paine or torment to be put or inflicted upon the prisoner before attainder. And there is no one opinion in our books, or judicial record (that we have seen and remember) for the maintenance of tortures or torments, &c."—Lord Chancellor King said, when a gaoler applied to be allowed to put a prisoner in irons for security,—"No, the law does not permit a man to be punished before he is condemned—you have no right to put him in irons; make your walls higher, if it be necessary to secure him."

a-year. Another gave them the power of repairing them. But could any man contend, that such statutes vested in the magistrates the power of destroying the prerogative possessed by the crown, of keeping prisoners charged with high treason, in the way specified in the warrants for their apprehension? He objected to the bill proposed by the noble lord on two grounds. If it were meant to say, that there were any doubts as to the right of the magistrates to visit the gaols, for the limited purposes which he had described, he denied that there was the slightest foundation for those doubts, and, in that point of view, therefore, the bill was unnecessary. If it were intended to carry the measure a jot farther, and to say, that the magistrates should be allowed to do what the noble lord tried to do, the bill would be most detrimental. He wished to call to the noble lord's recollection, that the unfortunate defendant in the cause about which so much had been said (for unfortunate he must call him, standing in the predicament in which he had been placed), had told the noble lord, that if he would converse with the prisoners in his presence, he would not refuse to allow him to do so. On this, however, the noble lord himself called to that person's recollection the orders he had received, not to admit the magistrates generally; and he then receded from his offer. Why did he state this? To shew that the noble lord's object (it might be a meritorious object in his own opinion) was not to exercise the power which was actually vested in the magistrates by the statute of visiting the gaols, for the purposes therein distinctly specified; but to assert the right of the magistrates to destroy the prerogative of the crown, to keep in safe custody persons charged with high treason *—to assert the right of the magistrates to access, intercourse, and communication with persons so committed to safe custody; a construction of the statute of which, until the noble lord fancied that it bore it, no one had ever thought it capable, or, at least, had ever acted as if he thought so. He should therefore oppose the introduction of the noble lord's bill.

Mr. Sturges Bourne said, that after the able speech of the hon. and learned gentleman, he would not argue the law of the case; but confine himself to the statement of a few facts. The noble lord, it appeared, went to the gaol at Reading, with a view to gain admission to the state prisoners, and, having been refused admission, he indicted the gaoler. But the noble lord had not told the house a circumstance, which, if true, was a most important feature in the case. And here he would observe, that this was the first time since he had sat in that house, that he had heard an attack on a learned judge, not in the shape of a charge which that learned judge could answer, but in a speech which he could not answer, imputing to him direct and gross partiality, nay, the noble lord had declared that in any cause in which he was one party, and government were the other party, he was convinced that, whatever might be the merits of the case, the verdict would be given against him. Now, when such an accusation was preferred against an individual filling so high an office in the state, it was worth while to inquire whether or not the accuser himself stood on fair grounds. The noble lord had not stated what, he understood, had occurred, although he could not believe it—namely, that at the quarter sessions for Berkshire, the noble lord persuaded the majority of the magistrates to punish a man, first by turning him out of the office which he held, and then to bring a prosecution against him. Nor was that all. He had been told, that the noble lord and his associates were not content with the usual publication of the resolutions of the quarter sessions, with the names of the magistrates passing them; but, while the trial of the individual in question was pending, they caused the resolutions of the magistrates of Berkshire, pronouncing him guilty of the charge on which he was about to be tried, to be published in the county newspaper. Nor was that all. He had been told, that to those resolutions were attached, not only the names of seventeen magistrates who voted for them, but the names of thirteen other magistrates who voted against them; and this, he repeated, pending the trial of the person charged. He hoped the noble lord would say, that he had been misinformed, and that all this was not so; for, he must declare, that so complete an instance of partial and prejudiced proceedings no man ought to believe, unless it were stated in that house, and not contradicted. If, however, it should turn out, that such had actually been the case; if the noble lord had really been a party to the acts which he had described; the noble lord might make what speeches he pleased in that house on the subject of liberty, but his conduct would be a complete answer to them all.

Sir F. Burdett said, he was not well acquainted

* On the 23d of December, 1678, the commons brought up an impeachment against lord Danby for high treason. On the 27th, the lords proposed three questions to the judges:

1. Whether the judges do not always commit, or take bail, upon an accusation, in due form, of misprision of treason? To which the lord chief justice gave the unanimous answer from all the judges, "That the court of king's bench, upon an accusation of misprision of treason, do always commit, or take bail, as they think fit."

2. Whether, if any person shall be indicted by a grand jury of misprision of treason, the judges are not in justice obliged to commit him, without taking bail?—To which they answered unanimously, "That the court of king's bench may bail him."

3. Whether the judges can bail any person, in case of misprision of treason, wherein the king's life is concerned? To which they severally answered, "That the court of king's bench may take bail for high treason of any kind, if they see cause."

with the merits of the case, but he would offer a few words on the question. As to what had fallen from the hon. gentleman who had just animadverted so freely on his noble friend, he had no doubt, that when his noble friend came to reply, he would answer the hon. gentleman's statements very satisfactorily: for he was so confident of the candour, fair dealing, and good sense of his noble friend, that although comparatively ignorant of the facts, he was persuaded that he would entirely exonerate himself from the hon. gentleman's charges. The hon. gentleman said, that the gaoler had been punished, as he termed it, before trial. Now, as far as he could collect the nature of the case, it was this:—the magistrates of the county, considering the gaoler their servant with respect to a particular part of the gaol, and he having (very properly perhaps—that was not the point) disobeyed their instructions, they, not with a vindictive feeling, but to try the question, suspended him from that part of his office which related to the Penitentiary, until the result of the trial should ascertain the state of the law. He did not apprehend, that by this proceeding, the gaoler had experienced much inconvenience, as the proceeding did not appear to originate in any feeling of hostility or animosity. The question at issue was, whether or not magistrates had the right to visit every part of these gaols. With respect to the warrants for keeping prisoners in safe and close custody, it was to be observed, that, according to the old practice of the country, and the opinion of some of our greatest lawyers, the common law considered every thing custody that ever so slightly infringed the liberty of the subject, even when the prisoner was committed to the care of his friends. But if by close custody was meant solitary confinement, he would assert that it was totally unknown to the ancient law. It had been argued, that because the common gaols were the King's gaols, neither sheriffs nor magistrates had a right to visit persons confined in them on charges of high treason. They were called the King's gaols in the same manner as the high roads were said to belong to the King, and no more was meant than that they were used for a public purpose. If, however, there were doubts on the legal question, it was necessary that they should be immediately set at rest. Although the hon. and learned gentleman had no doubt on the subject, other gentlemen of the profession, equally learned, might entertain very considerable doubts. He should therefore vote for his noble friend's motion.

The Solicitor-General contended, that the only ground for the motion was, the acquittal of Eastaff. His trial was, in fact, the trial of the legal right claimed by the magistrates, and if that claim had been found inconsistent with the law, was the house prepared to say that the law ought to be changed? (Hear, hear.) Before the act of King William, the prisoner's counsel, in cases of high treason, could not visit him; and, if it had been meant to extend the same power to every magistrate, would not the statute have expressly said so? In such cases no person had ever been admitted, except by leave from the secretary of state, or the court where the indictment was found. The act of William was therefore passed wholly diverso intuitu, and strictly confined the right to the counsel for the prisoner. If it were proposed to enact a new law, it would become the house to pause and maturely consider what might be its consequences. With regard to the particular circumstances of this case, and the assertion that no punishment had been inflicted on the gaoler, it was remarkable, that the magistrates had suspended him from the government of the penitentiary, an office in which it was not even pretended that he had misconducted himself. (Hear.) They had thus suspended him before trial, for having, as it now appeared, acted according to law, and for having discharged his duty. The accusation of partiality came, therefore, with a very ill grace from those who had deprived and punished a man only for having rightly decided on what must have been to him a very doubtful point of law.

Lord Folkestone, in reply, said, that he had never before heard that there were no doubts on the subject. On the contrary, he had believed that doubts were very prevalent upon it, and it was for the purpose of removing those doubts, that he had made his present motion. As the Attorney-General, for whose opinion he entertained great respect, now told him that there were no doubts on the subject, he was not foolish enough to wish to introduce a bill to remove doubts which did not exist. His conduct in this affair had been called in question. It had fallen once or twice from the hon. and learned gentleman, that he had wished to establish the right of the magistrates to go and hold secret communication with suspected traitors. He had no such object. He thought he had a right to visit them; and he went to try that right. He allowed, that after he had been in the first instance refused admission, the gaoler offered to let him in, if he would previously stipulate what he would say when in. This he refused, as unbecoming a magistrate; and he had told the gaoler, that were he to admit him on those terms he would not satisfy him (lord F.), and might offend those whose peremptory orders he had received on the subject. Now he wished to know what there was improper in that? An hon. gentleman had been pleased to say, that he had stated only parts of the case, and not the whole. The fact was that he had not stated any part of the case. He had not alluded to any part of the proceedings before the quarter sessions. He would now relate the whole story:—On the 10th of June he went to visit the gaol, accompanied by several magistrates. They had a good deal of discussion with the gaoler, who refused to admit them. And here he would observe, without having the least animosity to that individual, that the discovery of his great merits had taken place since the recent occurrences, and that he had no reason to believe that the high eulogies bestowed on him were perfectly well founded.—He attempted to persuade the gaoler that he was acting illegally, to which he replied, "I quite agree with you; I believe I have no right to keep you out; but I am ordered by my superiors to do so, and I must obey." On the 14th of June, he again went to the gaol, but the gaoler persisted in his refusal to admit him. At the ensuing quarter sessions he attended, made a formal complaint of the conduct of the gaoler, and moved a set of resolutions, one of which was, that the magistrates had a right, under the statute of the 31st of the King, to go into the gaol. The court unanimously agreed in his opinion. The gaoler was called in and admonished; and told, that the magistrates considered they had a right to visit the gaol. The gaoler applied for leave to write to the secretary of state. This was refused, and an hour given to him for his determination, at the expiration of which period he said he would let them in. (See Vol. 1. p. 1450, note.) He then thought the question was set at rest; but a month afterwards, he was told, that the gaoler persisted in his refusal to admit the magistrates. A few days before the next quarter sessions he called at the gaol, and required admittance, but was refused, and a letter of lord Sidmouth's was shewn to him. He was then on his way to town; and when he arrived there, he had an indictment drawn against the gaoler. Returning to the quarter sessions, he there made another complaint. He found on the bench an unprecedented number of magistrates. Gentlemen were there who were not in the habit of attending. He learnt, that they had come for the purpose of reversing the order of the last court. As the gaoler had refused to obey the unanimous order of the court, whose servant he was, it was the duty of the court, in the maintenance of their character and dignity, to take notice of that refusal, and that notice was only to suspend him until the trial of the indictment in question. (See Vol. 1, Appendix, xxvii.) That this was the least which the court of quarter sessions could do was his opinion then—it was his opinion still. As to the publication of the resolutions in the newspapers, he had voted against it; and, with respect to the names of the magistrates, who voted against the resolutions, being attached to them, the hon. gentleman who had made that charge ought to know, that when any resolutions passed at a court of quarter sessions were published, the names of the magistrates present always preceded them. There was no part of the whole proceeding which he felt the least ashamed of, or that he would not go over again under the same circumstances.

The noble lord then requested and obtained leave to withdraw his motion.

REPORT OF THE TRIAL.

WM. PLEYDELL BOUVERIE, commonly called Viscount FOLKESTONE, M.P. v. GEO. ERNEST EASTAFF, gaoler of Reading.

This case came on before Mr. Justice Park and a special jury, at Reading, on Tuesday, March 3, 1818. The counsel for the prosecution were Mr. Taunton and Mr. Eden; for the defendant, Mr. Jervis, Mr. Dauncey, and Mr. Shepherd.

Mr. Eden opened the indictment, which charged the defendant, being keeper of the common gaol, with having, on the 6th of October, in the 57th year of the reign of his Majesty, wilfully, knowingly, and unlawfully refused to admit the prosecutor into the common gaol, he, the defendant, well knowing that the prosecutor was a magistrate for the county. There were four other counts, varying the charge, as, the defendant being also keeper of the house of correction, &c.

Mr. Taunton then rose, and addressed the jury. "He said, that the indictment was upon the prosecution of Lord Folkestone, against the defendant, who was keeper of the common gaol of the county, and also governor of the house of correction; and it stated, that he, Lord Folkestone, being one of his Majesty's justices of the peace for the county, had a right to examine the common gaol whenever he thought fit; that he applied to the defendant, as the keeper of that common gaol, for the purpose of obtaining access into it; and that he, as keeper of the said gaol, did refuse his lordship admission; and he (Mr. Taunton) would take upon himself to say, that however simple the case might appear to be in its nature, or however narrow its limits of evidence, from the time of the Revolution to the present day, there never was a subject more important in its consequences. The indictment was founded upon the 31st of Geo. III. c. 46; which was entitled, "An Act for the better regulating of county gaols, and other places of confinement." By the 5th section it was enacted, that, "For preventing all abuses, as well in the common gaols, houses of correction, and other places of confinement, to be used as penitentiary houses, the justices of the peace for the county shall appoint two or more justices visitors of each of the said gaols, &c. who are to visit and inspect such prison at least three times in each quarter of a year, and oftener, if occasion shall require, and examine into the state of the respective officers, the treatment and condition of the prisoners, the amount of their earnings—the expenses of such prison, and they are to make a report thereon." The clause went on to state, "That it shall be lawful for any justice of the peace for such county, &c. of his own accord and without being appointed a visitor, to enter into and examine the same at such time or times, and as often as he shall think fit; and if he shall discover any abuses therein, he is required to report them in writing to the justices at the next general or quarter sessions, who are thereupon to inquire into and rectify such abuses." Now, this was the part to which he wished to draw their attention.—"It shall be lawful for any such justice to enter into and examine the same;" namely, common gaols and houses of correction.—And if he shall discover any abuses, to report them at the next general or quarter sessions."—These were the clauses upon which the prosecution was founded. He had already stated, that his lordship was a very active justice of the peace, and, in the month of EDUCATION OF THE POOR.] Mr. Brougham brought up the following report, which was ordered to lie upon the table, and to be printed. "The select committee appointed to in-

October last, he thought proper to exercise that part of his functions given him by the act which had been quoted. It appeared, that there were at that time in the gaol certain persons who had been apprehended upon charges of high treason, or upon suspicion of treason.—His lordship was desirous of going into the prison, and, on the 6th of October, he applied to Mr. Eastaff for that purpose; but Mr. Eastaff gave him a peremptory refusal, adding, that he had received instructions from lord Sidmouth to prevent all, except the visiting magistrates, from seeing those persons who were committed upon his lordship's warrant for treason. These were the facts upon which the indictment was founded. But this was not the first time that lord Folkestone had been refused admission into the prison; for, in the month of June, in the company of other magistrates, Mr. Eastaff gave a refusal to all. A few days after, lord Folkestone was passing through Reading by himself, and he again went to the prison to demand access. The defendant was then more complaisant than he had been before, and told his lordship, he would admit him, if he would not enter into any conversation with the prisoners but such as he should dictate. His lordship said, he did not like to be admitted upon conditions so limited, and reminded him, that, perhaps, he had better not admit him, lest he should offend those who had given him instructions. Upon mentioning this, the defendant refused to admit him at all. Thus was lord Folkestone three times refused admission into the common gaol. The defence, he apprehended, would be, that the magistrates might be refused access to certain parts of houses of correction or penitentiary houses; those parts, however, the legislature had not designated. He had looked over (but he might have overlooked) the acts of parliament upon this subject, with the greatest care and scrupulosity; but he could not find any authority to empower justices, where a common gaol existed, to appropriate any parts of it to a house of correction or a penitentiary. Houses of correction and penitentiary houses were buildings of recent establishment, and the law had [illegible] magistrates an entire control over them, but [illegible]ly of the common gaol was confided to the [illegible]ne. It was well known that the sheriff did [illegible]te his office in person; but, in point of [illegible]gislature had abridged his responsibility, [illegible]ustices a participation in the care and re- [illegible] prisons. He had been told, that this was [illegible] which the prerogative of the crown was [illegible] and that the king was not bound by the [illegible]t was said, that all common gaols were [illegible] but, surely, they were not the king's in [illegible]e: in a limited sense they were; they [illegible] the confinement of prisoners for offences [illegible] against his crown and dignity. In some [illegible] gaols were not the king's, and he would [illegible] learned friends to controvert that state- [illegible]roposition more unconstitutional, more [illegible] its tendency, and more destructive in [illegible]ences—a proposition more absurd, had [illegible] laid down in a court of justice. If [illegible] case were a prerogative, let it be so; [illegible]t one prerogative be set up against an- [illegible] In every instance where a magistrate [illegible] his authority was delegated to him from the [illegible]n; and when lord Folkestone made the applica[illegible]on to the defendant, the king was speaking to him. The king was by the mouth [illegible] lord Folkestone addressing him:—he was speaking to Mr. Eastaff: yet he should be told that the prerogative of the crown denied access to lord Folkestone. It was said, that Eastaff received authority from lord Sidmouth for the denial of lord Folkestone. It was not now a time to go against the office of the secretary of state; but it had been (and it was from law and authority,) whatever it might be now, an office of very inferior importance until the reign of Henry the Eighth· before that period, the secretary of state exercised very limited authority. The office consisted of keeping a little seal; but it was a matter of legal and constitutional knowledge, that the office of magistrate was as ancient as that of secretary of state. It was not to be taken politically, but a magistrate before that reign executed matters of more importance than the secretary of state. How a secretary of state could be considered by law the personal organ of the king, or how he could be considered to have an authority over a justice of the peace, he was at a loss to know; but he would take upon himself to say, that nothing could be more preposterous than the defence which was to be set up, namely, that his Majesty, by his minister, had a right to interfere with the regulations of a prison, or with a justice of the peace. It had been solemnly enacted by the 14th of Edward III. c. 10. that the custody of gaols should be conceded to the sheriffs, and that they should have the right of putting in a gaoler; and by the 19th of Henry VII. chap. 10. it was declared, that every sheriff should have the custody of the gaols and the persons therein, and that every such sheriff should be chargeable with the care of such gaols and such persons, as would appear from the following citation:—"Be it therefore enacted and published, that for every negligent escape of persons confined for high treason, no less a fine than 100 marks shall be paid for each escape." This act included every species of crime, not excepting even suspicion of high treason. It might be said, that the tower was an exempted jurisdiction; but if any precedents on that point were introduced, he should say that they did not apply to the present case.

Lord Folkestone was then called, to prove that the defendant had refused to admit him into that part of the gaol in which the state prisoners were confined.

Mr. Jervis said, he had the honour of appearing as counsel, not for Mr. Eastaff, but for lord Sidmouth, his Majesty's Secretary of State for the home department, and this he stated thus early, because his learned friend had said that Mr. Eastaff sunk into insignificance, when the importance of the case was considered. He agreed with his learned friend in one thing, that it was as important a subject for the consideration of the jury, as had ever occurred since the period of the revolution. The question was, whether the defendant had offended against the letter of the statute, to which his learned friend had so particularly called the attention of the jury? for, unless he had offended against that particular statute, he had not offended at all. His learned friend had questioned the authority of lord Sidmouth, in commanding the defendant to keep the prisoners in close confinement. He would read to the jury the letter of instructions, and then let them see how far the defendant was blameable. The learned gentleman then read the letter of instructions, signed by Mr. Becket, the then under Secretary of quire into the education of the lower orders, and to report their observations thereupon, together with the minutes of the evidence taken before them, from time to time, to the house;

State, and selected passages from it.—" That no persons be admitted to the prisoners without receiving an official order from me." His lordship not only had a right to make this order, but also to commit them to close custody. The next passage was as follows: " And allow no communication with them." To have altered this measure would have been impracticable. " That they should not be put in irons, unless it should be necessary for their safe custody." Although lord Folkestone had not seen this paper, it was no secret; for it had been submitted to the visiting magistrates, and they had acted on it, by sending certain queries to the secretary of state. He should not trouble the jury with reading the official answer *. On the concurrence of the visiting magistrates, the prisoners were confined in such an apartment as had been appropriated to prisoners similarly situated in the year 1799, who were charged with high treason, although it was greatly to the inconvenience of the defendant and his principal turnkey. Lord Folkestone had admitted, that he did not go for the purpose of seeing the state of the prison, but for the purpose of trying the great constitutional question, which there was no doubt it was. He went in the company of certain magistrates, who might have been called, but who had not been called: and it must be acknowledged, that although his lordship stood higher in title, yet in his character of magistrate, he could be no higher.—On the 14th of June, his lordship went, not for the purpose of inviting a denial, but of seeing whether the defendant had changed his mind. The jury would perceive that he did not go to examine the general state of the prison, but to see if any thing had been done which would induce the defendant to admit him. The defendant, under the influence of a great majority of the magistrates, and under the high authority of that bench, was induced to acquiesce in allowing the magistrates to see the persons confined for high treason; but this was at a time when he had nobody to advise with, and before he had any communication with a higher power. The third demand of the noble lord was not to visit the gaol in general, but to inspect the apartment in which the prisoners were confined—to see those patriot prisoners, and for the purpose of raising a question when there was no necessity for it. His learned friend had told the jury, that a Secretary of State was not a justice of the peace; he knew he was not, and that by common law he had not authority to administer an oath. He had spoken of the antiquity of the office of magistrate, and said that the office of Secretary of State was, in comparison, one of insignificance.

Mr. Taunton:—I said, he was not a conservator of the peace†.

Mr. Jervis continued. His learned friend had held out a sort of delusion; he did not say that a Secretary of State could not commit at all; but that a person holding that office was only competent to commit ex concesso; and whether the Secretary of State came under that limited definition or not, he would tell his learned friend, that he had a right to commit without an oath, and a magistrate had not that power. A Secretary of State had not only a right to commit, but he had a right to commit to safe and close custody; but a magistrate had no right to commit to close custody, let the crime be what it might. He begged the jury not to take this as his opinion alone, for the table should be loaded with authorities until it groaned under the burthen. His learned friend had said, that commitments to the Tower had no reference to the present case, but he would convince him, that, from the Tower to the most obscure place of confinement, the Secretary of State had a right to commit to safe and close custody; and he would take leave to say, that if the present defendant had violated the act of parliament, there was not a person, from the learned judge on the bench to the most menial constable, who had not often violated it. Whatever might be the sentiments of his learned friend with respect to liberty, he could assure him, that he took as extensive views of its glorious privileges, and his mind glowed with as great and as animated a passion for it. In quoting precedents authoritative of the conduct of the noble Secretary of State on the present occasion, he should refer the jury back to the period of the commonwealth, when a monarch was dethroned, and brought to the block. On the 24th of April, 1660, colonel John Lambert was committed to safe and close custody for high treason. Thomas Scott was committed to close custody; Major-General Overton was also committed to close custody, without pens, ink, or paper, and without any person being allowed to see him; there were also in the list, the names of Hampden, Sydney, and lord William Russel. If these were the idols of his learned friend, he should have enough of them. He would shew what had been done by the crown from 1660, down to the present day; thank God, however, there were but few cases of high treason in this country. He would come down to the year 1817. Could the jury think, that his learned friend had just found out the law upon this subject? Did he think that that great and learned person, John Horne Tooke, would not have availed himself of the law, when he was committed for high treason? Would he not have raised this great constitutional question?—The learned gentleman then traced the commitments for high treason down Thistlewood and others, and observed, that, in most of the cases, they were committed by the Secretary of State into safe and close custody; and such persons only permitted to visit them as their nearest relatives and legal advisers, and then only in the presence of the keeper. With regard to liberty, he felt as much for that desirable object as his learned friend could, and he was proud to say, that although he respected the liberty of the subject, he was a strenuous advocate for the just prerogative of the crown. In the year 1684, a prisoner, who was under a charge of high treason, addressed Lord Chief Justice Pemberton as follows:—

Prisoner:—My Lord, I hope I shall have an opportunity of seeing my wife to-day? Lord Chief Justice Pemberton: Yes, but it must be at a proper time, and she must be attended. Lieutenant of th

Tower: Will your lordship let us have rule for the persons to see him? L. C. J. We will make out a rule.—In that case a rule of court was made.

In the year 1696, Cranburne, Rookwood, and Lowick, were arraigned upon charges of high treason, and the following dialogue took place before Lord Chief Justice Holt.

Cranburne: My lord, I desire your lordship would grant me the favour for my wife to come to me in private, and that I may have pen, ink, and paper? Lord Holt: Pen, ink, and paper you must have; but, as to the other, we must consider of it. Keeper of Newgate, what has been usual in those cases? Keeper: My lord, we let nobody come to them in private but their counsel. Lord Holt: that's provided for by the act that allows them counsel; but has it been usual heretofore to permit any body else to be with them in private; the wife, or any other relations? Keeper: it has not. Lord Holt: It is very dangerous if it should: therefore let him have his wife come to him in the presence of the keeper. Rookwood: My lord, I beg to have my brother come to me. Lowick: And I desire, my lord, I may have my sister come to me. Lord Holt: Your friends may come to you at seasonable times, in the presence of the keeper; you shall have every thing that is reasonable, but the safety of the government must be looked after*.

The learned gentleman then cited the case of Christopher Layer esq. before Lord Chief Justice Pratt, in 1722, and other authorities, confirmative of his point, down to 1817, at which time, he said, the right of the crown was unequivocally acknowledged—he meant the suspension of the habeas corpus act, the sixth section of which was in these words—"And whereas divers persons are in custody, on charges of high treason, and suspicion of high treason, under warrants from the Secretary of State; which persons it may be proper to keep apart from each other, except such communication as his Majesty may think fit to permit, &c." This, he contended, was a strong legislative recognition of the right of the crown; and even were not others in force, this would have been a full and sufficient authority for what had been done. He concluded by observing, that the prerogative of the crown could not be taken away; if this were allowed, the constitution would be shaken to its very foundation—the liberty of the subject would be destroyed; and although his learned friend had so emphatically dwelt upon it, he would shed his dearest blood in the defence of liberty and the prerogative of the crown.

Mr. Dauncey then put in lord Sidmouth's warrant and instructions, which were read; also the queries of the magistrates and the answers to them.

Major John Henry Ebrington, lieutenant of the Tower, was then called: he produced a trunk, containing a variety of ancient commitments, some by privy councillors, and some by secretaries of state: the greater part of the persons to whom they applied were ordered to be kept in safe and close custody, without their friends being admitted to them, unless an order should have been first obtained, and then they were not to be in private, even upon suspicion of high treason.

Commitments.—April 1, 1660, Colonel John Lambert; July 13, Thomas Scott; December 16, Robert Overton, commonly called Major; 1666, Henry North.—June 12, 1681, William Lord Howard; November 18, 1681, a protestant joiner.

Mr. Dauncey said he would not give the jury the trouble of hearing the whole.

Mr. Justice Park. I am afraid I must have them; but I think you need not read all those before the revolution.

The next was Anthony East, dated the 7th July, 1681; 1683, Algernon Sidney; October 30, 1683, William Lord Russell; 1685, Thomas Earl of Stamford; November 17, 1685, Charles Jerrard, and Lord Branden; 1685, Henry Lord Delamere; April, 1691, Henry Earl of Clarendon.

Mr. Justice Park. "This is after the revolution." August 7, 1694, Bartholomew Walmsley, Esq.; August 11, 1694, Sir T. Stanley; August, 1772, the Bishop of Rochester; September 20, 1772, Christopher Layer, Esq.; and September 29, William Lord North. October 27, 1772, the Duke of Norfolk, William Earl of Claremark, and Lord Belmano; August 1780, Lord George Gordon; May, 1794, John Horne Tooke; March 6, 1798, James John Fivey, alias Quigley, alias Coigley; 1799, John Bonham, Esq., and Valentine Brown Lawless, Esq.; April 28, 1817, Arthur Thistlewood.

Mr. Dauncey. Those are the documents which refer to the persons confined in the Tower.

Mr. Capper, of the Secretary of State's office, next produced a variety of books containing committals to Newgate of persons on suspicion of high treason, who were ordered to be kept in safe and close custody. Mr. Hardy, clerk of the papers at Newgate, produced a variety of others. Among whom were Thomas Spencer, John Smith, James Hatfield, Roger O'Connor, and Edward Marcus Despard.

Mr. Beeby, keeper of Clerkenwell prison, produced others, and several were produced from Horsemonger-lane gaol.

The Rev. Charles Manesty, one of the visiting magistrates of Reading gaol, was then called. He remembered the state prisoners being in the gaol. A letter from the Secretary of State was presented to the sessions by the defendant. The state prisoners were confined in ward No. 3, and were afterwards put into a room over the chapel, by order of the court of sessions. Witness went to the gaol and the defendant said, it would be extremely inconvenient for the prisoners to be placed in that room, as one of his turnkeys occupied it. On the 26th of April, the defendant shewed the witness a letter which he had received from Mr. Becket, giving him directions to follow the instructions implicitly. Witness saw the prisoners at various times, to know if they had any complaints to make; and they said, they had no complaints whatever to make: they appeared to him to be as comfortable, in every respect, as their situation would admit of. He told lord Folkestone, that Mr. R. Palmer and he had given directions, and if there was any blame, it was to be attached to them. Mr. Palmer and witness were never refused access to the state prisoners. Witness begged to say, that the queries were put to the state prisoners by Mr. Palmer and himself.

Mr. Taunton, in reply, said, his learned friend had endeavoured to controvert all his positions, yet, in one he agreed; namely, that the case was one of momentous importance. He had, however, done him the honour to throw out allusions, and to scatter about insinuations, that his language was dangerous orders in the metropolis, were referred, have considered the subject referred to them, and agreed upon the following report: your committee are proceeding in the further consideration of the subject referred to them; but in the mean time they recommend the bringing in of a bill for appointing commissioners to inquire into the abuses of charities connected with the education of the poor, in England and Wales; that no unnecessary delay may take place in prosecuting this investigation." The hon. and learned gentleman then moved for leave to bring in the bill.—Leave being given, the bill was ordered to be brought in by the hon. member, by Mr. Babington, and Sir Samuel Romilly.

LEATHER TAX.] A petition against this tax was presented from the tanners, curriers, and others, of Louth; and a similar petition from Gainsborough.—Ordered to lie on the table.

DEFAULTERS.] Mr. Brougham said, he had given notice of a motion, which stood for that day, respecting defaulters in the collection of

to the state; but, upon re consideration, he had not said any thing that he wished to retract, nor did he think there was any thing in what he had said, which the most loyal subject would wish to unsay: and he hoped that all gentlemen, who filled the character which he did, would do their duty to the best of their talent and judgment, whether they were for or against the crown. The circumstances and law of the case were as simple as circumstances and matter of fact could be. It was not a case that required delving into the mine of antiquity, and he would satisfy the jury that the law as well as the fact was in favour of the prosecution. The indictment was for refusing access to lord Folkestone, in his character of magistrate; and the only facts which the jury had to inquire were, whether they believed that the defendant did deny him; and, secondly, whether the statute applied to such refusal. The evidence which his learned friend had brought forward, was, in his mind, quite irrelevant to the case. He would appeal to all present, whether he had denied the authority of the Secretary of State to imprison for high treason, or for seditious practices.

Mr. Justice Park. "But you questioned the safe and close custody."

Mr. Taunton said, he never insinuated that the warrants were illegal, but that the Secretary of State had no right to interfere with the detail and management of a prison. When he had executed his warrant, he became functus officio. The learned gentleman, in conclusion, begged the jury, as they valued their liberties, and as they hoped for the liberties of their posterity, to find a verdict against the defendant.

Mr. Justice Park, in summing up the case to the jury, said, the trial had occupied the attention of the court nearly the whole of the day. The defendant was charged with having refused to admit lord Folkestone into the gaol, he the defendant being keeper of the said goal: there were other counts, stating him to be keeper of the house of correction, &c.; but only one of the counts had been proved. He had no reason to doubt the understanding of the jury, but the law must be received from the bench. The high rank, great talents, moral worth of lord Folkestone—all these must be laid out of their consideration; but they must consider him as a magistrate; and he was sorry—he thought it proper to mention it—seeing so many of the magistrates before him; he was sorry the magistrates should have suspended Mr. Eastaff, of whom he knew nothing; and he regretted the more that it had been mentioned, as it might be capable of creating a prejudice against him in the minds of the jury, and might, perhaps, have been better avoided, until the result of the trial should have been known. The evidence was extremely short, but the jury had heard a great deal of argument; and, in his opinion, many points had been introduced unnecessarily, particularly that part which attributed to the King the power of dispensing with any particular law; he should hope that no judge would ever maintain such a doctrine. It was not likely to meet much controversy, that the King could not have the care and custody of a prison, after all the skill that had been used. He thought the question resolved itself into this, whether lord Folkestone had a power of going into the apartment in which the state prisoners were confined? If the law were doubtful, there was nothing so common as to call in other assistance. He had had a copy of the indictment, and had looked into the statute several times in the course of the day, and the result of his opinion was, that he did not think the statute applied to a case of this description. One rule of law must prevail, and surely the legislature never contemplated that 300 magistrates, as he supposed there were for the county of Berks, should have free access to those three men committed on suspicion of high treason. Such a law might be productive of the most dangerous consequences; and was it because they were clothed with magistracy, that they were to go in indiscriminately? Colonel Despard was a man of high military character, and was, in all probability, competent to the duties of a magistrate; yet, had he been created one, what mischief might have occurred from the privilege of visiting prisoners under charges of high treason? One of the greatest friends to liberty that had adorned the bench, he meant Mr. Justice Holt, had said, that personal communication with such persons was most dangerous, and the government must be looked to. Lord Clarendon was imprisoned for high treason; and would it be unfair to say, that a learned magistrate of the county of Berks might be guilty of it? He meant nothing personal. Colonel Despard might have been a magistrate: and he might have communicated to A. what B. said, and so on. Several precedents had been quoted: some of them had occurred since the passing of the act upon which the defendant was indicted; they were the contemporaneous exposition of the statute, and of infinite validity. It was but justice to Eastaff to say, that in all that had been urged, there was not a tittle to reflect upon his character, either in a moral point of view, or with reference to his conduct to the prisoners; and all that the jury had to decide was, whether or not he had offended against the particular statute. The law made no distinction; it was the same to the poor man as it was to the prince, and as the law stood, so let it be. He had stated his opinion, that this case did not fall within the meaning of the act of parliament; it never was in the contemplation of the legislature to give unlimited power to a magistrate to visit persons in prison under peculiar circumstances; and he was further of opinion, that there was a contemporaneous exposition of the law as it regarded the case.

The jury, after consulting a few minutes, found the defendant not guilty.

the property-tax and the assessed taxes; but he should wish to defer any discussion on the subject, in consequence of a communication with the Chancellor of the Exchequer last night. He would, however, move for a copy of the circular letter issued on the 1st of December 1817, from the tax-office, to which motion, he hoped, no objection would be made; and would move, to-morrow, for an account of the particular districts, and the defaulters, to which that circular referred.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer stated, that he had no objection to the production of the circular; but, not being aware of the hon. and learned gentleman's intention to move for any thing beyond that, he was not prepared at present to agree to his second motion.

Mr. Brougham said, he should confine himself at present to the circular, but after the holidays he should call the attention of the house to the abuses in the collection of the assessed taxes, and to defaulters. He wished, however, at present, to call the attention of the right hon. gentleman to one branch of defaulters, through whom great injustice had happened—and he did it that the right hon. gentleman might apply his mind to the subject during the holidays. It was a very great hardship that persons should be exposed to pay their taxes twice over, from the embezzlement of some defaulter. In general, the persons who collected taxes might be said to be chosen, in some degree, by the persons paying taxes. But this was not always the case; and it was a great hardship that persons, who had no control over collectors, should still be liable for defaulters. He alluded particularly to the case of a late defaulter in the ordnance department, who had absconded with 20,000*l.* in his hands: in consequence, many military and civil officers, and, in particular, many half-pay officers, had considerable sums to pay over again. Those persons had no control over the appointment of this defaulter, and yet they were liable for him. Of all men half-pay officers were least able to bear such a loss. How this person could be allowed to have so large a balance in hand, he was at a loss to know—he hoped it was not through favour.

The motion, that there be laid before the house a copy of the circular letter from the tax office, of the 1st December, 1817, was then agreed to.

PROPERTY-TAX RETURNS.] Mr. Brougham rose to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the tax-office had prepared its statement respecting the returns under the property-tax. He had intended to bring the subject under the consideration of the house that night; but, in consequence of several important communications which had been made to him since he gave notice of the motion, he should defer the discussion for a few days. He was afraid it would appear, that proper care had not been taken to destroy the returns, as he had now in his possession the original return of a very respectable clergyman, whose income was under 100*l.* a year.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, he was not prepared to state what progress had been made in the account to which the hon. member had alluded.

SAVING BANKS.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved, that the act of the 57 Geo. III. c. 130, for the encouragement of saving banks in England, be entered as read.—The right hon. gentleman then stated, that he rose to move for leave to bring in a bill to amend the said act. The object of the bill was, to obviate several difficulties which had been found in carrying the act into execution—for instance, it required an order to receive the principal, and another order to receive the interest. The present bill would authorize general orders for both principal and interest. During the recess, gentlemen would have opportunities of becoming acquainted with other difficulties which it might be proper to remedy. He congratulated the house and the country on the establishment and rapid progress of these institutions. Their growth was far beyond expectation, and would have given great delight and satisfaction to the author of the measure, (Mr. Rose,) had he lived to witness it. It would possibly surprise the house to learn, that since the 6th of August last, when the operation of the act commenced, to the 11th of March, 1818, no less a sum than 657,000*l.* had been deposited in saving banks. (Hear, hear.) He most sincerely hoped that they would continue to prosper, as he considered them intimately connected with the morals, frugality, and industry of the people.

General Thornton said, he was glad to hear that these institutions were going on so well. Much praise was due to the right hon. gentleman who had brought in the act, and he heartily wished he had been present that night to make an amendment in it. He was a great honour to the house, and to his country, and his loss must be deeply regretted by both. The hon. member doubted, however, whether some further amendment ought not to be made in the act, as many persons, for whom these establishments were not intended, were induced to put money into them, on account of the high interest which they received. If the rate of interest were to be 1*l.* 11*s.* 3*d.* instead of 4*l.* 11*s.* 3*d.* it would be equally agreeable to them. (A laugh.) He was persuaded, that the lower orders of the people wanted merely a security for their money—they had rather an aversion to a high rate of interest. (A laugh.)

Sir John Newport said, that the praise which the hon. member had bestowed on these establishments, and the opinion he had given that the poor did not wish to make their money productive, formed a paradox which he would not attempt to solve. He viewed those institutions in the same light as the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and had felt very grateful to the right hon. gentleman from the first moment that he turned his attention to them.

Mr. Babington observed, that nothing had taken place in modern times that was calculated to produce so much benefit to the country as the establishment of saving banks, but there was reason to apprehend that persons of an improper class would avail themselves of them. The house would be surprised to learn how many persons who were not poor, but considerably above the lower orders, were anxious to be admitted into them. There was one person who was worth 30,000*l.* or 40,000*l.* who wished to invest money for his children in a bank of that kind. That was an extreme case, but it was highly reprehensible to see people taking advantage of such institutions, and putting money into funds that ought to be kept sacred to the lower orders. He thought that the right hon. gentleman would do well to confine these institutions to their original object.

Mr. Thompson concurred in opinion with the hon. member who had just sat down. He had known instances of persons who had done as he had stated; who had put 100*l.* perhaps into a saving bank for their children, and, following the same principle, had not confined themselves to one bank, but had paid sums to others in the same manner. He thought it his duty to suggest to the right hon. gentleman the propriety of introducing a clause, to discriminate on the investment of money into saving banks. He had known other facts of the same kind with those to which he alluded *. The interest of country banks was in many instances lowered, and people would perhaps go to the saving banks, where they could get much better interest. Such institutions would be abused, if measures were not taken to counteract their abuse, against which he hoped the right hon. gentleman would endeavour to provide. It might be said, that by exchequer bills, and other modes, 4 per cent. interest could not be obtained, and the saving banks would be resorted to by niggardly people, who did not see the thing in its proper light. He hoped that the interests of the poor would be protected, and that such establishments would not be allowed to be employed in a manner contrary to their original purpose.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer obtained leave to bring in the bill, and afterwards moved for an account of sums vested in the several saving banks in England, on the 11th March 1818, which was ordered. The right hon. gentleman then brought in his bill, which was read a first and second time, and committed for to-morrow.

NAVY ESTIMATES.] Mr. Brogden brought up the report of the committee of supply, to which the navy estimates had been referred. On the first resolution being read,

Mr. Forbes rose and said, he wished to call the attention of the house and of his majesty's ministers to the situation of the officers of the navy. When they received pensions for wounds, those pensions were not granted on the same grounds as to wounded officers of the army. It was understood by the order in council applicable to this subject, that both services were to be placed on the same footing. He had lately seen many instances of officers in the navy receiving for the same wounds considerably less than officers of corresponding rank in the army. He could not discover any reason for this distinction. It was a sufficient compliment to the army to say that it was equal to the navy. A post captain in the navy, who ranked with a colonel in the army, received only 250*l.* while the other received 300*l.* a year. He wished also to allude to the case of pursers' clerks, some of whom had risen to that situation from the rank of midshipmen, and, after eleven years' service, had been turned adrift without a sixpence. The whole of the persons in this situation amounted to thirty. He complained also of the alteration which had been adopted in the case of pursers. All the ships had been taken from them, and they had been put on a very inadequate half-pay.

Mr. Croker said, nothing could be more mischievous to the navy than the views of the hon. gentleman, if carried into effect. This was not the first time he had introduced this subject to the attention of the house; and it was not now the first, or second, or third time he had been answered. The hon. gentleman ought to know something of the state of the two services, and the different advantages enjoyed by each, before he recommended any change with regard to them. It was true a lieutenant-colonel had 6*d.* a day more half-pay than a young post captain of the same rank. But then the post captains went on rising without interruption, till they were equal to full colonels; whereas, a lieutenant-colonel remained where he was. For instance, in 1814, there were 200 post captains who ranked as lieutenant-colonels. At that time there were also 1,100 lieutenant-colonels. There

* The following facts will show that no abuse of this nature exists in the saving banks in the metropolis; and, perhaps, the general practice of the country saving banks is equally free from it. Out of 5,678 single deposits of money made in the Bishopsgate church-yard Bank, between the 21st of July, 1817, and the 16th of March, 1818, there were 1,905 from 1*s.* to 5*s.*; 1,166 above 5*s.* and not exceeding 19*s.*; 1,878 above 19*s.* and not exceeding 5*l.*; 291 above 5*l.* and not exceeding 10*l.*; and 215 above 10*l.* and not exceeding 20*l.* So that more than one half were under 20*s.* and very nearly seven-eighths of the deposits (4,949 out of 5,678) were from 1*s.* to 5*l.* Again, the single deposits of money made in the Southampton-row bank, between the 10th of February, 1817, and the 3d of August, 1818, were 7,970 in number. Of these—

was not one of those post captains who had not risen to a rank equal to that of full colonel: whereas, there was not one of the 1,100 lieutenant-colonels, who was not still lieutenant-colonel. The hon. gentleman complained that all the ships had been taken from the pursers. But how many of them could have ships? Not above 400. There were 900 in all; and so to give ships to 400 of them, he would reduce the other 500 to actual starvation. Pursers were brought up generally to the pen and ink line (a laugh), and, in port, not one of them would live on board their respective vessels; so that the pay, which was only about 70*l.* a year, if they did not remain on board, would really be less than the present half-pay allowance. Not one of them would make the exchange. The old plan of rewarding pursers, while it profited them but little, was expensive to the country. The lowest rate of a purser's half-pay was 3*s.* a day, which was more than the most of those who had ships before received; the higher-rates were 4 and 5*s.* a day. There were no complaints from any one purser of this arrangement. But with this liberality the Admiralty had made a provision for economy, and had determined, that no more pursers should be made till they were reduced to the number of those who would have had ships under the old system. The hon. gentleman had next mentioned midshipmen who had been promoted to be officers called pursers' clerks. This statement was a bundle of blunders, and if he had not known the gentleman from whom it came, he should have attributed it to one of his own countrymen, and the genial influence of the day. A midshipman could not be promoted to be a clerk, for the situation of clerk was inferior to that of midshipman. Secondly, there was no such office as purser's clerk. There were, indeed, persons denominated captains' clerks, who were not officers, and who had nothing to do with pursers—but who kept the captain's accounts, were appointed and might be dismissed by him, and were the private servants of the captains, except that an allowance was made for them by the public. It was true that, as they were the only persons in civil employ con nected with ships, it was usual to select the pursers from the most deserving of them; but they could have no more claim to half-pay than the amanuensis of any member of that house. He complained of the hon. gentleman, who, with a zeal meritorious in its origin, but mischievous in its effect, chose to attack a board of Admiralty which had laboured with anxiety, diligence and success, for the good of the service—which, in five or six years, had done more for the benefit of the navy, and thence of the nation, than ever had been done in twenty-five or twenty-six years before. He did not mean by that to blame former administrations: he knew they were all, without excepting even his political opponents, equally zealous to promote the comfort of the navy.

Mr. Money said, the object of his hon. friend seemed to have been misapprehended. It was not his intention, he believed, to throw any imputation upon the conduct of the Admiralty, but simply to submit the fact to the notice of the house, that a great difference existed in the rate of providing for the officers of the army and navy. The services of the navy, and the glorious deeds achieved by its means, were in a special manner entitled to the gratitude of the country; for, without our navy, the triumphs of our army would not have been so signal and complete. Without the co-operation of our navy, the exertions of Wellington and his victorious troops would not have been attended with such brilliant and decisive success. When he considered the many and signal triumphs they had obtained, the long and arduous blockades they had sustained for years together, it was impossible for him to admit that the rate of compensation to which they were in justice entitled should be inferior to that of the army. Great and important were the advantages this country had always derived from the ascendancy of our navy; but its original value seemed in a manner swallowed up and lost in its last great and splendid achievement—he meant the attack upon Algiers. This was not an ordinary triumph over a rival power, it was a just and merited punishment of unprincipled barbarians, whose inhuman outrages and cruelty had been too long tolerated. The cordial co-operation of the army and navy was always most desirable, and a good understanding between them ought to be carefully cultivated.

Mr. Huskisson said, that the hon. gentleman had spoken of our navy as if that house had heard then, for the first time, of their gallant deeds—as if their services had been altogether forgotten. Had he been, however, at pains to inform himself, he might have been soon satisfied, that the country had neither been insensible to the services of our gallant seamen, nor unmindful of making due provision for their comforts. He would likewise have found, that no such distinction existed in the rate of compensation to the army and navy as he had been led to think; or, if it did, that it was easily to be accounted for from the nature and circumstances of the different services. In the army, the opportunities which an officer had of improving his fortune by prize-money did not often occur; and when they did occur, it was for the most part to an inconsiderable amount. In the navy such opportunities were frequent, and often to a very great amount. The officers of the navy were sensible of these advantages, and never looked to any further compensation. On the late triumph at Algiers, to which the hon. gentleman had alluded, the sum of 100,000*l.* had been distributed among those who had been engaged in that service, besides honours and distinctions conferred upon those who had signalized themselves by their conduct and valour. The crown and that house readily concurred in doing justice to their meritorious services. He contended, that nothing could be more false in argument, or more mischievous in its consequences, than the practice of forming comparisons between the different services, and maintaining unfounded distinctions. It had been said, that the late war had been barren in prizes; but he believed he was well warranted in saying, that no war in the annals of this country had been more productive. The capture of Banda had afforded to many the opportunity of acquiring the means of independence, comfort, and wealth. With respect to the compensation for wounds sustained in the service, he believed there was not that difference which the hon. gentleman supposed. If an officer of the navy lost a limb, he had a compensation as in the army; but with this difference—that in the army, should an officer sustain a very severe wound, if it was not equal to the loss of a limb, he received no compensation at all; but in the navy, when the wound was found to be very severe, though it might not be equal to the loss of a limb, it was taken into consideration, and a compensation allowed accordingly.

Mr. Forbes said, the hon. gentleman (the Secretary to the Admiralty) might have saved his lungs, by sparing much of what had fallen from him on this question. The sum of 2 or 3000*l.* would put both services on the same footing with respect to pensions for wounds; and he was sure that the country would not grudge such a sum. For himself, he was a plain man, and could not bring so much eloquence to the subject as the hon. secretary; but then he received no pay for exerting his voice on this question (order which he should continue to do every session. The general sentiment in the navy was, that it was not so well provided for as it ought to be.

Mr. Croker said, he had not denied the hon. gentleman's right to discuss any subject he thought proper; but what he complained of was, that the hon. member had not brought forward his remarks in the committee. He should be ready and happy to meet the hon. gentleman at any proper opportunity, or on any individual case, and he had no doubt that he should be enabled to give a satisfactory account to the house, if not to the hon. gentleman himself.

The report was then agreed to.

BUILDING OF CHURCHES.] Mr. Brogden brought up the report of the resolution of the committee, respecting the building of churches.

Mr. A. Brown said, it appeared to him to be very improper to vest the right of removing curates exclusively in the bishop. He illustrated the inconvenience of this arrangement by referring to the case of a curate, who refused to lend his pulpit on the occasion of a charity sermon, though repeatedly required to do so by the rector. The consequence was, that several months elapsed before he could be removed, and the charitable institution for which the sermon was intended suffered severely. He therefore recommended to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to consider the propriety of extending this right to rectors as well as to bishops.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer thought it would be better to defer the consideration of these matters, till the bill which he intended to introduce went into a committee. As the law now stood, a curate who had been licensed could not be removed without the consent of the bishop; but the bill would only prevent the removal of curates from one chapel to another.

Mr. C. Grant, sen. expressed his satisfaction at the statement made on a former night by the right hon. gentleman, that it was in the contemplation of government to extend the benefits of the proposed measure to Scotland. The parishes in that part of the kingdom were so extensive, and the population so thinly scattered, that it was impossible all the inhabitants could have access to the parish church. This was an evil which ought to be remedied.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer repeated, that such was the intention of Government; and he had no doubt it would be followed up by the liberality of parliament in a separate bill.

Mr. Wilberforce said, he highly approved of the proposed measure. He considered the grant not merely an act of munificence, but of justice; and he knew no way in which the money of the country could be expended to more advantage. Many years had elapsed since he first turned his mind to this subject: it had always been an object of his sincere and earnest wishes, and he rejoiced to find that it was now brought forward, under the auspices of his right hon. friend *.

* On the 1st of April, 1800, the late Bishop of Landaff addressed the following letter to Mr. Wilberforce.—

"My dear Sir,—Your great and unceasing endeavours to promote the cause of virtue and religion, deserve and have obtained the applause and good will of all serious men; and I know not any person to whom I can communicate my notions on two points, respecting the improvement of the morals of the people, with greater probability of having them well considered, and, if thought useful and practicable, brought into effect.—The parish-churches of this metropolis are greatly too few to afford an opportunity of attending divine service to the increasing numbers of its inhabitants, and this inconvenience is much augmented by the pews which have been erected in them. What I would propose is—the building an additional number of new churches, each on a large scale, in proper situations, which should have no appropriated seats, but, being furnished merely with benches, should be open alike to the poor and rich of all parishes and of all countries.—The structure of these edifices should be as simple, and of as comprehensive a figure as possible, that no public money might be unnecessarily expended, and a clergyman of great character and ability should be appointed to officiate twice every Sunday in each of them, and to explain the Catechism on Wednesdays

The resolution was then agreed to, and a bill was ordered to be brought in by Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Lord Viscount Castlereagh, and Sir William Scott.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Wednesday, March 18.

CHIMNEY SWEEPERS.] Lord Kenyon moved, that the evidence taken before the committee on the chimney-sweepers' regulation bill be printed.—Ordered.

GREENLAND FISHERY OATHS' BILL.] This bill was read a third time, and passed without any amendment. It was in these words.

"Whereas an act was passed in the 26th year of the reign of his present majesty, intituled, 'An act for the further support and encouragement of the fisheries carried on in the Greenland Seas and Davis's Streights:' and whereas by the said act, certain oaths are required to be taken by one or more of the owners, and by the master or chief officer of every ship or vessel going to and returning from the said fishery: and whereas the said oaths may preclude persons from applying for and obtaining the rewards to which they may become entitled, in pursuance of any act of parliament for discovering the longitude at sea, and encouraging attempts to find a northern passage between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, and to approach the northern pole; be it therefore enacted by the king's most excellent majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that so much of the said recited act as relates to the oaths to be taken by one or more of the owners, and by the master or chief officer of every ship or vessel going to and returning from the said fishery, shall be and the same is hereby repealed.

II. And be it further enacted, that previously to the licence specified in the said act being granted, one or more owner or owners, and the master or chief officer of such ship or vessel, shall make oath before the persons authorized by the said act to administer the same, that it is really and truly their firm purpose and intention, that such ship shall, as soon as licence shall be granted, forthwith proceed, manned, furnished, and accoutred in the manner directed by the said act, on a voyage to the Greenland Seas and Davis's Streights, or the seas adjacent, and there, in the then approaching season, to use the utmost endeavours of themselves and their ship's company, to take whales or other creatures living in the sea, and on no other design or view of profit in such voyage, save and except any reward or rewards offered by any act of parliament for more effectually discovering the longitude at sea, or encouraging attempts to find a northern passage between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, to approach the northern pole, and to import the whale-fins, oil, and blubber thereof into Great Britain (naming the port thereof to which it is their intention to return); and that, on the return of any such ship or vessel to Great Britain, the master and mate shall make oath that they did, in pursuance of the licence granted in pursuance of the said act (mentioning the day of their departure), proceed on a voyage directly to the places before mentioned, and have not since been on any other voyage, or pursued any other design or view of profit, save and except any reward or rewards offered by any act of parliament for more effectually discovering the longi-

and Fridays in Lent, without interfering with the emoluments or the duties of the parochial ministers within whose parishes the new churches should be built.—The salary of each clergyman should be, I think, about 400*l.* a year, but no curates should be allowed except in cases of extreme necessity.—I forbear dilating on this scheme; many advantages and probably some objections will occur to a man of your penetration; but it is needless for me to enter into the consideration of either, till there is some prospect of the idea being adopted by government; and if the notion meets your own approbation, I can have no objection to your hinting the matter to Mr. Pitt.—Twenty churches might be erected for an hundred thousand pounds, and the salaries of all the clergymen, clerks, and door-keepers would not amount to ten thousand a year. These sums, or sums larger than these, appear to me to be trifles, when expended for so beneficial a purpose.—It might be of use to have a charity-box at each door of each church, the produce of which might be applied to some charitable purpose, (such as the reformation of prostitutes, the relief of prisoners for small debts, &c.) and the annual produce, I think, would not be inconsiderable; for many country-families, which come to town for a few months, would frequent these churches, and they would frequent them with more readiness if they had an opportunity of distinguishing themselves from the lower classes by voluntary donations to the charity-box.—Another thing which deserves, in my humble judgment, the attention of government, is an evil which has increased very much, if it has not entirely sprung up in many places within the last thirty years—the travelling of waggons and stage coaches on Sundays. There are laws, I believe, to prevent this being done during the hours of divine service, but the difficulty of putting them in execution renders them, in a manner, useless. This evil might be remedied by an act of parliament of ten lines, enacting the payment of a great additional toll at each turnpike-gate which should be passed by such carriages, between the hours of six and six on every Sabbath day.—The avarice of commerce, I fear, would oppose the extension of such a law to mail coaches; and the indifference of the opulent to religious duties, together with their fondness for travelling on a day when they experience the least obstruction on the road, would raise a cry against it, if it were proposed to extend it to all coaches and chaises.—I am, &c. R. LANDAFF."

The Bishop adds, "Mr. Wilberforce, in his answer to my letter, promised to embrace any opportunity of giving effect to the object of it." (See the life of Dr. Watson, written by himself, vol. ii. p. 110. to 114.)

tude at sea, or encouraging attempts to find a northern passage between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, and to approach the northern pole, and that they did there (mentioning the time of their stay in those seas) use the utmost endeavours of themselves and their ship's company to take whales and other creatures living in those seas, and that all the whale-fins, oil, and blubber (if any) imported in such ship or vessel, were really and bonâ fide caught and taken in the said seas by the crew of such ship or vessel only, or with the assistance of the crew of some other British-built ship or vessel licensed for that voyage pursuant to the directions of the said recited act; and the taking of the said respective oaths in the form prescribed by this act shall (all the other requisites of the said act being duly complied with) be sufficient to authorize the granting of the licences for the sailing of such ships and vessels, and the payment of the bounties granted by the said act."

BANK TOKENS BILL.] On the motion of the earl of Liverpool, this bill was read a third time, one of the clauses, (respecting which his lordship stated there were some doubts, but which, in fact, was wholly unnecessary) being first struck out. The bill was sent back to the commons, and was shortly afterwards returned by Mr. Brogden, and other members, with the amendment agreed to. It was in these words.

"Whereas by an act passed in the last session of parliament, intituled 'An act to prevent the further circulation of dollars and tokens issued by the governor and company of the bank of England, for the convenience of the public,' it was enacted, that from and after the 25th day of March, 1818, the dollars and tokens in the said act mentioned should no longer pass or circulate, or be received in payment or exchange, or otherwise howsoever, under the penalties in the said act mentioned: and whereas a considerable quantity of the said dollars and tokens yet remain in circulation, and it is expedient to allow the same to be tendered and received in payment, for the purposes hereinafter mentioned, for the period hereinafter specified; be it therefore enacted, that from and after the said 25th day of March, 1818, and until the 5th day of July, 1818, the said dollars and tokens shall and may pass and circulate, and be received in payment or exchange, by such persons as shall be willing to accept thereof, in like manner as before the passing of the said recited act of the last session of parliament, any thing in the said recited act to the contrary in anywise notwithstanding; and that it shall and may be lawful for any person or persons, from and after the said 5th day of July, 1818, and until and upon the 5th day of April, 1819, to utter, offer, and tender any such dollars or tokens in payment of any taxes, rates, or duties under the management of the commissioners for affairs of taxes, or of the commissioners of customs or excise, or stamps in Great Britain, or of any postage, or in the purchase of any stamped paper, or in the payment of any rent by the tenants of any lands, tenements, messuages, or hereditaments in Great Britain, or of any parochial or other public rate, or in payment to any banker or bankers, or any common carrier, or to any other person or persons whomsoever, for the purpose of such dollars or tokens being transmitted to the bank of England; and that any person or persons who shall during the said periods respectively offer, utter, or tender in payment any such dollars or tokens, according to the provisions of this act, shall not be liable to any penalty under the said recited act; any thing in the said recited act to the contrary notwithstanding.

II. And be it further enacted, that the said recited act of the last session of parliament, and all the provisions and clauses therein contained, shall be and continue in full force and effect, except only so far as the same is and are altered by the express words of this act.

III. And be it further enacted, that this act may be amended, altered, or repealed by any act or acts to be passed in this present session of parliament."

GOLD AND SILVER COIN.] The Earl of Lauderdale moved for an account of the silver issued from the Mint since the new coinage, distinguishing the different kinds of shillings, sixpences, crowns, and half-crowns. He moved for this, as he had already done for other papers, preparatory to a motion which he intended to submit to their lordships at an early day after the recess, on the general state of the circulation of the country. In calling their lordships' attention to that subject, he did not mean to confine himself merely to an inquiry into the state of the paper system, but wished also to take into consideration the state of the silver coinage in relation to the gold. He did not now mean to enter into the question of the depreciation of bank-notes; but if even it should appear that there was no depreciation of that description of paper, still such was the state of our silver coinage as issued from the Mint, of which only 42*l*. was a legal tender, it appeared to him impossible gold should circulate in the country. It would then be a question for their lordships' consideration, whether, if the bank opened for payment in specie, it would be practicable to keep up the circulation of gold. If it should be found to be the case, that the state of the coinage did not admit of the measure being carried into full effect, it would be committing a great evil to adopt a measure which would call upon bankers to circulate gold at a time when its circulation with silver would be impracticable. He thought it right to throw out this hint of the view with which he should bring forward the motion he intended to submit to their lordships, and which he would propose, not for the purpose of stating his own opinions, but in order to hear those of others, and to afford an opportunity of coming to a decision on this important question. He should bring forward the motion on the 14th of April next, for which day he moved that their lordships be summoned.—Ordered.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, March 18.

RIBBON WEAVERS.] The report of the minutes of evidence taken before the committee appointed to consider of the several petitions relating to ribbon weavers was presented.—Ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

WATCHMAKERS.] The report of the select committee appointed to consider of the laws relating to watchmakers, was presented.—Ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed. The committee concluded their observations in these words: "Resolved, that it is the opinion of this committee, that it is highly expedient, that some parliamentary regulations, which shall embrace the general interests of the empire, in the preservation of the art, manufacture, and trade of clock and watch-making, and the various branches and matters connected therewith, and the individuals engaged therein, should be adopted with respect to the several points enumerated in this report, and for the speedy relief of the petitioners, and thereby to effect a reduction of the poor rates now levied, and bearing heavily on real property, for the support of the willing, industrious, and hard labouring artizan, in so far as the deficiency in the reward of labour is supplied by charitable contributions."

IONIAN ISLANDS.] Mr. Goulburn presented the constitutional chart of the United States of the Ionian islands, as agreed on and passed unanimously by the legislative assembly, on the 2d of May, 1817. It was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.—The following are the articles of General Organization.

Art. 1.—The United States of the IONIAN ISLANDS are composed of Corfu, Cephalonia, Zanté, Sta Maura, Ithaca, Cerigo and Paxo, and the other smaller islands, situated along the coast of Albania and the Morea, which formerly belonged to the Venetian dominions.

Art. 2.—The seat of the general government of the United States of the Ionian Islands is declared to be permanently fixed in the capital of the island of Corfu.

Art. 3.—The established religion of these states is the orthodox Greek religion; but all other forms of the Christian religion shall be protected, as hereinafter stated.

Art. 4.—The established language of these states is the Greek; and in consequence, it is hereby declared to be an article of primary importance, that the language of the nation should become, as soon as possible, that, in which all the records of government should be held, all process of law alone conducted, and in fact, the sole recognized language for official proceedings within these states.

Art. 5.—It being impossible, however, from the circumstances of the case, to carry the above principle into immediate effect, the whole business of the country having been hitherto conducted principally in the Italian language; it is ordained, that during the first parliament, the Italian shall be the language in which all public business is to be conducted, save and except in the instances of the minor courts of law, where it may be judged expedient by the government to introduce the native language, with a view to its encouragement and general propagation.

Art. 6.—With a further view, at once to encourage the propagation of the languages of the protecting and protected states, his highness the president of the senate shall be bound, within six days after the first meeting of any parliament, to send down to the legislative assembly, a projèt of a law, to be therein discussed, relative to how far it may be possible to extend the native language to other departments, or to the whole of the government; and it is to be clearly understood, that whenever a law is passed, declaring the Greek language to be the sole official language, that the only other language that can be made use of in copies, or otherwise, is that of the protecting power, viz. —the English.

Art. 7.—The civil government of these states shall be composed of a legislative assembly, of a senate, and of a judicial authority.

Art. 8.—The military command in these states being placed, by the treaty of Paris, in the hands of his majesty's commander in chief, it remains with him.

Art. 9.—The legislative assembly shall be elected in manner and form hereinafter laid down, from the body of the noble electors.

Art. 10.—The senators shall be elected out of the body of the legislative assembly, in manner and form as may hereinafter be directed.

Art. 11.—The judicial authority shall be selected by the senate, in manner and form as shall hereinafter be directed.

Art. 12.—These elections, and all other civil appointments, shall be valid for the period of five years, except as may be hereinafter provided for.

Art. 13.—At the expiration of five years, all appointments of right fall to the ground, and the new election of the new legislative assembly shall take place on the day of the expiration of the term of five years; but his highness the president of the senate, and the senators, the regents of the local governments, the judges, together with all the ministerial officers in the various departments, shall continue to exercise their duties; the first till replaced by the new senate and president; the second till relieved by the new regents; the judges and ministerial officers, till removed or re-appointed by the proper authority.

Art. 14.—When the legislative assembly holds a session at the seat of government, the civil authority shall be termed the parliament of the United States of the Ionian Islands; and such session, being the first, shall be termed the first session of the first parliament.

Art. 15.—The second parliament, and the subsequent sessions, shall be styled numerically in the same manner.

Art. 16.—All acts of the legislative assembly, of the senate, and generally of all the departments of government, shall be registered according to the parliament and session in which they may have been enacted, or otherwise carried into effect.

Art. 17.—During the first parliament an annual session shall take place, of right, the first day of every March, and shall continue in activity for three months; but such sessions may be prolonged beyond the said three months, in the event of necessity, for a period to be declared by the senate and approved of by his excellency the lord high commissioner of the protecting sovereign.

Art. 18.—In every subsequent parliament a session shall take place, of right, on the 1st day of March, in every two years, and shall continue in activity for the same period, as stated in the preceding article.

Art. 19.—The power of assembling and proroguing parliament, on an emergency, shall be vested in his excellency the lord high commissioner of the protecting sovereign; but parliament cannot be prorogued for a longer space than six months.

Art. 20.—The power of dissolving parliament, on any special emergency, shall be solely vested in his majesty by an order in council.

Art. 21.—On parliament being prorogued, the session of the legislative assembly shall forthwith cease for the period of prorogation; and all bills and acts of every kind, not completely carried through the parliament, shall fall to the ground.

Art. 22.—When the parliament is dissolved, all bills and acts of every kind, not completely carried through, fall equally to the ground.

Art. 23.—The public instruction of youth being one of the most important points, connected with the prosperity and happiness of any state; and it being of the utmost importance, both to the morals and religion of the country, that its pastors in particular should receive a liberal and adequate education, it is hereby declared to be a primary duty, immediately after the meeting of parliament, subsequent to the ratification of this constitutional chart by his majesty the protecting sovereign, that measures should be adopted by the parliament for the institution, in the first place, of primary schools, and subsequently for the establishment of a college for the different branches of science, of literature, and of the fine arts.

Poor Laws.] Mr. Thompson presented the following petition of several householders, shopkeepers, warehouse-keepers, and other inhabitants of the town of Kingston-upon-Hull. "That, from the general distresses of the country, and from the peculiar operation of those distresses at Hull, the petitioners are burthened with a poor tax of such magnitude in its amount, as to threaten in its effects the annihilation of those possessions which the petitioners have hitherto enjoyed; that, in order to discharge a large debt incurred in 1816, and to provide for the maintenance of the poor in this year, the guardians of the poor have been under the necessity of levying a poor tax of 600*l*. per week, the pressure of which is most severely felt by the householders of the town, many of whom, in consequence of this enormous rate, are unable to pay the just demands of their creditors; that one great cause of the rapid and ruinous increase of the poor tax in Hull is the want of employment for the poor, but especially for persons who have been brought up in the sea-service, and who, from their habits of life, are as unwilling as they are unable to attempt any productive labour on land; that, during the winter of 1816, the expense of maintaining the seamen and their families in Hull, principally belonging to the fishing ships, was near 200*l*. per week; and that, but a few weeks after the return of those ships with their numerous crews, the petitioners regularly experienced a great increase in the demand of the poor rates; that it is well known to the house that the poor tax is levied principally on real property, and that personal property is by law, or from the difficulty of assessing it, almost wholly exempt from the payment of the tax; that the petitioners are constrained to represent to the house, the justice and necessity of passing a law which shall subject the shipping of the kingdom, and other personal property, to the payment of the poor tax; and they beg leave to state, that it appears to them especially equitable that the commerce of the country should contribute, by a poor tax, to the support of the numerous population which it has produced, and by which it has so greatly benefited; that many ship-owners, whose vessels frequent the port of Hull, do not occupy any house in Hull, although their apprentices, completing their service and lodging in Hull, obtain settlements there; and that, to the knowledge of the petitioners, the rate on the profits of certain vessels used as passage-boats has been lost altogether, in consequence of the residence of the owner being in one parish, and his property in another; that the petitioners are informed that, in several of the sea-ports in the kingdom, a rate is levied at present on ships, either by the consent of the ship-owners, from a conviction of its justice, or under the authority of local acts of parliament for the purpose; the petitioners therefore humbly pray, that the house will consider their distressed state, arising from the enormous increase of the poor tax, and they confidently hope that they will devise such measures of amelioration or reduction of this most oppressive impost, as may avert the dreadful consequences which must arise from a continuance of it."

The petition was referred to the committee on the poor laws, and ordered to be printed.

Parliamentary Reform.] Five petitions of freeholders and others of the township of Harrington; also, a petition of inhabitants of Liverpool; also of Nottingham, in favour of a reform of parliament, were presented, and ordered to lie upon the table.

LONGITUDE AND NORTHERN PASSAGE BILL.] On the motion of Mr. Croker, this bill was read a third time, and passed.

SAVING-BANKS.] Mr. Douglas moved for leave to bring in a bill for the protection of saving-banks in Scotland.

Sir R. Fergusson stated his approbation of the bill, which was drawn up by a reverend gentleman, who had been very useful to the country of Scotland. Leave was given to bring in the bill.

SPANISH SLAVE TRADE.] Dr. Phillimore said that, in rising, pursuant to notice, to bring forward his motion respecting Spanish ships engaged in the slave trade, it would be unnecessary to trespass long on the time of the house, as the subject was confined within narrow limits. By a treaty concluded between his Britannic majesty, and his Catholic majesty, for preventing their subjects from engaging in any illicit traffic in slaves, signed at Madrid, the 23d of September, 1817, (see page 40,) the sum of 400,000*l.* sterling was agreed to be paid as a compensation for losses sustained by the subjects of his Catholic majesty engaged in this traffic. By a petition presented to this house, on the 9th of February last, from Mr. Page, who described himself as legally appointed by several merchants, planters, and ship-owners of the Havanna, to obtain satisfaction from the British government, for various illegal captures and condemnations of Spanish vessels and cargoes engaged in the African trade, (see page 189,) it appeared, that the whole property of Spanish claimants thus seized might be reduced to three distinct classifications—first, those cases of vessels condemned in the colonial courts, where the appeal was interposed too late: 2dly, the cases of appeals in progress; and, lastly, those cases where the decrees of the courts of this country had ordered restitution to the full value of the property. With the two first classes, his motion had nothing to do. It exclusively referred to the case of those claimants who were in possession of sentences of restitution from British courts in this country. It might be said, and he did not mean to controvert the position, that the king of Spain possessed the power of contracting for his subjects in arrangements with foreign states. It was not his intention to enter on that view of the question. It was much more material with him to uphold and preserve inviolate the ancient and pre-eminent character of the courts in which the laws of nations were administered in this country. The parties who had sought for restitution of their property had appealed to the British courts, in the fullest reliance on their acknowledged character for undeviating good faith and justice. And, in referring to the cases where the sentence of restitution had been made, he found, that restitution was ordered in two instances, as far back as January, 1817; another in May of the same year, and the fourth in December last, while the treaty with Spain was not ratified until the end of that month. Yet, by that treaty, a decree of the law of nations, putting these parties in possession of their property, or the value of their property, was rendered, to all useful purposes in this country, but as so much waste paper (hear, hear.) It was unnecessary for him to trespass on the attention of that house with any panegyric on the character of those courts. Happily for the times in which we lived, their decisions did not rest on abstract or speculative notions; they had attained to a certainty equal to those of the municipal courts. It must therefore be a source of regret to see their decrees reduced by any transaction to a perfect nullity. Before the execution of the recent treaty, no merchant in England would have refused the most liberal advances to these claimants on the security of those sentences of restitution. At present they were wholly valueless. But the case of these claimants stood on stronger grounds than the mere sentence of restitution. They were protected by an act of parliament, the 55th of the present reign, by which, not only a restitution in value was enacted, but it was ordered, that payment should be made on the production of the sentences by the treasurer of the navy. Applications had been made by these claimants to the courts, in order to accelerate the payment, and the answer was, that a treaty was pending. Of the treasurer of the navy, the value of the property had been demanded, but the claim was, from time to time, evaded, although, under the provisions of the very act of parliament, a sum of 48,000*l.* was paying to French claimants, similarly situated. He could not but consider it due to the character of the tribunals in this country, in which the law of nations was administered, that government should specially provide for those, who held sentences of restitution under their order, and that it should not go forth to the world, that they were vilified and of no effect. It was endeavoured, by those who looked at our maritime character with jealousy, to attach a political character to those tribunals. To that aspersion their pre-eminent character was the best refutation, and therefore it was, that he regretted any event that had a tendency to impair the value of their decisions. Why should not these claimants be indemnified?—There remained one point on which, from what he had heard since he entered the house, he was anxious to be fully understood. No man more sincerely wished for the total abolition of the slave trade—no man was more sensible of the embarrassments this country had to contend with, in achieving that important concession, by which the tract of the African continent, to the northward of the equinoctial line, was at length placed within the pale of civilized society, and relieved from the predatory attacks of the Spanish slave dealer, and all others, who had so long carried on their detestable pursuit, under the cover of that flag. The question which he had the honour to submit stood wholly independent of the slave trade. The hon. and learned gentleman concluded with moving, "That an humble address be presented to his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, to represent to his Royal Highness, that it appears to this house, that several Spanish subjects have obtained sentences of restitution of vessels engaged in the African slave trade, which had been detained by his Majesty's cruizers, and brought to adjudication in the courts of admiralty of this country, but have not yet been put into possession of the same: and that they commenced and prosecuted their suits at considerable expense, under the implicit confidence which they have reposed in the justice and integrity of the British tribunals, and upon the faith of an act passed in the 55th year of his majesty's reign, intituled, 'An act to provide for the support of captured slaves during the period of adjudication.'

"That, being deeply interested in upholding and maintaining inviolate the decisions of the tribunals of this country, most earnestly to entreat his Royal Highness, that he will be graciously pleased to take effectual measures to provide that the Spanish subjects, who are actually in possession of sentences of restitution, may receive the full amount of the property decreed to be restored to them."

Lord Castlereagh said, that he had listened with great pleasure to the fair exposition of the learned and hon. gentleman. He trusted, however, that he should be able to prove to him, that neither the principles nor practice of the law of nations had been violated in the late arrangement with the court of Spain. He contended, that by the principles of international law, the sovereign of one state had not only power to contract with the sovereign of another state as to the claims of his subjects, but could even proceed to the extent of releasing them. This right was founded on the common principle of the public security; for unless the sovereign possessed that right of interference, to what an extent of warfare and contention would the transactions of individuals most probably lead? On the common reason of the thing, therefore, it was clear, that the power of compounding the claims of subjects resided in the crown. All writers on the law of nations, had asserted and maintained this point. But it was not in theory alone that such a right existed; it had been exercised in two very particular cases. One was, the treaty of Vienna in 1815, when 300,000*l.* were given to Portugal, in compensation for the same description of claim as the 400,000*l.* were given to Spain in the present instance. The other was the case of the American treaty in 1783, by which it was stipulated that British suitors were entitled to legal remedies in the courts of that country. In some cases, they obtained justice, but the denials of justice were so numerous, that the respective governments interposed by a public arrangement. There were two modifications entered into on the subject. The first established the right of going with claims, not to courts of justice, but before commissioners, who were to examine them, and to order payment. The proceedings before the commissioners not having given satisfaction, a second modification was entered into, in 1794, which compounded the whole claims for 600,000*l.* This composition was received by the crown, although the claims, if prosecuted, would have amounted to five or six millions. In the present case, however, the sum given to the Spanish king was not only ample enough for all the claims of his subjects, but was considerably beyond their amount. The precedent of America, followed by the treaty of 1815, and the common sense and laws of nations, thus established the right and power of one sovereign to compound with another for the interests of his subjects. There was a general observation made by the hon. and learned gentleman, to which every man was alive—that it was of the utmost importance to the national honour to support the national tribunals; but the hon. and learned member had neglected to remark the natural distinction between tribunals for internal cases of justice, and those for the laws of nations. Whenever a treaty was agreed upon between two nations, from that moment it formed a part of the law of nations. If, then, the proposition he had stated, that it was in the power of a sovereign to enter into treaty respecting the claims of subjects, was right, it was no more an impeachment upon the treaty in question to have recognized a composition, than it was upon this country to have entered into the composition with America. The judgments referred to by the hon. and learned gentleman, were not judgments affecting the revenue of the country, through the treasurer of the navy, but the captors of the vessels in question. In proof of this, he would remind the hon. and learned gentleman, that his clients would have sold those judgments at such a discount as to take a few shillings in the pound before the treaty had been known, and that he had presented a petition for his Spanish clients, praying for a public compensation, the same as had been given in the case of Portugal, because there was so much litigation and difficulty in the way of getting satisfaction from the captors. Was it not hard, then, after not only the same measure of justice, but a greater had been meted out to them, that complaints should now be urged on that ground? But to argue more closely with the hon. and learned gentleman. He had represented the great hardship and injustice of stepping in between individuals and the tribunals which had given judgment in their favour. This he wished to be kept particularly in view by the house, for he could shew them that the claimants were deprived of no right which they had had either in equity or by statute. There were two views to be taken of the question: 1. What was the principle on which any claim in equity could be founded; and, 2. What the claimants were entitled to on that principle. With respect to the first view, they were entitled to nothing in equity. The statute of July, 1815, was passed for purposes of humanity, that slaves found in captured vessels might be immediately relieved from their unhappy situation, and not obliged to wait the issue of a long litigation. With this view it was enacted, that if the capture should afterwards be declared illegal, an equivalent should be given for the slaves by the treasurer of the navy. As this act could only operate prospectively, not one case of those in question could be, in any view, brought within its operation. All of them but one were extra the whole proceedings contemplated by the statute. The hon. and learned gentleman had been guilty of a fallacy, if not of misrepresentation, respecting the cases in question. There were altogether twenty-one cases in different stages. In sixteen of those cases the captures had taken place before July, 1815. The act of parliament of that date could by possibility, therefore, apply only to five of them. The sixteen cases had no reference whatever to the act, and could claim no remedy whatever, except from the clemency of parliament, if parliament chose to extend it to them; four cases out of the other five were still in course of litigation, and no judgment whatever had been given upon them. Only one case, then, could be attempted to be included in the provisions of the act, and this case he should shew to be on grounds very different from those contemplated by the act. It was the case of the Rosa. That vessel had not been captured by our cruisers, but had been driven by stress of weather on the coast of one of the Bahama islands, and had been taken, because some slaves were on board. Upon the hon. and learned gentleman's own shewing, therefore, no claim could be urged against the treasurer of the navy. There were only five judgments, and those were against the captors, and surely the claimants, as to the remedy now afforded to them, compared with their prospect of recovering from the captors, had no right to complain of this country for turning them over to the justice of their own country. He had thus shewn that the claimants had no right against the state, but against the captors; and that their claims against them could not stand in the way of entering into treaty, otherwise they would stand in the way of all treaties. Looking at the treaty with Spain, he would say, that the claimants, by going to their king with judgments obtained in this country, would have an additional claim for justice, and an impediment against injustice. But, if individual cases had been specially stipulated for in the treaty, it would have occasioned much obscurity. Nothing could be more unwise than to include in a treaty all cases in progress in the courts. There was nothing so dangerous as introducing unnecessary words into a treaty. By this treaty the King of Spain had taken upon himself to make satisfaction for all losses sustained by his subjects. If, then, the judgments were not, as they were, against the captors, but against the public, it would be difficult to prove that we were bound to make twofold restitution. He would not attempt to prejudice any man; but if Americans and others, who, under the disguise of Spaniards, had trafficked in slaves, had applied to our courts, and managed their disguise so well as to have obtained judgments, was it not the wisest and the most just course to refer them to the country to which they affected to belong? He believed that there were such claimants, and Spain had better means than ourselves of detecting them, and of separating the real Spanish claimants from the illicit traders who had carried on depredations under its flag. It was thus an essential ingredient of justice, to refer them to the country to which, they said, they belonged. It was impossible to get at the truth in any other country. Upon the whole, he trusted that he had satisfied the house, that no doubt had hitherto existed with regard to the competence of the sovereign power of a state, upon all the principles of international law, to conclude a treaty with another foreign power, of the nature of that under consideration. He had shewn, that it had been recognized on two solemn occasions, and that there was no ground of charge against the navy board, as having placed itself between a judgment on statute law, and its execution. He had only to remind them, that the Spanish flag had been made use of by the subjects of other states as a cloak to their violation of the law, and that the Spanish courts must necessarily be the fittest places for determining any questions which might arise out of that practice. Hoping, therefore, that he had relieved the hon. and learned gentleman's mind from all apprehension with respect to the authority of our own tribunals, he should conclude by expressing his intention to oppose the motion, as unnecessary.

Lord Archibald Hamilton said, he addressed the house with reluctance on this subject, but he considered that, by the noble lord's own admission, injustice had been done somehow and somewhere. He was sorry that a claim in equity should be connected with any thing so atrocious as the slave-trade; but he nevertheless thought the honour and justice of the country implicated in this question. With regard to the precedent of the American treaty, he believed no previous adjudication had taken place, and that the aggrieved merchants had never been reconciled to it. If the noble lord thought this last circumstance of small importance, would he inform the house whether Lord Sidmouth was reconciled to it? The noble lord had referred the claimants to the Spanish government; but the correspondence on the table shewed that the answer of Spain would be, that the parties in question were excluded by the treaty. Had the captors really paid the damages and costs incurred, could it be denied that our government would have borne them harmless? And had not the sufferers, therefore, a clear equitable claim for compensation? He could not think it fair, after they had gone successfully through a long and laborious process of litigation for the recovery of their demands, to turn them over to the Spanish courts, there to establish their claims a second time. In any view of the case, great blame appeared to him to attach, not to the courts in this country, but to the noble lord and his colleagues, for making a treaty which so directly interfered with the legal rights of individuals.

Lord Castlereagh observed that, for all vessels captured before the treaty, the claimants would have a right to proceed in the courts of Spain.

Mr. Wynn said, he did not mean to deny that the noble lord had correctly described the extent of the sovereign authority; the only question now was, as to the manner in which it had been exercised. He admitted that such claims as had not been adjudicated were a fit subject for negotiation; but here were cases in which sentence had been pronounced, and an express act of parliament providing in such cases for the sufferers. The claimaints had acted in reliance upon this security, and had therefore, at least, an equitable claim upon the government for compensation to the full amount of the sums they had recovered. The precedent of the American treaty was qualified by a great variety of circumstances. It was notorious, that, after the ferment of the war, the courts of justice in that country were not to British subjects the seats of equity. In the present instance, the interests of the claimants should be protected by the decisions of the courts, and not transferred to another tribunal, where the parties must incur fresh trouble and expense.

Mr. Brougham was of opinion, that if the consent of the court of Spain to abolish the trade were the only result of the payment of 400,000*l.* it would be sufficient; but he considered that the additional arrangement relative to the right of search without which the abolition of the trade would be impossible, was of itself worth the whole sum. It was also to be recollected that the Spanish government received this money partly in consideration of their making good the losses sustained by their subjects by captures; to which, indeed, one-half of it would probably be applicable. The hon. and learned gentleman argued, that the act of our government was not the cause of any injustice that might be apprehended; for if no treaty had been concluded, it would have been competent to the Spanish government to bar the claims of the parties in question by an act of state. It was certainly a case of great hardship on the parties who had brought actions and obtained judgments, and on the credit of those judgments had, perhaps, obtained advances; but there were many other cases of hardships arising out of the established principle, that subjects were bound by the acts of their sovereign. Up to the final adjudication, the whole claim of a captor might be abandoned for him by his government; saddling him with all the costs of his action. He thought, however, that it would have been much better had resort been had in the instances in question to the droits of Admiralty. In conclusion, the hon. and learned gentleman expressed his earnest and anxious hope, and, indeed, his sanguine expectation, that by the stipulations which had been entered into between some of the governments of Europe (which he trusted would be speedily extended) and more especially by the admission of the right of search, the great measure of the total abolition of the slave trade would, ere long, be completely accomplished.

Lord Castlereagh, in reference to what had just fallen from the hon. and learned gentleman, was persuaded it would be satisfactory to him and to the house to be informed, that the government of the Netherlands had signified their readiness to assent to the principles of the treaties with Spain and Portugal; and that a treaty to that effect was in a state of great forwardness. (Hear, hear, hear.)

Mr. Wilberforce said, that the cases involved in the present question could not be distinguished from those of the ordinary exercise of the sovereign power. The hon. and learned gentleman had dwelt on the losses likely to be sustained by Spanish claimants, if the awards of our courts were not carried into execution; but it was known, that the Spanish flag had been fraudulently used as a protection for carrying on the odious and inhuman traffic in slaves. The very solicitude now manifested to obtain payment from the British government, was a strong evidence of the truth of his representation. Such was the disposition to evade every measure which had been adopted for putting a stop to the African slave-trade, that the whole tract of country along the banks of the Senegal was one continued scene of desolation. The mischief was to be imputed to the French settlements on that coast. The noble lord opposite had stated that one governor had been already discharged for misconduct in this matter; (see page 224) and he trusted that the French government, alive to its own engagements, as well as to the general rights of humanity, would soon remove every obstacle to the complete accomplishment of so desirable an object. He trusted that, when Spain and Portugal had done so much, France and America would soon follow their example. He hoped that the present French Monarch, a man of humanity and religion himself, and who knew what it was to be unfortunate and to suffer, would lend the authority of his exalted station to do away the wrongs and sufferings of so large a portion of his fellow beings. If he was led to augur thus favourably with respect to France*, there was less doubt with respect to the United States of America, friendly as that country ought to be to the general liberty and happiness of mankind†. The treaty which had been concluded with the government of Spain seemed well calculated to secure the great object at which it aimed. That government had made such concessions as appeared to warrant the expectation that the arrangements of the treaty would be faithfully acted upon, and he should be grieved extremely if this motion should tend to disturb its operations.

Mr. Money said, he considered the 400,000*l.* given to Spain under this treaty expended for one of the most just and noble purposes. It reflected the highest honour on the country; and he believed, that if for such a purpose the people were to be called on for their contributions, the penny of the poor would be blended with the pound of the rich.

Dr. Phillimore said, that the hon. gentleman who had just sat down had directed his remarks entirely to the slave trade. For his own part, he could yield to no man in the sincerity of his wishes for the total abolition of that inhuman traffic. It was on that account he had been at pains to shew that the present motion was a distinct and separate question. The question was, whether the Spanish claimants who had obtained sentences of restitution in the admiralty court of this country, should be placed by this treaty on a different footing from that on which they would have been if this arrangement had not been entered into? The present question did not turn on the right of the Spanish crown over Spanish subjects—here British subjects were also concerned. He still maintained that the credit and character of this country would be impeached, if the decisions of its highest tribunals should be nullified. There were four cases, of which three did not come within the act; the fourth did. The noble lord had said, that the remedy of the claimants was not against the public, but against the captors; but would it be just that the captors should be forced to indemnify the claimants? The good faith of the country was pledged to give either the restitution of the thing itself, or the value in money. The decrees were obtained long before the date of the treaty. He found no fault with giving 400,000*l.* to the king of Spain; but when the treaty was entered into, the cases of those who had obtained sentences for the restitution of their property, or an equivalent, ought to have been taken into consideration. On the faith of the decree, money could have been raised in any town of Europe. The credit of a British court of admiralty ought not to have been made to depend on the conduct of a king of Spain. Hitherto the decrees of the court of admiralty had been unimpeached, but now, the parties were left to the mercy of the Spanish government, and it was well known, that there was no court in Europe whose credit was so low as that of Spain. The claimants had not the smallest chance of receiving any thing from that government. It was rather unfair too, to say that the claimants had been guilty of fraud, which was the reason why they were so anxious to apply to England rather than to Spain. They had been recommended to him as men of fair character, and he had no reason whatever to doubt their respectability, or the validity of their claims. They had obtained the sentences of several courts in their favour, with costs and damages. The cases had been appealed from the viceroyalty courts to the highest court—and the claims stood, therefore, on the authority of the highest tribunal known to the law of nations. If there had been any fraud, it would have

* It has since appeared, that the King of France has determined that a squadron of ships of war shall constantly cruise on the African coast, for the purpose of visiting all French merchantmen, and enforcing the due execution of the laws which have been enacted in France for the abolition of the slave trade. The following Royal Ordinance appeared in the Paris papers of the 26th of June, 1818.

"Louis, by the Grace of God, &c.

Considering the various laws by which France has prohibited the traffic known under the name of the Slave Trade, and especially our ordinance of the 8th of January, 1817, and the law of the 15th of April, 1818;

Wishing to secure by every means in our power the abolition of the slave trade in every part of our dominions—

On the report of our Minister Secretary of State for the Marine and Colonies,

We have ordained and do ordain as follows:—

Art. I. There shall be constantly maintained on the coasts of our African Establishments, a cruising squadron of our marine, for the purpose of visiting all French vessels which shall appear within the limits of our possessions on the said coasts, and of preventing every violation of our laws and ordinances."

Saint Cloud, June 24. (Signed) LOUIS.

† It appears, however, by recent accounts from the southern parts of America, that this abominable traffic is still carried on to a great extent. An article dated at New Orleans, July 14th, 1818, says, —"The slave market appears to be very brisk, constant demand, and high prices, notwithstanding the arrival lately of more than 300 from the States, and 159 in the brig Josepha, from Africa. We are, however, much indebted to the enterprising and successful exertions of Mr. C. Morgan, for the copiousness of the present supply, which, with the aid of 3 or 400 that have been seized by General Jackson's officers at Mobile, will probably suffice for the next crop. Jersey Negroes appear to be peculiarly adapted to this market, especially those who bear the mark of Judge Vanwickle, as it is understood that they afford the best opportunity for speculation. We have a right to calculate on large importations in future, from the success which has hitherto attended the appeared on the trials; but nothing of that kind had appeared. It was too much, therefore, to say that the claimants had been now unveiled —they ought to have been unveiled before the able and learned judge who presided on the different occasions. As to the precedent of the American treaty, his hon. and learned friend had shewn, that it was not applicable to the present case. Upon the whole, he had not heard any thing from the other side which made against his motion, or from which he was not the more convinced of the justice and necessity of its being acceded to.

Mr. Wilberforce, in explanation, observed, that he did not mean to cast any imputation on the character of the individuals alluded to by the hon. and learned gentleman; he meant only to say that, in general, the Spanish flag had been used for protecting the ships of Americans and others employed in the transportation of slaves. The real traders were not Spanish subjects, which accounted for their anxiety to urge their claims in this country.

The motion was then negatived without a division.

COMMISSION OF THE PEACE (IRELAND).] Sir S. Romilly presented a petition which, he said, had been put into his hands by the hon. member for Winchelsea (Mr. Brougham,) from Mr. O'Hanlon, a magistrate of the county of Down, and which, he understood, differed in no essential respects from a petition presented last year from the same gentleman. (See vol. I. p. 1378.)

It was ordered to lie upon the table.

DEFAULTERS.] An account having been ordered yesterday of a circular letter from the tax-office, that order, on the motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, was now discharged, and a copy ordered " of the circular letter from the board of taxes to the commissioners of districts, dated 1st December 1817, with an account of the number of districts in which the deficiencies therein referred to have been discovered, and the amount of such deficiencies, so far as the same have been ascertained."

DEBTOR AND CREDITOR LAW.] Sir S. Romilly presented the following petition of John Moxon, of the town of Kingston-upon-Hull, merchant, which was ordered to lie upon the table, and to be printed. " That Mr. Robert Christie Burton, a gentleman who, on the death of an uncle, came into the possession as tenant for life of real property exceeding in value 5000*l.* per annum, being indebted to the petitioner in the sum of 1000*l.* the petitioner was under the necessity, in the year 1812, in consequence of the whole of the said Robert Christie Burton's furniture, and other tangible property, having been put out of the reach of creditors by a cautious investment thereof in trustees on his marriage, of suing out execution against his person on a judgment obtained against him, and he was thereupon committed to the Castle at York; that from York Castle the said Robert Christie Burton removed himself to the King's Bench prison, where he remained for some time, enjoying the benefit of the rules, living in great splendour, and having then, as he still has, a regular supply of game from his manor of Hotham, in the neighbourhood of Hull, where the petitioner resides; that the imprisonment of the petitioner's debtor, which, under existing circumstances, was the only satisfaction the petitioner could have for his debt, was merely nominal, as the said Robert Christie Burton did not even remain within the confines of the rules of the Bench; and the petitioner frequently received information (the truth of which he has every reason to believe) of his having made excursions to Brighton, and other fashionable places; that at length in the latter part of the year 1814, the petitioner obtained positive evidence that the said Robert Christie Burton had been at Doncaster, and he immediately caused a bill to be filed against the marshal of the King's Bench for an escape; that the marshal however pleaded that Mr. Burton had escaped without his privity, and had since returned into his custody, and the petitioner was therefore advised that he could not further prosecute his action with any chance of success; that the said Robert Christie Burton, as the petitioner has been accidentally informed, was lately removed, though without the petitioner's consent, and without any notice being given to him, from the King's Bench to the Fleet prison; that within the last month the petitioner heard that the said Robert Christie Burton was preparing to pay a visit to Beverley in Yorkshire, for the purpose of canvassing that place previously to offering himself at the next election as a candidate to represent that borough in parliament; that the petitioner determined to avail himself of this flagrant breach, as he considered it, of the law when it should take place, and he accordingly gave instructions to his law agents to watch the said Robert Christie Burton's departure from the Fleet, and then to file a bill against the warden for an escape; that, to the petitioner's great surprise, he has learnt from them that no bill can be filed, either against the marshal or the warden, except in term time, and that as the term is now over, the said Robert Christie Burton may, during the vacation, make his immediate appearance amongst his friends in Yorkshire, and remain among them until the eve of the next term, without the possibility of the petitioner being able to fix the warden; that the petitioner humbly begs leave to draw the attention of the house to this important fact, and particularly as it is stated in the report from the select committee on the Insolvent Debtors' Act, page 246, that Mr. Brooshooft, the deputy marshal of the King's Bench, in answer to the following question, put to him by the committee, viz. 'Is there a certain time of the year when it (viz. travelling and visiting the Continent) may be done without any risk to the marshal?' said, 'No, he is at all times liable;' that the said Robert Christie Burton's property, though considerably encumbered in consequence of his extravagance, is sufficient, after satisfying all his debts, to leave him a very respectable income; but as he has long since got over the shame of being a prisoner for debt, the petitioner is afraid his creditors are doomed, without redress, to continue to witness and support his useless profusion, until the whole of his substance shall be entirely wasted; the petitioner therefore humbly prays, that the house will be pleased to take his case into consideration, and to make such alteration in the law relating to prisoners in execution for debt, as will afford relief to himself and others in his situation."

SAVING BANKS (ENGLAND).] On the motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the house went into a committee on the saving banks act amendment bill.

General Thornton again objected (see page 1130.) to the high rate of interest paid upon the sums deposited in these institutions.

Mr. Alderman Atkins asked, to what particular sums individuals would be limited, in placing their money in these banks?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that this was a question which required great consideration; it might be expedient, perhaps, to limit the sum to be deposited; but other opportunities would offer for proposing any amendment on that head. With respect to the rate of interest, 4½ per cent. was allowed; but when the expenses were deducted, it would be reduced to 4 per cent. A lower rate than that would not be an inducement to persons of small property to invest their money. The committee were aware that 5 per cent. could readily be had upon private security; but the most lamentable scenes of ruin and distress had occurred in consequence of such securities being taken, by the failure of the persons in whose hands the money had been placed. He entertained the utmost confidence, that these establishments would produce a most beneficial effect on the morals and industry of those for whom they were intended, and he trusted, therefore, that parliament would not think 6000*l.* or 10,000*l.* a year too much in aid of the plan. It would be repaid to them, not three fold or ten fold, but, perhaps, a hundred fold.

The house then resumed, and the report was brought up, and ordered to be taken into further consideration on Monday, the 15th of April.

CUSTOMS CONSOLIDATION BILL.] The report of the customs consolidation bill being brought up,

The Chancellor of the Exchequer stated, that it was intended in this bill to consolidate the various duties imposed since 1809, which was the period when a consolidation last took place. The duties would remain nearly as they were, with a few exceptions. There were a few general principles to which, on this occasion, he wished to call the attention of the house. With respect to the Irish duties, which must soon undergo a revision, it was intended that they should remain for the present unchanged. No alteration would take place in the duty on timber. With respect to ad valorem duties, at present a duty of 30 per cent. was laid on unmanufactured goods, and a duty of 70 per cent. on manufactured goods. The duty on the manufactured goods was to be reduced to 50 per cent., and the duty on the unmanufactured goods was to be reduced from 30 to 20 per cent. It would, perhaps, be advisable, that the duties on sugar should be reduced to one fixed rate; but this would be a subject for future consideration. The duties on goods carried coastwise, would continue in their present state, except the duties on stone and slates, which would be rendered more simple. The duties on tonnage would not be altered. The present duties on East India goods would be assimilated to the duties on light articles imported from other parts of the British dominions. The thrown silk would be imported from India in the same manner as from ports of Europe. He congratulated the house on the great growth of the trade to India since the free intercourse with that country. The private trade exceeded not only what the evidence at the bar gave reason to expect, but the most sanguine hopes of the adventurers. (Hear.) It would be proper to give every fair encouragement to this trade which might be consistent with justice to our own manufacturers. It was proposed that raw silk, manufactured here into thrown silk, should, when exported, receive a drawback equal to the duty on raw silk imported. East India sugar would be subject to the same regulations as West India sugar, if the proposed fixed duty were established. In the linen trade there would be no alteration; nor would it be fair to make any, without allowing the Irish manufacturers to be heard on the subject.

Mr. Alderman Atkins thought it highly impolitic, that the same duty should be laid on sugar of different qualities. Nothing could be more prejudicial than to rate the duty on sugar grown at 50*s.* as high as on that grown at 90*s.* He trusted that some alteration would be made in that particular, or the consequence would be, that the growth of sugar at 50*s.* would be altogether discouraged. He suggested also, that the expences which attended the bonding of goods should be lessened, by which means, he was convinced, we might again become the great carriers of Europe.

Mr. Forbes concurred with the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to the great increase of the trade to India in British manufactured goods, especially cotton. But he remarked, that, in India, as if to check this trade, duties had been laid upon British manufactured cottons, which did not exist before.

Mr. Butterworth was of opinion, that it would be expedient to allow, in all cases, drawbacks on importation equivalent to the duties paid on import.

The report was then agreed to, and a bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Brogden, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Mr. Frederick Robinson.

FINANCE COMMITTEE.] Mr. D. Gilbert brought up the ninth report of the committee on public income and expenditure. It related to the ordnance, and was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Thursday, March 19.

ROYAL ASSENT.] The royal assent was given by commission to the Greenland fisheries oaths' bill, and the Bank tokens bill. The commissioners were, the Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Montrose, and the Earl of Shaftesbury.

LONGITUDE AND NORTHERN PASSAGE BILL.] Mr. Brogden brought from the commons this bill, which was read a first time.

GAS COMPANIES.] The order of the day being moved for the third reading of a bill for lighting the city of Bath with gas,

The Earl of Lauderdale reminded their lordships, that he had on a former occasion stated his general objections to the increase of corporations. It was not, however, on that ground that he intended to offer any observations on the present bill, but because he thought it due to the public to say, that, in his opinion, the gas companies were not so careful as they had been, and as they ought to be. The consequence of their neglect was, that the gas had not been of so pure a kind as it had been at first made; it did not pass freely through the tubes, and they were liable to be stopped. This was a serious inconvenience; for the neglect might not only suddenly deprive the metropolis, and other places which depended upon corporations, from the advantage of being regularly lighted, but might also be attended with danger to the inhabitants. He thought it his duty to take this public notice of the subject, but did not oppose the present bill.

The Earl of Shaftesbury said, that there was a clause in this, as in every bill of the kind, rendering the corporation liable to be prosecuted for a nuisance, if they were guilty of any neglect of the kind pointed out by the noble earl.

The Lord Chancellor thought, that the best clause that could be inserted in such bills, would be one to dissolve the corporation, when any negligence of the sort which had been mentioned should occur.

The bill was then read a third time and passed.

EASTER RECESS.] On the motion of the Earl of Liverpool, their lordships adjourned from this day till Thursday the 2d of April.

Thursday, March 19.

On a message to attend the lords commissioners, the House went; and being returned, Mr. Speaker reported the Royal Assent to the Greenland fisheries oaths' bill, and the Bank tokens bill.

MASQUERADES.] General Thornton adverted to a notice he had given of a motion for suppressing public masquerades; but as he did not find that it would meet with support, he should withdraw it.

MOCK AUCTIONS.] Mr. Alderman Atkins brought in a bill "to prevent fraud upon the revenue, and injury to trade, by unfair and mock auctions."—Read a first time.

CITY REVENUE.] On the motion of Sir W. Curtis, the order of the house of the 24th of February, for an account of the Bridge-house estates, was read, and discharged. An account was then ordered "of the produce of certain estates called the Bridge-house estates, and how the same have been disposed of, for the five years ending December 31, 1817, setting forth to what uses the said estates were vested."

PUBLIC-HOUSES.] Sir M. W. Ridley presented a petition of several innkeepers, victuallers, and publicans in North Shields, in the county of Northumberland, and places adjacent, setting forth, "that the duties imposed by an act passed in the 56th year of his present Majesty upon licenses for retailing ale, wine, and spirituous liquors, are so heavy, that the same cannot be borne by, and have proved ruinous to many of the petitioners, and are exceedingly burthensome and oppressive to the whole; that the present monopoly of public-houses by common brewers, the existence of which is too notorious to be denied, deprives the public of the advantage which would otherwise be derived from an improved quality of malt liquor, necessarily resulting from that competition which a free trade would, in the opinion of the petitioners, not fail to create; and that therefore such a monopoly is not only highly injurious to the interests of the petitioners, and particularly prejudicial to the labouring classes, but also a great public grievance; that, whilst the petitioners acknowledge the justice of their being subjected to all such regulations as are necessary for the preservation of the public peace and morals, and admit, therefore, the expediency of their houses being placed under the control of the civil magistrate, yet they most humbly submit to the house, that, as by the powers now vested in justices of the peace they are liable to be deprived of or refused their licenses, and thereby ruined in their concerns, without the privilege of being heard in their own defence, they are thus subjected to a species of hardship and oppression from which all other classes of their fellow subjects are most happily exempt; and praying, that the house will take the premises into consideration, and grant such relief therein as to them shall seem just and expedient."

The petition was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

PRIVATELY STEALING (IRELAND) BILL.] Mr. Peel said, he wished to assimilate the laws in England and Ireland as much as possible, and therefore moved for leave to bring in a bill "to repeal so much of an act passed in Ireland, in the 9th year of the reign of Queen Anne, intituled, 'an act for taking away the benefit of clergy in certain cases, and for taking away the Book in all cases, and for repealing part of the statute for transporting felons,' as takes away the benefit of clergy from persons stealing privily from the person of another, and more effectually to prevent the crime of larceny from the person."—Leave being given, the right hon. gentleman brought in the bill, which was read a first time.

PRIVATELY STEALING BILL.] This bill was considered in a committee, and ordered to be reported on Friday, the 3d of April.

EASTER RECESS.] On the motion of Lord Castlereagh, the house adjourned from this day till Thursday, the 2d of April.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Thursday, April 2.

LONGITUDE AND NORTHERN PASSAGE BILL.] This bill was read a second time.

STOCK DEBENTURES.] The Earl of Lauderdale moved for various papers relative to the state of the coinage and currency, from the commencement of the present reign to the 5th of January last. These papers, the noble earl stated, were necessary for the motion of which he had given notice; but, in moving for them, he should take the opportunity of asking the noble secretary of state a question on a subject intimately connected with that which it was his intention to bring under the consideration of their lordships. A rumour had for some time prevailed, of his Majesty's ministers having in preparation some plan for issuing debentures on stock. If a plan such as that reported to be in contemplation were adopted, it would completely alter the state of the currency of the country. He might, therefore, find, when the day now fixed for the motion of which he had given notice arrived, that the whole subject to which his notice applied, had become a nonentity. He wished, therefore, to be informed by the noble lord, whether it were true that any plan of the nature of that to which he had alluded was in contemplation.

The Earl of Liverpool said, that he, as well as the noble earl, had heard rumours of several projects respecting the currency being under consideration. All he could say on the subject was, that if his Majesty's government should think it advisable to submit any financial plan to the consideration of parliament, due notice would be given to their lordships. In the mean time, he could only express his hope that the noble earl would not give such credit to loose reports, as to be induced to delay any motion which he might think it right to make; and would again observe, that there was no reason to suppose any measure would be proposed, without proper time being afforded for its consideration.

The Earl of Lauderdale said, he did not mean to call on the noble secretary of state to explain the nature of any project which might be in contemplation, but it surely was in his power to say whether or not he intended to propose any plan relative to the currency. If he obtained no answer to his question, their lordships would be left in a state of singular uncertainty on this important subject. They would probably hear nothing of the plan until it was brought forward in another place. In the mean time, he should be under the necessity of postponing his motion until he saw what was intended, which, perhaps, would not be before the bills which his Majesty's ministers (who, in affairs of this kind, had assumed a power similar to that once possessed by the Lords of the Articles in his country) might think proper to introduce, were on the table. The business would then be brought forward at a late period of the session, when the state of the attendance in that house would render a full discussion impracticable. When a member of their lordships' house gave notice of a motion on so important a subject as the currency of the country, he certainly was entitled to ask, whether ministers had it in contemplation to propose any thing which might render his motion altogether nugatory. The noble secretary of state had admonished him not to give credit to loose reports; but it was not as to the truth or falsehood of any particular rumour that his question applied, and he really could not conceive it possible that any inconvenience should arise from its being answered. He did not desire to know any plan which his Majesty's ministers might have adopted, or which they might have under their consideration. All that he wished to know was, whether they intended to propose any measure which would operate a change in the existing currency of the country.

The Earl of Liverpool repeated, that if it should be thought proper to submit any plan on the subject to which the noble lord had alluded, or on any branch of that subject, to the attention of parliament, due notice of such intention would be given. He perfectly concurred with the noble earl in the opinion, that if such a question were brought forward, it ought not to be delayed until a period of the session when it could not receive the full consideration of that house. The noble earl would act according to his own sense of propriety as to the time of bringing on his motion; that was a point on which he could give no opinion.

The Earl of Lauderdale regretted that he could get no answer from the noble secretary of state. His motion stood at present for the 14th instant; whether it would be proper for him to bring it forward on that day, must be a matter of future consideration.

The motion for the papers was agreed to.

Thursday, April 2.

COTTON FACTORIES BILL.] Petitions, against this bill, were presented from certain owners of factories in Manchester, Carlisle, and Skipton. —Ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. W. Smith presented the following petition, signed by [illegible]00 labourers, who were all above sixteen years of age, and employed in the cotton spinning manufactories of Stayley Bridge, in the county of Lancaster. "That the petitioners feel themselves much oppressed by the immoderate and protracted labour to which they are subjected in cotton mills, extending to fourteen or fifteen hours per day, (inclusive of the time granted for dinner), with a slender abatement thereof on Saturday alone, in apartments of high temperature, and in infected air, which, for those reasons, are injurious to the animal system; that the consequences of task-work thus severe, and in places so impure, the petitioners experience, to their sorrow, premature debility and distempered frames, which, under various shapes, make the prime of their manhood the termination of their usefulness, and the prelude to still heavier evils, as procuring their dismission from the only employment which they have been taught, as soon as in any degree they prove insufficient to this exorbitant labour; that not for themselves alone, but yet more, if possible, for their children and relatives of tender years, do the petitioners intreat compassionate regard, witnessing as they do with painful feelings the miseries thus entailed on those who are most dear to them, too manifest to every eye in the pallid looks and frequent distortions hence originating, and in the less known but more deadly mischief of constitutions early broken, and some of the worst evils of age treading on the heels as it were of infancy and youth; and the petitioners cannot here omit to state, that in addition to the other hardships of this infant class of labourers, many of them are detained three or four days a week from their dinners at home, for the purpose of assisting in cleaning the machinery; that the owners of factories being deeply interested in perpetuating the system complained of, and jealous of yielding to a competition, or the chance of a superiority in the market, no hope exists in reason or in past experience, that they will depart from a rigid adherence to a plan which is to their dependents so oppressive; that the petitioners, aware of this, and having heard that the notice of the house has been called to this subject so long since as the year 1816, they consoled themselves with the prospect of the only remedy that seemed proportioned to the hardships of their case, and it is only when at length, after a long and painful suspense, the hope which they had so fondly cherished, is attempted to be wrested from them, and both themselves and their cause publicly misrepresented, that they now humbly represent their grievances to the house, and pray that the provisions of Sir Robert Peel's original bill, to which they have before adverted, curtailing the working hours to twelve, and so as to allow thereout half an hour for breakfast, and one hour for dinner, may pass into a law, with such other regulations as shall seem expedient to the wisdom and humanity of the house, for the relief of the petitioners, and of the children, whose condition they have so much reason to regret."

The petition was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

Mr. W. Smith then presented the following petition, signed by 4000 labourers, above sixteen years of age, employed in cotton spinning manufactories at Herod and its vicinity, in the parish of Ashton-under-line, in the county of Lancaster. "That the petitioners are generally engaged in work at the mills of their employers from fourteen to fifteen hours, including the time allowed for dinner and breakfast, every day of the week except Saturday, when the working hours are somewhat reduced; that this long protracted labour, performed in rooms ill ventilated, frequently overheated, and rendered still more pernicious by dust and cotton flyings, is attended with the most alarming consequences to the general health of the labourers, as a large portion of them, from woeful experience, can abundantly prove, and which discovers itself to the most superficial observer in their sallow looks and emaciated constitutions; that if in such a state of long and pernicious confinement, those who are subject to it live to an age when the services of other working classes become most efficient and valuable, they are generally too much enfeebled to continue with effect their employment during the requisite hours, a misfortune frequently succeeded by another of a still more direct and calamitous nature, a dismission from service, destined to linger out the remainder of a miserable existence under the accumulated pressure of poverty, debility, and premature old age, with all its train of infirmities; while, agreeable to the policy of the prevailing system, abler and more vigorous hands are invariably and exclusively preferred; that the petitioners, in representing their unfortunate situation, beg leave to observe, that they are actuated by motives, not merely for themselves alone, but by a sympathetic regard for the rising generation, with whom they stand connected by the tenderest ties of relationship, and who they painfully observe, in numerous instances, manifest early symptoms of deformity in their limbs, and all the other evils of sickly and impaired constitutions; that the petitioners entertain no hope of redress whatever, except from the humane interposition of the house, because some masters will always be found sufficiently interested in perpetuating the system, while others, better disposed, will be unavoidably led to the adoption of this pernicious and destructive example, that their yarns may be brought to market on more equal terms; that the petitioners, who have for the last two years cherished the expectation of relief from the legislature, cannot express, in terms adequate to the subject, the concern which they felt in learning, upon the conclusion of the last session, that no provisions had then been made for this purpose, and they now therefore deem it expedient to submit the peculiar hardships under which they have to struggle, to the protecting wisdom of the house; they therefore humbly pray, that a law may be passed to restrict the time of actual labour in cotton factories to ten hours and a half each day, so as to allow, within the ordinary space of twelve hours, half an hour for breakfast and an hour for dinner, a regulation which is of general observance in other employments much less prejudicial to health than those of the petitioners."

The petition was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

Mr. J. Smith presented the following petition, signed by 640 inhabitants of New Lanark. "That the petitioners understand that a bill is now before the house, having for its object to enact regulations favourable to the education, morals, and comforts of persons employed in cotton and other manufactories; that the petitioners feel a lively interest in the success of any measure that is proposed on this subject of a meliorating tendency, being impressed with a deep conviction of the serious evils arising from the practices which prevail in the management of manufacturing establishments; that the grievance which they would particularly urge upon the consideration of the house, is the oppressive length to which the term of daily labour in these manufactories has by degrees been extended; the hours of working which are exacted being in general no less than fourteen or fifteen per day, while only one hour's interval, frequently not more than forty minutes, is allowed for dinner, which is usually the only occasion during the day when the work people are released from the manufactory: breakfast and an afternoon's repast being taken within, and while the machinery is partially at work; that in the course of the last twenty or thirty years, during which manufactures have spread with such rapidity over the country, an immense population has been created and trained to become subservient to their operations, that it is a fact, unhappily too notorious, that the supply of labour in every branch of the national industry has for many years past greatly exceeded the demand; that in consequence the working man, whatever his situation might once have been, is now not in the capacity of one who feels himself entitled to insist upon conditions in the disposal of his services, but literally in that of a helpless and humble supplicant for employment in any shape and upon any terms; and that he is not therefore, and cannot in any proper sense be considered, any longer a free labourer; that the petitioners state these facts to shew that the persons employed in manufactories have had no means of resisting the encroachments which have been made on their former hours of relaxation from labour, encroachments the more cruel, as, from the confined and unhealthy nature of their employments, that relaxation is absolutely indispensable, even to a moderate share of health and comfort; that the petitioners are persuaded this system of protracted labour and confinement will appear to the house to be a still more serious subject of complaint, when it is stated, that children, who form a great proportion of those employed, are received into these manufactories at the early age of seven or eight, sometimes indeed still earlier, for no legal restriction hitherto exists as to this important point; that these children, many of whom are orphans, and procured from overseers of parishes, are subjected to the same hours of labour and confinement as the adults; that not only are the benefits of education placed beyond their reach, but disease and an enfeebled constitution too frequently entailed upon them by this unnatural procedure, the cruelty of which is aggravated by the fact, that while their education is thus abandoned to neglect, they are placed under circumstances well known to be in general in the highest degree unfavourable to good morals, presenting temptations to vice and crime which it would require all the aids of the best training and instruction to enable them to overcome; that against the abolition of practices so cruel to the immediate sufferers, and so pernicious to the whole community, one argument only has been adduced, namely, that any restriction of the time of working in mills of machinery would occasion a proportionate diminution of the produce of our manufactories; that it would thereby increase the prime cost of the article manufactured, and operate against the trade in foreign markets: that although this argument were true, and a small fractional addition to the prime cost of our cottons or woollens should really be the consequence of such interference, the petitioners humbly conceive that the house would not for a moment entertain the proposition, that an object so insignificant, even considered as to its utmost possible effect on our foreign trade, should be suffered to stand in competition with the health, morals, and happiness of millions of the people of Great Britain; that the petitioners, however, are enabled, from actual experience, to assert, that even this argument, little formidable as it is in its whole extent, is not founded on fact; that having themselves enjoyed for a considerable period the numberless benefits of a more humane system of management, they consider it a duty which they owe to their fellow men engaged in similar occupations throughout the kingdom, to give their evidence on this occasion; that they do therefore respectfully assure the house, that not only has the change been productive of the most salutary effects on their general condition, and particularly in respect to the health and education of their children, but that, judging from the amount of their present earnings, that diminution of the produce of the manufactory, which has been supposed to be the necessary consequence of abridging the term of daily labour, has not taken place; that the petitioners of course attribute this result of undiminished produce, under the reduced hours of working, to the increased health and spirits with which their exertions are accompanied; that the time of actual working at their establishment is ten hours and a half per day, exclusive of one hour for breakfast, and another for dinner, and no child is admitted to work, until he is ten years of age; that if similar regulations were generally established in our manufactories, and especially if they were followed by an act providing for the better education of the working classes, the petitioners cannot doubt that the annual produce of their industry, instead of being diminished, would very soon be materially increased, since the calculation which proceeds on the principle of prematurely extracting their strength and vigour, a process which the manufacturing system has introduced, is not less fallacious in a mercantile view, than it is singularly opposed to the dictates of humanity and justice; may it therefore please the house to take the subject of the petitioners' prayer into their serious consideration, and to enact such regulations as it may seem best to the wisdom of the house to adopt."

The petition was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

SILK TRADE.] Petitions, against any bill for regulating wages, were presented from silk manufacturers of Manchester, Salford, Leek, and Macclesfield.—Referred to the committee on the petitions of ribbon-weavers.

LEATHER TAX.] Petitions against this tax were presented from Falmouth, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, Drogheda, and the burgh of Dumfries.—Ordered to lie on the table.

LUNATIC ASYLUMS (SCOTLAND) BILL.] A petition of freeholders, justices of the peace, and commissioners of supply, of Stirlingshire, against this bill, was presented, and ordered to lie on the table.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Mr. Protheroe presented 286 petitions of inhabitants of Bristol, in favour of annual parliaments and universal suffrage. The hon. member observed, that though he did not agree with the opinions of the petitioners, yet he owed it to them to say, that they did not appear to be actuated by improper motives.—The petitions were ordered to lie on the table.

Lord Stanley presented nine petitions of inhabitants of Royton, and a petition of inhabitants of Crompton.—Ordered to lie on the table.

Friday, April 3.

WINDOW TAX (IRELAND).] The Marquis of Downshire stated, that he had discovered an inaccuracy in the order made on his motion of the 16th of March. He therefore now moved, that copies of the circular letters from the commissioners of excise to the clergy of the different parishes in Ireland, on the subject of the window-tax, and also a copy of the letter from the first commissioner of excise to the sovereign of Belfast, on the same subject, be laid before the house; and that the former order be discharged.—Ordered.

WATER COMPANIES.] Earl Grosvenor said, he wished to call the attention of their lordships to a subject of great importance. He had learned from some of his tenants in Grosvenor-square, that a coalition had been formed between certain water companies. He should have hoped that those companies would have fulfilled the two great objects of their institution—namely, to supply the metropolis with water of a purer quality, and at a cheaper rate than formerly. He understood, however, from some of his tenants that the charge was not more moderate, and that the supply was very bad. The water at present supplied by the Grand Junction water-works was, he understood, very much discoloured. He had thought it right to mention this subject, as the state of the water supplied by these companies was of great consequence to the health and safety of the metropolis.

The Earl of Lauderdale reminded their lordships, that parliament had at different times passed bills for incorporating different companies to supply the metropolis with water. This had been done on the principle that the competition thus created would procure for the inhabitants a cheaper and better supply; but the contrary had been the fact. Indeed, it now appeared that some of these corporations had formed a coalition for one quarter of the town, and others for another, so that they divided the metropolis between them. Thus, instead of the competition which had been anticipated, a complete monopoly was established. In consequence of this state of things, the supply of water was not only bad, but if a fire took place in a quarter of the metropolis appropriated to one company, the water of another could not be applied to it. This disadvantage would not exist if there was a fair competition; for then the water of each company would be sent to the same parts of the town. As the case now stood, if a fire were to happen in some quarters, great injury might be done before a supply of water could be obtained. He was, however, glad to learn that an hon. friend of his intended to make the supply of the metropolis with water a subject of investigation in another place.

Earl Grosvenor mentioned the case of a lady who, in consequence of an apprehension of fire, applied to one of the water companies for a supply of water, but was informed that none could be given. Had there been any foundation for the alarm, the consequences of the deficiency of supply would have been very serious.

The Lord Chancellor said, that after this conversation, he hoped their lordships would not separate without its being distinctly understood, that, if these companies acted in a way to defeat the object which the legislature had in view at the time of their incorporation, it was in the power of parliament to correct such a proceeding.

The Earl of Shaftesbury said, that every attention had been paid to the bills on this subject which had been already before the house; and that, in the case of any new measure, he would devote all his attention to render it fit to accomplish the object which their lordships always had in view in passing any act for establishing such companies.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, April 3.

LEATHER TAX.] Petitions against this tax were presented from Whitby, Chippenham, and Great Grimsby.—Ordered to lie on the table.

REWARDS ON CONVICTION.] Mr. Bennet brought in a bill "for repealing such parts of several acts as allow pecuniary and other rewards on the conviction of persons for highway robbery and other crimes and offences, and for facilitating the means of prosecuting persons accused of felony and other offences." (See page 636.)—It was read a first time.

WINDOW TAX (IRELAND.).] Mr. May presented a petition from Belfast, praying for the repeal of this tax.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, he had been surprised that it had been stated in some Irish papers, as a communication from authority, that he intended to repeal this tax. He was, indeed, sorry to oppose the wishes of a large portion of the population of Ireland: but he could not concur in the propriety of the repeal, considering the great deficiency of the Irish revenue, and the large amount of the debt of that country upon the consolidation of the two treasuries.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

BUILDING OF CHURCHES BILL.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer brought in a bill "for building, and promoting the building, of additional churches, in populous parishes."—Read a first time.

PRIVATELY STEALING BILL.] This bill was reported, and ordered to be read a third time on Friday next.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Lord A. Hamilton presented a petition of Incorporation of Weavers of Rutherglen, praying for reform.—Ordered to lie on the table.

LUNATIC ASYLUMS (SCOTLAND) BILL.] Lord A. Hamilton presented the following petition of Commissioners of Supply and others, of Renfrew, which was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed. "That the same appears to the petitioners to be unnecessary and certainly uncalled for as a general measure; that it is particularly so with respect to the county of Renfrew, that its objects are ill defined, and that the evils which it is humanely intended to remedy, have been exaggerated in a very great degree; that in as far as the bill empowers certain general commissioners, two of them nominated by his majesty's secretary of state for the home department, to cause district asylums to be erected, and the expense thereof to be levied from the counties of Scotland, it is not only quite novel in principle, but highly exceptionable as a precedent, and for aught that the petitioners can see, the arguments that support the compulsory endowment of lunatic asylums, under the exclusive direction of a board of general commissioners, may be equally applied to the compulsory establishment of district infirmaries, foundling hospitals, or the like, which have hitherto been with great propriety left to the spontaneous operation of public benevolence: that the principles of the bill are insuperably objectionable, inasmuch as they go to alter, and alter for the worse, the law and usage of Scotland, with regard to the maintenance and management of the poor; first, the bill takes away the obligation under which each parish now lies to maintain its own insane paupers, and imposes the burthen upon the county at large in which the parish is situated, an innovation which the petitioners conceive to be no less repugnant to sound principles of economy and justice, than it is to the established law of the land; secondly, it takes away from the landed proprietors of Scotland (so far as the insane poor are concerned), that share of influence and control, which, for salutary ends, the law has assigned to them, in conjunction with the ministers and kirk sessions of parishes, and it commits to the discretion of these ministers and sessions, and to such justices of the peace as they may be pleased to select, with the advice of such medical persons as these justices choose to employ, the power of seizing all insane persons found within their parishes, and transmitting them to the asylum of the district, there to be maintained by county assessments; but it provides no check against the selection of mistaken or improper objects, for which the bill leaves ample scope, and no means by which the counties can obtain relief from the expense, either where these unfortunate persons ought not to be confined at all, or where their parents or others are bound by law to maintain them, and able to do so; thirdly, overlooking or disregarding the important inquiry whether the parishes in which the insane persons shall happen to be found, be the place of their legal settlement, and as such, bound by law to maintain them; it peremptorily enjoins the ministers and their kirk sessions, to take up from time to time every poor lunatic or insane person who shall be found in such parishes, and to proceed with them, as already noticed, at the expense of the county in which they shall be found, the consequence would be, that a lunatic taken up in Renfrewshire, and sent to the district asylum, must be maintained by Renfrewshire, to which he may not belong, without any recourse against the parish or county legally bound to maintain him; nor is this a case likely to be of rare occurrence, especially in the more populous towns of Scotland; fourthly, the mode by which funds are proposed to be raised for defraying the expense of the lunatic asylums, differs from the mode of assessment at present established, by leaving personal means and substance, as well as a considerable portion of heritable property out of view, and the proportional rate proposed to be levied from lands and from houses, being one shilling in the pound Scots, of the valued rent of lands for each penny in the pound sterling of the yearly rents of houses, is so evidently and extravagantly wrong, that the petitioners are led to consider it as an unintentional error; that various other errors are to be found in the details of the bill, which the petitioners forbear to notice, convinced that its leading principles are such as ought to prevent its passing into a law; but they beg leave to press upon the consideration of the house, that the county of Renfrew has, in common with others in the west of Scotland, contributed largely to the erection of the lunatic asylum at Glasgow, an extensive institution, founded and supported by voluntary contribution, and of unrivalled excellence in its system of management; and that the parishes of the county of Renfrew have either acquired, or are in the course of acquiring, the privileges of that asylum for their lunatic poor at a moderate rate; to that county therefore the benefits intended by the bill are in a great measure anticipated, and its evils would be aggravated, by rendering of little avail the advantages which it has already acquired at considerable expense; should it appear, however, to the house, that any legislative measure is necessary respecting the insane poor of Scotland, in addition to the wise provisions of the late statute of the 55th year of his present majesty, cap. 69, intituled, 'An act to regulate madhouses in Scotland,' the petitioners do most respectfully submit, that no solid reason exists, why a district connected with such an asylum as that of Glasgow may not be intrusted with powers to provide for the care of its pauper lunatics in the manner best suited to its own circumstances, without any rash innovation upon the established law, and free from that cumbrous and expensive machinery which the present bill, without precedent and without necessity, proposes to introduce, against the general feeling of the people of Scotland; and, as the petitioners observe that this principle has been recognized with regard to the counties of Perth and Angus, they submit, that what is conceded to those counties ought not to be withheld from the county of Renfrew; and praying, that the house may reject the said bill, or to grant such other relief in the premises as to them shall seem just."

COTTON FACTORIES BILL.] Mr. W. Smith presented the following petition of labourers in the cotton spinning factories of Glossop. "That the petitioners, having long experienced and deplored the evils which result from the excessive hours prevailing in cotton factories, have anxiously watched the progress of those benevolent efforts which have been making for the alleviation of their present sufferings; that the petitioners feel confident that they shall sufficiently establish the reasonableness of their complaint, and forcibly engage the favourable protection of the legislature, when they assure the house that they are in the constant habit of being confined within the close and ill-ventilated rooms of a factory for the space of fourteen or fifteen hours per day, without being allowed those necessary intervals of relaxation during the time of taking their meals which their health and strength require, and which are the more essentially necessary in consequence of the heat of the rooms in which they are accustomed to work; that, in addition to the injury the petitioners thus experience in their own persons, in the decay of their health and the decrepitude of their bodies, they cannot but lament the still more unfortunate condition of those young children, children of the most tender age, who not only participate with them in these protracted labours, but are often detained in the mills during the usual dinner-hour to assist in cleaning the machinery, and, being far less able to endure the fatigue of such unintermitting toil, become the early victims of disease and death; that the petitioners are nominally free labourers, yet they have a livelihood to obtain, they have families to support, and having generally been accustomed from their childhood to the employment of cotton spinning, they cannot, without the most serious risk, betake themselves to any other occupation, and therefore they must either comply with the general rules adopted in the factory to which they belong, or seek employment in some other; but, since factories are in general conducted according to the same system, the choice becomes nugatory, and virtually resolves itself into compulsion; that the petitioners are ready to believe many of their employers would cheerfully and spontaneously adopt the regulations which the petitioners so earnestly desire, were they not apprehensive that such an indulgence of their better feelings might prove injurious to their interest, unless others, who are their competitors in trade, were equally subjected to the same restrictions; that, under these circumstances, the petitioners beg leave to express their full conviction, that the powerful interposition of the legislature in their behalf will at once enable the master to adopt the suggestions of his humanity without injury to his fortune, and the labourer to exert his industry without the sacrifice of his health; they therefore commit their cause to the wisdom and protection of the house, and humbly pray, that a law may be passed restricting the hours of actual labour to ten and a half, and that such other provisions may be enacted for relieving the petitioners, and the children engaged in cotton mills, as the house shall deem best adapted to the occasion."—Ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

Mr. Wilberforce presented two petitions of a similar character from Renfrew and Blackburn.—Ordered to lie on the table.

SLAVE TRADE BILL.] On the motion of Mr. Holmes, the house went into a committee on the Slave Trade Acts, when he observed, that doubts had arisen whether the acts allowing the transfer of slaves from one of our colonies to another, extended to Demerara and Berbice; and, with a view to remove those doubts, he proposed, that the chairman be instructed to move, "that leave be given to bring in a bill to explain three acts passed in the 46th, 47th, and 51st years of his majesty's reign respectively, for the abolition of the slave trade."

Mr. Wilberforce said, he should not oppose the motion, but he was persuaded that when the object of the bill came to be considered, it would be found to menace the worst effects to the interests of this country, as well as to those of the colonies. Yet, he would not oppose the introduction of the bill, as he wished to have the subject fully discussed.

Mr. Marryat deprecated the object of the bill, being convinced, that if the transportation to Demerara and Berbice were tolerated, the slaves would be seduced, and clandestinely taken to distant and unhealthy regions, and particularly to Surinam, where, from the fertility of the soil, great temptation was held out to capitalists. Leave was given to bring in the bill, and it was brought in accordingly, and read a first time.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, April 6.

LIBEL LAW.] Lord Erskine said, he had last session moved for returns of the names of persons arrested and held to bail for libel, before trial; some of those returns had been made, but the whole had not yet been presented. It was his intention to follow up those returns by a motion or bill, if no proposition on the subject should be brought forward by a noble earl (Grey) who had already called the attention of their lordships to the subject. With regard to the object for which the returns were moved, he believed that it was now to be understood that arrest before trial for libel was the practice of some inferior magistrates. The law, however, ought not to be allowed to remain in a state of uncertainty on that point. It was not his wish to encourage any licentiousness of the press, but it appeared to him necessary to remove all doubt on this question. He should not, however, trouble their lordships with any proposition on the subject, until the noble earl to whom he had alluded came to town.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, April 6.

LUNATIC ASYLUMS (SCOTLAND) BILL.] A petition of freeholders and others, of Wigtown, against this bill, was presented, and laid on the table.

COTTON FACTORIES BILL.] Petitions were presented from the following places, against this bill. Blackburn, Rossendale, Preston, Glasgow, Holywell, Stockport, Derby, Keighley (York).—Ordered to lie on the table.

Petitions were presented from the following places, in favour of the bill. Hebden Bridge, Halifax, Royton, Ashton-under-Lyne, Manchester, Salford.—Ordered to lie on the table.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Sir F. Burdett presented six petitions from Halifax; two from St. Marylebone; one from St. Anne, Westminster; sixteen from Kilbarchan; nineteen from Bath; five from Ipswich; two from Bramford; one from Preston; one from Otley; one from James Wroe.—Ordered to lie on the table.

COPYRIGHT BILL.] Mr. J. Smith presented a petition of Thomas Norton Longman, Thomas Hurst, Owen Rees, Cosmo Orme, and Thomas Brown, of Paternoster-row, booksellers and copartners; setting forth, "that the petitioners are publishers of books and purchasers of copyright, and since the passing of the act of parliament in the month of July 1814, which enjoined the delivery of eleven copies of all books published after that time to the eleven libraries named therein, the petitioners have delivered to the said eleven libraries, on their demand, in pursuance of the said act, books which have actually cost to the petitioners the sum of 3000*l.* or nearly so, and of part of which books very limited impressions were printed, in some cases only one hundred, in others only two hundred and fifty, the copyright whereof was of no advantage to the petitioners; in this statement they do not include books, the publication whereof is managed by other booksellers, and in which they have considerable shares; from the great burthen of the delivery, the petitioners have declined the publication of some expensive works, and especially a work of the Nondescript Plants, collected by the celebrated Baron Humbolt, during his travels in South America, and which they declined solely from the necessity they should have been under of delivering the said eleven copies without any remuneration; the petitioners feel this delivery to be the greater grievance, because they, like the other publishers of works, have to give many presentation copies to the friends of authors who may have assisted them with the loan of books and use of manuscripts, or by communicating important information or assistance: they are also, by the clause of a previous act made with reference to libels, compelled to deposit one copy with the printer of the work; the delivery of these eleven copies becomes now a serious object of every publisher's calculation, and will prevent the appearance of many valuable works; when the act that imposed the delivery passed, the petitioners were informed and fully expected that the said libraries would only demand the copies of such works as would be actually useful to them, and that it would not be harshly acted upon; but they have found to their surprise and most serious injury, that all the said libraries, with the exception of two only as to novels and music, have made a sweeping demand of all books published, whether reprints only, or original works, and whether written for children or females, and without any consideration whether the same work was in their library or not; the petitioners particularly instance here the new edition of Doctor Johnson's Dictionary, with the additions and improvements of the reverend Henry John Todd, which is published in eleven parts, at the price of eleven guineas; although Mr. Todd, with a feeling which the petitioners' could only applaud, presented a copy of the work himself to Sion College library, yet the managers of the said library, after receiving this copy, demanded, and notwithstanding the petitioners' remonstrances, insisted on having another copy of the said work delivered to them in pursuance of the said act; thus compelling from the petitioners a second copy of the said work, though the full purpose of the said act had been in truth previously fulfilled by the said voluntary gift of its reverend editor; the petitioners, by the permission of the house, state that the present duty on the paper generally used in printing amounts nearly to twenty-five per cent. which the petitioners pay on all the works they publish, and which makes it a great object of our national finances, that the publisher of books should not be by any cause discouraged; but the English universities who print books have not only the superior advantage of a perpetual copyright, but have also a remission of the said duty on paper for all the books they print; this exemption from duty enables them to undersell all the regular booksellers in the public market in the books they print, which others also have the power to publish; the petitioners have lately, in conjunction with others of the trade, printed an edition of Scapula's Lexicon at a great expense, which had not been printed before in this country for one hundred and fifty years; they are now informed that one of the English universities is preparing to oppose them by publishing also an edition of the same book, which the said university, by its exemption from the duty on paper, will be enabled to sell much cheaper than the petitioners can afford; eleven copies of the petitioner's edition of this book have also been demanded and delivered; the petitioners believe that the continuance of the said delivery, unmitigated, will occasion a gradual diminution in the publication of many valuable and important publications, and daily produce a heavy grievance to individual publishers; they therefore most respectfully pray the house to take these facts into consideration, and to relieve the petitioners and publishers in general from the burthen of delivering the said eleven copies without any remuneration, and they humbly submit to the wisdom of the house, that to require the said libraries to pay one third of the published price of the books they demand will be a great relief to the petitioners and to literature in general, and will amount to no larger sum than the said libraries may easily raise by a small contribution among their respective members."—Ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Hammersley presented a petition of George Lackington, Richard Hughes, Joseph Harding, George Fordyce Mavor, and Thomas Jones, all of Finsbury-place, in the county of Middlesex, booksellers and publishers, copartners; setting forth, "that, prior to the passing of the act of 54th George the Third, concerning the entry of books at Stationers' Hall, and the delivery of 11 copies therein mentioned, the petitioners, not anticipating or providing against such delivery, had projected several costly and valuable publications, among others, a work intituled Monasticon Anglicanum, originally written by sir William Dugdale, knight, with very great additions by the rev. Bulkeley Bandinell, M.A. F.S.A.; the History of the Cathedral Church of Saint Paul, by the same author, with additions by Henry Ellis, F.S.A.; Portraits of illustrious persons of Great Britain, with Biographical Memoirs by E. Lodge, esq. F.S.A.; the History of the County Palatine and City of Chester, by George Ormerod, esq. F.S.A.; and the Athenæ Oxonienses, by Anthony Wood, enlarged by the reverend Philip Bliss; that portions of the said several works, all of which had been announced to be published periodically, were either actually published and sold at the time the said act was passed, or were announced to be in the press and nearly ready for publication; that, in consequence of one of the provisions of the said act having enjoined the delivery, upon demand, of eleven copies for the libraries therein mentioned, one of the copies to be upon the most costly paper, the said public libraries have demanded and received portions of each of the said works, which portions are in effect equivalent in the loss to the petitioners of their being required to deliver as well the parts published before the said act, as those that have appeared since the passing the said act, because the delivery of these subsequent parts has caused copies of each of the said works to be rendered incomplete, which otherwise the petitioners would have had entire; that the petitioners consider their grievance on this subject to amount to a total loss of the value of the said eleven sets, from the high request in which the said works are held by the public, and from the continued demand that still prevails for them, which demand, from the limitation of the numbers printed, the petitioners, after the subtracting of these eleven copies, are not able to supply; that the petitioners sought no protection as to their copyright in the said works from the said act, because the magnitude and expense of the undertakings were a sufficient guarantee against any danger to be apprehended from others pirating them; that the value of the said eleven copies of the said works, and therefore the loss thereon to the petitioners, is as follows, viz. eleven copies of sir William Dugdale's Monasticon and History of Saint Paul's 1008*l.* eleven copies of Portraits of illustrious Personages of Great Britain, with Biographical Memoirs by E. Lodge, esq. 630*l.* eleven copies of the History of the County Palatine and City of Chester, by George Ormerod, esq. 283*l.* 10*s.* eleven copies of Wood's Athenæ Oxonienses, by the rev. Philip Bliss, 277*l.* 4*s.* making, 2,198*l.* 14*s.*; that the petitioners could state other severe and injurious effects arising to them from the said delivery in its operation upon them in the ordinary routine of their business as publishers, in addition to the few detached instances above selected, but they forbear to occupy the time of the house, because it will be obvious that the said selected instances are but specimens of the hardships which they and other publishers have to endure therefrom, and from which they hope for relief from the wisdom of the house; and praying, that the house will be pleased to take their case into consideration, and grant relief by such an equitable modification of the grievance of delivering the said eleven copies as to them shall seem meet, and especially by causing the said libraries to pay some due portion of the price of the books which they shall demand."

Ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Smyth presented a petition of the chancellor, masters, and scholars, of the university of Cambridge; setting forth, "That the petitioners have seen with much surprise a bill brought into the house, to amend an act passed in the 54th year of the reign of his present Majesty, intituled, 'An act to amend the several acts for the encouragement of learning, by securing the copies and copyrights of all printed books to the authors of such books, or their agents,' by which act eleven copies of every printed book are secured to certain public libraries therein mentioned, of which the library of the university of Cambridge is one; the petitioners beg leave to state, that previously to the statute of the 8th of Queen Anne the English universities enjoyed by grants from the crown (which grants had been recognized by acts of parliament, and by the courts at Westminster) the privilege of printing all and all manner of books; that the 8th of Queen Anne, which secured to the author of any book the sole right of printing such book for fourteen or twenty-eight years, also gave to the said universities one copy of every printed book, as a reasonable, though a very inadequate compensation for the privilege which they before enjoyed, of printing all and all manner of books; that a committee of the house was appointed to examine the several acts passed in the 8th year of Queen Anne, and in the 15th and 41st years of his present Majesty, for the encouragement of learning, by vesting the copies of printed books in the authors or purchasers of such copies, and for other purposes therein mentioned, and to report whether any or what alterations were requisite to be made therein, together with their observations thereon, to the house; that the said committee having maturely considered the said acts, and having received various statements, and examined several persons connected with the printing and publishing, and with the sale of books, and after much attention bestowed upon the subject, did, among other things, report that 'they conceive that the substance of those laws was proper to be retained, and in particular that continuing the delivery of all new works, and, in certain cases, of subsequent editions, to the libraries now entitled to receive them, will tend to the advancement of learning, and to the diffusion of knowledge, without imposing any considerable burthen upon the authors, printers, and publishers of such works;' the petitioners beg leave further to state, in concurrence with the report of the committee of the house, that the burthen imposed upon authors by the operation of the 8th of Queen Anne above-mentioned, and by the 54th of his present Majesty, is trifling, compared with the benefits conferred upon them by those statutes (more particularly by the last-mentioned statute, by which the term of copyright is extended to twenty-eight years certain,) for if all the copies of any edition shall be sold, except those secured to the libraries above mentioned, the author will receive an adequate remuneration for his labour; and if they shall not have been sold, the donation will then have cost him nothing, and that a very inconsiderable addition to the price of any book, in consideration of the eleven copies to be presented as aforesaid, will entirely secure the author from all loss; and praying, that the said bill may not pass into a law, and that they may be heard before the house, either by themselves or counsel."

Ordered to lie on the table.

LEATHER TAX REPEAL BILL.] Petitions against the leather tax were presented from the tanners, curriers, dealers in leather, and others, of Windsor; also, of Preston; also of Wallingford; also, of Wantage; also, of King's Lynn; also, of Birmingham; also, of Newport, and other towns in Monmouth; also, of Macclesfield; also, of Anglesea; also, of Taunton; also, of Sheffield; also, of Malmesbury; also, of the county of Fife; also, of Doncaster; also, of York; also, of Norfolk; also, of Derby.—Ordered to lie on the table.

Lord Althorp then moved "that the bill be now read a second time."

Mr. C. Grant, jun. rose to move an amendment. He said, he hoped he should be understood to be influenced in the remarks which he felt it his duty to submit to the house, by no other motive than his conviction of what was required by the general interests of the country. At the same time, with every feeling of respect for those individuals who had petitioned parliament for a repeal of this tax, he must say, that they came forward under very singular circumstances. For, what was the peculiar situation in which the leather trade was placed during the last century? Taxation on every other trade had been greatly increased during that period. The wealth and power of the country had greatly increased. Yet, since the reign of queen Anne, when the single duty on leather was imposed, no additional duty had been laid on that article, until the bill of 1812. All the trades, and all the staple manufactures of the country, and even many of the necessaries of life, had been taxed to a great amount, while this article of leather had enjoyed the sole exemption from contributing to bear the common burthens of the state. And yet, if the house considered the subject, it would be difficult to discover on what possible ground this trade should have been so distinguished. The tax, however, having been doubled in 1812, the petitioners asked the house to place the trade in the situation in which it was 100 years ago! At the very first view of the subject, the injustice of such a request, with reference to the other branches of our national industry, was evident. If, indeed, it could be proved, that the trade had suffered injury from the tax of 1812—if it could be proved, that the revenue had diminished in consequence of the imposition of that tax—if it could be proved, that the trade in leather had not the power (as was the case in all other trades) of throwing the burthen of the tax on the consumer—if it could be proved, that any depression which the leather trade had suffered, was not entirely attributable to other and general causes—then a primâ facie case would be made out for considering the expediency of repealing the tax. But if the reverse of all this were true; if it could be proved, that the revenue (to which the advocates for the repeal had themselves appealed as the test of the measure,) actually rose when the tax was first imposed, and continued to rise for three years—if it could be proved that the trader in leather had the power (like other traders) of throwing the burthen of the tax on the consumer—if it could be proved that any depression which the trade had suffered, evidently proceeded from general and notorious causes, wholly unconnected with the tax—and if, in addition to all this, it could be proved, that the leather trade was recovering from the effects of that depression so occasioned, it would be fair to presume that the supporters of the bill had no just grounds on which they could require its adoption by that house.—He would now beg leave to call the attention of the house to some of the papers, with reference to this subject, which had been laid on the table. By those papers it appeared, that the produce of the tax on leather for the year ending the 5th of July, 1812, was 363,891*l.*; the produce for the year ending the 5th of July, 1813 (after the imposition of the additional duty, which it was the object of the bill to repeal) was, 654,356*l.*; the produce for the year ending the 5th of July, 1814, was 667,211*l.*; and the produce for the year ending the 5th of July, 1815, was 677,096*l.* So far, there was pretty strong evidence that the tax had not injured the revenue, which, on the contrary, had been doubled by its operation. Was it, then, to be argued, that it was not in the power of the trader in leather to throw the burthen of the tax on the consumer? The price of the article had been raised more than in proportion to the increase of the duty. In 1812, it was nineteen pence a pound; two years afterwards it was twenty-four and twenty-six pence a pound, and this advance, of course, was made not only on the home consumption but also on the exports.—Then came another part of the question. A depression of the leather trade certainly took place in 1815. For the year ending the 5th of July 1815, he had already stated that the revenue derived from the duty on leather was 677,096*l.*; for the year ending the 5th of July 1816, it was only 599,958*l.*; and for the year ending the 5th of July 1817, it was 595,722*l.* But he would put it to any man who recollected the general state of the country at that period, whether, if he had not seen the returns in which this diminution of the revenue appeared, he would not have said à priori, that such a diminution must have existed. The general and notorious commercial depression which existed at that time, and which bent down every trade in the country, of course operated on the leather trade among the rest. Would any man say, that if the duty on leather had not been imposed, that trade would have flourished alone in the midst of the general suffering? Such an assertion would be preposterous and untenable. Those persons argued on a totally mistaken principle, who imagined that any diminution of taxation at that period would have relieved the country from any of those circumstances operating injuriously on our general trade, which were so notorious, that it was unnecessary for him to repeat them. Why should the depression of the leather trade be ascribed to the tax, when there were other causes of more powerful operation to which it might, with greater justice, be attributed—the general cessation of demand, and the particular cessation of demand from government, in consequence of the termination of the war—a most important cause of the effect which had taken place? And, beside the causes to which he had adverted, there was another cause for the diminution of the revenue proceeding from the duty on leather, arising out of the provisions of the act of 1812. Prior to that act, tanners were not allowed to perform any operation on hides while they were in progress of tanning. There were superfluous portions of the hides which they were not permitted to remove, and the consequence was, that they were compelled to pay the duties on those superfluous portions. The hardship of this restriction having been represented, it was removed by the act of 1812. In consequence, the tanner performed a part of the office of the currier. He removed those superfluous portions of the hides, of course he paid no duty on them, and the natural consequence was, the reduction of the revenue to a certain extent. This practice had become very general. It was calculated by some, that it diminished the weight of the hides by one half; but if it diminished it by one third, or even by one sixth, it still had a very operative effect on the produce of the duty. Another cause of the depression of the trade was, the substitution in many cases of iron for leather. It could in no way be proved that the depression had been occasioned by the tax. He would go farther, and prove that the trade was actually reviving. The augmentation of the revenue, arising from the leather duties for the last quarter, was 17,000*l.* If the house examined the returns of the revenue from January to January of each year, instead of from July to July, they would find a strong confirmation of what he had asserted. [The hon. gentleman here read the returns of each year from January to January: that for the year ending the 5th of January, 1817, was 596,000*l.*; that for the year ending the 5th of January, 1818, was 595,000*l.* collected, and 611,000*l.* charged, and in progress of collection, all of which would certainly be collected.] The house had been told that evidence of the fact, that the leather trade was not flourishing, was to be found in the increase of bankruptcies, and the diminution of the number of licences. With respect to the first of those alleged proofs, he put it to the house, whether it was not notorious that the general trade of the country, at the close of the war, was not speculative rather than solid? What was there in the tanning trade to exempt it from the general malady of the time—the love of over-trading? It was notorious that the tanners, like other traders, enlarged their speculations; that, like other traders, they proceeded too rashly; and was it surprising that, like other traders, they should suffer in consequence? As to the reduction in the number of licences, that reduction had commenced when the trade was very flourishing, and the revenue derived from it at its height; and it arose from the circumstance of larger capitals being employed by some of the traders, by which the smaller capitalists were overwhelmed. One strong proof that the trade was not in the distressed state which had been represented, was to be found in the fact, that during the last ten years, the total amount of the failures in paying the duties levied upon it, did not exceed 2,000*l.* He repeated, that the diminution of licences had arisen from circumstances wholly unconnected with the tax. A similar diminution, and proceeding from similar causes, had taken place in the licences for carrying on the malt trade.—But it had been said, that the tax pressed heavily on agriculture and the necessaries of life. He, for one, was always solicitous to lean as lightly on agriculture as possible. But it was well known, that since the imposition of the tax on leather, agriculture had been relieved from several very heavy burthens. As to the necessaries of life, he knew that it was popular to inveigh against any measure by which they were immediately affected; but the arguments used in support of this declamation were generally more specious than solid. They were something like those which went to throw the whole weight of taxation on the rich, as if the poor would not be as much affected by such a proceeding as if they originally participated in the burthen. He was not prepared to contend that it was wholly immaterial whence the resources of the state were derived; but if it was found inevitable to lay taxes on all the other necessaries of life, he felt justified in requiring to know on what ground exemption was claimed for this? It was a question peculiarly interesting as connected with that of our finances. On all hands it was allowed, that it was the duty of parliament to maintain public credit by supporting the revenue, and yet here was a proposition for reducing the revenue, by those who had so recently maintained that the revenue was inadequate to the demands upon it. The welfare of the country depended on the maintenance of the public faith. If, one by one, the securities of the public creditor were to be withdrawn, there would soon be an end put, in peace, to that high character which England had supported during all the dangers and difficulties of the most arduous war. On all these grounds he should move as an amendment, "That the bill be read a second time on this day six months."

Lord Althorp perfectly agreed with the hon. gentleman, that the prosperity of the country depended on supporting the revenue; but he thought it a very material duty for that house to support the manufactures from which that revenue was derived. (Hear, hear.) He had not heard any thing to convince him of the policy of continuing this tax; but, on the other hand, he was fully persuaded that it was very injurious to the manufacturers, and to the consumers. He contended, that the diminution in the number of hides purchased, was a convincing proof of the depression of the trade. Hundreds of the tan-yards occupied when the tax took place, were now unemployed: in one county (Hampshire) there were twenty-one not worked out of forty-two that were in full work when the tax was imposed. Since the imposition of the tax, there had been thrown out of the trade 189 tanners, 338 tawers, 41 oil-dressers, and 12 parchment-makers. In fact, the trade had gradually declined ever since the additional tax was imposed. The trade employed 500,000 persons, and it had been calculated that more than one-seventh of that number, or upwards of 71,428 persons were deprived of employment, of whom many thousands were thrown upon their parishes. The noble lord observed, that this tax bore much harder upon the labouring classes of society than upon the higher classes; inasmuch as leather paid the tax by weight, and the shoes of labourers weighed three times as heavy as those of the higher classes. A review of all these facts must satisfy the house, that the repeal of the additional duty on leather was indispensably necessary. He would merely add, that, in France, in the year 1759, the tax was increased, and the trade fell off; but, at the revolution, the tax was repealed, and a considerable improvement immediately took place.

Lord Deerhurst said, he would not trespass above a moment on the attention of the house, in treading afresh the track so beaten already, by a recapitulation of the arguments which had been, he hoped, successfully used by the noble lord who had originally moved the question, and by other hon. members who intended to vote as he did, for the repeal of the additional duties. It was not his inclination to oppose, upon trifling grounds, the taxation considered necessary by his majesty's ministers; but, representing, as he did, a great commercial city, deeply interested in the present debate, he could not give a vote without stating, that the repeal of the additional duties on leather was of great importance to many highly respectable persons connected with that trade in Worcester, who prayed to be relieved from the burden of them, that they might, at least upon equal terms, meet the foreign manufacturer in the market, which at present they were unable to do. He should therefore vote for the repeal of the bill.

Mr. Hart Davis, amidst loud calls of question! said, he rose merely to explain the vote which he should give that evening against the bill, having formerly voted for the repeal of this tax. (Hear, hear.) He had availed himself of the opportunity afforded by the recess, to inquire into the state of the leather tax, and the result of his inquiries among the most intelligent men was, that the repeal now called for was unnecessary. He held in his hand a letter from a very eminent tanner at Bristol, a person who perfectly understood his own interest. (A laugh.)—This letter stated, that the leather manufacturers of Bristol had not petitioned against the tax, from a conviction that it was not injurious either to the manufacturer or the consumer, and also because there was at present a visible alteration and improvement in their business: it farther stated, that the reduced amount of the duty paid by tanners for the last year or two, was not occasioned by a falling off in the trade, but by the large manufactured stock on hand: that a great quantity of hides had been imported from South America, soon after the tax was imposed; and that the manufacture of this large stock had increased the amount of duty considerably, but left such a quantity of leather upon hand as was sufficient, in a great measure, for the supply of two or three succeeding years. The letter went on to state, that the diminution was also in part to be attributed to the peace. At present, though the number of tanners had decreased, the trade was in an improving state. The decrease in the number of tanners was to be accounted for from the trade getting into the hands of greater capitalists. In consequence of the opening of new roads, the communication from the places where bark was obtained, and the large towns, was greatly facilitated, and the trade had in consequence been getting more and more into large towns, and into the hands of great capitalists.—The hon. member said, that, having received better information, he did not think that the present state of our finances would warrant the repeal of this tax. He was satisfied, that if it were repealed, ministers could not do without some other tax to an equal amount.

Mr. Methuen said, he had never known so strong a feeling in the country against any tax as there was against that which it was now proposed to repeal. He believed, that were they to search all England over, they would not be able to find one tanner in favour of the tax, except the tanner who had corresponded with the hon. gentleman who had just sat down.

Lord Compton said, that the argument of an hon. gentleman, that no additional tax had been imposed on leather from the reign of Queen Anne to the year 1812, was an argument in favour of the repeal: for he could not suppose that all the Chancellors of the Exchequer from the reign of Queen Anne to the present time would have uniformly passed over this tax, if they had not been convinced, that the trade could not bear any additional burthen.

Mr. Marryat begged to explain his vote, which, instead of being opposed to the one he had formerly given, like that of the hon. member for Bristol, would be in perfect consistency with it. Hundreds of petitions had been presented against this tax, and in his mind, they should outweigh the opinion of any private individual whom the hon. member had consulted. It would have been as well, too, if the hon. gentleman near him (Mr. Grant), instead of dealing in general principles, had confined himself to particular facts. He would have then found, that the export of the unmanufactured article had doubled since the additional duty, while that of the manufactured had decreased to less than one-half of what it had previously been. For the five years prior to 1812, the amount of unmanufactured export was 5,603,395 lbs.; for the five years since it was 10,710,073 lbs. During the same periods, the export of the manufactured article was, before 1812, 2,449,720 lbs.; since, it was less than one half of that amount: namely, 1,142,111 lbs.; so that the operation of the act was to double the export of the raw material, and to reduce, in the proportion of one half, that of the manufactured article. The foreign manufacturer was, therefore, thrown into other countries. Of course, a great home consumption must necessarily continue. But how was it carried on? Was it not obvious that the sum thus raised was drawn from one pocket into another? The poor, therefore, paid their part of it; and the rich were obliged, in the shape of poor rates, to supply the means thus withdrawn from the lower classes, by an impolitic tax of this kind. The wealth of the manufacturer was the great source of the revenue, and by his industry and activity, taxation was largely supplied for the interests of the state. This tax vitally affected the reproductive power of the manufacturing interest, and it only wanted three or four such injudicious imposts to cut up by the roots the resources of the state. He should, therefore, vote for the repeal.

Mr. Benson said, that the hon. member for Bristol had urged as a reason for the new view which he took of the present question, a letter which he had received from a person extensively engaged in the tanning trade. The hon. gentleman had said, that the writer of that letter had a perfect knowledge of his own interest; and he thought he might say, that the hon. gentleman, in voting for the repeal of this tax, and then so suddenly voting against it, had also a perfect knowledge of his own interest. (Cries of order.) From the inquires which he had made into this business during the recess, his former opinion was confirmed. Had he entertained any doubt respecting it, he should have drawn the conclusion that its repeal was necessary, from the evidence of the gentlemen brought forward by government in its favour.

Mr. Hart Davis begged to ask the hon. gentleman, upon what grounds he had presumed to impute to him, the being actuated by improper motives in any vote which he should now give, or which he had ever given in that house.

Mr. Speaker observed, that the language of the hon. gentleman fairly bore the interpretation which had been put upon it. It was a language which, by the rules of the house, the hon. gentleman was not warranted in holding. The words made use of by the hon. gentleman certainly conveyed a personal reflection against the hon. member for Bristol; and he should be wanting in his duty if he did not now declare his opinion on the subject.

Mr. Benson said, that if by the language he had used, he had given any offence, it was very much regretted by him. Nothing could be farther from his intention than to convey any personal reflection against the hon. gentleman. All that he had meant to say, with respect to the conduct pursued by the hon. gentleman, was, that as when he gave his former vote, it was supposed we were on the eve of an election, that circumstance had had its influence. He did not mean any thing personal to the hon. gentleman; but that, with the view of standing well in the opinion of his constituents, he had made use of a little manœuvre which all of them understood very well.

Mr. Lushington said, that the result of the inquiries which he had made, was very different from that which some hon. gentlemen opposite had stated. The sense of all the tanners whom he had consulted upon the subject was in favour of the tax. On an average of five years before the imposition of the tax, the drawback on the exportation of leather amounted to 52,000*l.*; but if the consumption of leather since that period was less, and the exportation something more, was it fair to say that the tax was the cause of it? The consumption of leather, like that of every other article, had decreased from what it was in time of war; the diminution in the consumption of that article ought not, therefore, to be charged as a consequence of the tax. It was generally known, that the leather tax was in a flourishing state at present. The tax was a productive one, and, therefore, ought not to be repealed upon unsupported statements. He was aware that it was the interest of the leather manufacturers to have the tax repealed, and he was not surprised that they should so earnestly persevere in petitioning for that purpose, as it would in fact be taking 160,000*l.* from the public, and putting it into their own pockets. But could that be advanced as a parliamentary reason for the measure? It would be idle to suppose that the present tax could be repealed without imposing some other to replace it.—(No, no! from the opposition.) He contended, that if the tax were repealed, some other tax must be laid upon the public to replace it, and which would perhaps be more severely felt than the present. The noble lord who introduced the question had used many observations in support of it, but none of them seemed to answer his purpose: at length he said, that the number of persons employed in the leather trade had considerably decreased since the imposition of the leather tax, which, according to the noble lord's statement, was a strong argument in favour of its being repealed. But, allowing the number of manufacturers to have decreased, it was by no means calculated to support the proposed measure, if he could shew to the house, that though the manufacturing of leather was placed in the hands of a smaller number of capitalists, yet the whole amount of the manufactured article had increased, and was still increasing. If this were found to be the case, it would turn out that the public, instead of being injured, would be benefited by the alteration; as the business, being carried on upon a large scale, and by persons of large capital, leather would be brought to a state of perfection, and, at the same time, sold at a price at which smaller manufacturers could not afford to sell it. To prove that the whole amount of the manufactured article had increased, he would instance the case of Messrs. Brewil and Co. whose business had increased five or six fold within the last few years. If the noble lord on the other side of the house doubted that statement, he would read the account. (Here the hon. member read the account, which stated, that, in 1809, the taxes paid by Messrs. Brewil and Co. amounted to 1973*l.*, in 1817, they amounted to 5937*l.*, and in 1818 to 6716*l.*) Thus, though there was a decrease in the number of manufacturers, the business of the smaller number was equal, if not greater, than the whole was, when there were more persons carrying on that business. The noble lord was also aware that leather had lately risen from 15 to 20 per cent. which shewed that the trade was increasing. Besides, the tax did not fall on the tanner, but on the public. An excise officer marked the quantity of the manufactured article, after which the manufacturer was not called on for the tax until the leather was disposed of, so that, in fact, it was no real inconvenience to the manufacturer. His hon. friend (Mr. Grant) had gone so fully into the question, that he felt it unnecessary to take up the time of the house. He should therefore, merely add, that the drawbacks which had been granted, had given so much satisfaction, especially to curriers and shoemakers, that they had declared it to be their desire that the leather laws should undergo no alteration, and that the pretences under which a repeal of the additional duty was sought to be obtained were scandalously false.

Mr. Brougham said, there were two or three observations of the hon. secretary to the treasury which he could not suffer to pass unnoticed. He had argued, that if this tax were repealed, another tax to an equal amount must be imposed. This he denied. It was proper to repeal this tax, but it was not necessary to impose another instead of it. How had they proceeded on an occasion precisely similar? The house had been pleased two years ago to repeal a much larger though not a more oppressive tax. Till that tax was repealed, ministers found it impossible to reduce any of their estimates; but, immediately after the repeal, they took back all the estimates, and made considerable reductions in many of them. Why might they not now imitate that conduct? Why might they not now take a leaf out of their own book? Instead of keeping an additional tax, let them go to the establishments, and take them down 180,000*l.*, as his noble friend (Lord Althorp) had proposed, by a reduction of 5000 men in the army. He was astonished that the hon. secretary should cite the trade of Messrs. Brewil to prove the innoxious nature of th s tax, when the tanners of the country, one and all, with the exception of the correspondent of the member for Bristol, had declared, that if the tax were not repealed, their trade would be ruined. He was not a little astonished that this letter should have been given by the hon. gentleman as a reason for his change of opinion. He did not wish to impute improper motives to the hon. gentleman—to impute such motives to any hon. member was certainly unparliamentary. But, he confessed, at the same time, that it did surprise him that this letter should be given as a reason for a change of opinion. (No, no! from Mr. Hart Davies.) What! did not the hon. gentleman give the letter of the tanner of Bristol as a reason for his change of opinion? (No, no! from Mr. Hart Davies.) Then, if he did not give that letter as a reason, he had given no reason at all for his change of opinion since his vote of the former night. He had used no argument—except the tanner's letter. But, besides the tanners, was there not another class interested, namely, the consumers? "Don't listen to the tanners," said the secretary to the treasury, "the tax does not fall on the trade, but on the consumer—the tanner has no occasion to complain; he can shift the tax from his shoulders to those of the consumer." But, might it not happen that both consumers and tanners had ground to complain? The consumers might complain, that their ability to consume was diminished—because, by diminishing their ability to consume, the tax abridged their comforts. From the consumers being less able to buy from the tanners, the tanners might also have reason to complain—the consumers were suffering from the diminution of their consumption, and the tanners from the diminution of their manufacture. But his great objection against the tax was, that it fell unequally—that it pressed most severely on those who were least able to bear it. Every tax on the necessaries of life had a direct tendency to increase the price of labour; and the effect of any tax like this, on a necessary of life, was immediately felt in the increased price of labour of all those who used it. While they were raising, therefore, this paltry sum of 180,000*l.* with one hand, they were obliged to put their other hand into their pocket to pay it. But, besides, all the objections applied to it which applied to a poll tax—a poll tax, indeed, it was, except that it was laid on the feet instead of the head. (A laugh.) Every person paid so much, let his occupation be what it might. The peasants, who wore the heaviest shoes, were the most heavily taxed by it. As the tax was laid on the weight, they paid twice as much as those who now heard him, who wore lighter shoes; coarse leather paying as much as fine. All the objections against a poll tax, therefore, applied to it. It was a poll tax of the worst kind, being most burthensome to those who were least able to bear it. These were the grounds on which he had been an humble opponent of the measure in 1812; and those were the reasons on which he should support the present bill.

Mr. Huskinson said, he supposed that the hon. and learned gentleman, when he alluded to the tax repealed two years ago, alluded to the property tax. But there was a great difference between a tax whose duration was limited to the war, and a tax which formed part of the annual revenue, and was carried to the consolidated fund for paying the interest of the national debt. It must be obvious, then, that even if a reduction to the amount of 5000 men were to be made in the army, this tax could not be repealed, as it was a tax pledged to the public creditor for payment of interest on loans contracted on the faith of parliament. The whole amount of the permanent taxes carried to the consolidated fund were not equal to the charge upon it; and therefore every body must see, that the tax could not be repealed without substituting another for it. If there had been an excess of the consolidated fund above the charge, it might have been another matter; but, there being no such excess, they were bound in justice to the public creditor, to see that, if they repealed this tax, they carried to the consolidated fund an equal amount of revenue. The hon. and learned gentleman was for having all taxes on necessaries of life done away with.

The taxes on beer and malt were on necessaries of life—the whole of a large revenue of twenty millions might be said, therefore, to be raised on the necessaries of life. Was the hon. and learned gentleman, in pursuance of his fanciful theory, anxious that the whole of this large revenue should be done away? It had been said, that if the excise regulations, by which the trade was impeded, were repealed, the process of manufacturing might be improved, as it formerly was in France. But this argument did not apply; for it was not proposed to repeal the whole tax on leather, but the additional duty only. The repeal of the additional duty would cause the same regulations to be continued, with less advantage to the public. He had read all the statements that had been published by persons in the leather trade, and listened to all the arguments which had been urged in that house, against this tax, and he confessed, that if the house had been in a condition to perform the agreeable duty of repealing taxes, the leather tax was not that of which he should be the first to recommend the repeal. It was obvious, and it had been argued by the hon. and learned gentleman, that the burthen of the tax did not fall on the tanners, but, as in the case of all consumable commodities, on the public, who were the consumers. Yet, if the hon. and learned gentleman read any of the statements which had been put forward on this subject, he would see, that those who were most active in demanding this repeal, grounded their enmity to the tax upon this, that the tax could not be thrown from the manufacturers upon the consumers. The only circumstance which gave a show of an argument in favour of this bill was, that the tax had been laid on almost immediately preceding a time of great pressure. But a much stronger statement might be made in favour of the repeal of any other part of the excise duties. In the malt trade, for instance, since the additional duty had been repealed, there had been a diminution of the number of licences, an increase of the number of bankruptcies in the trade, and a diminution of the produce of the old duty, from 3,000,000*l.* to less than 1,000,000*l.* The noble member for Northampton (Lord Compton) had said on a former evening, that he should vote for the repeal of this tax, as well as the salt tax, in order to compel the ministers to resort to the property tax, or some other direct tax. But he hoped the noble lord, before he consented to repeal this tax, would be confident that his new associates would consent to the imposition of some tax in place of it. In this case, as in the case of all commutations, the consumers would not be benefited to the whole extent of the tax remitted. In consequence of the additional tax, there was an additional quantity of leather employed in the leather trade, and that capital was shifted to some other employments, the dealers would charge their customers with the interest of it. There was no tax, in fact, that could be repealed with full benefit to the public, except direct taxes, and if any reduction could possibly be made, those should be the first that ought to meet consideration.

Lord Compton said, he had not pledged himself to support the repeal of the salt tax; but, in general, he preferred direct to indirect taxation. The house then divided on the question "That the bill be now read a second time."

The bill was consequently lost.

PARDONS UNDER THE GREAT SEAL.] Mr. F. Douglas said, that as he understood no opposition would be made to his motion for leave to bring in a bill to diminish the fees on pardons under the Great Seal, he should make only a few observations. The amount of the fees to be paid on all such pardons was much greater than those who had not taken the trouble to inquire into the subject could probable imagine. They amounted to 110*l.* on each pardon. It was obvious, that the great majority of those who received pardons could not pay this expense, and the house might be curious to know how the difficulty had been got over. In fact, very few of those to whom mercy was extended obtained this complete pardon, which alone could make them competent witnesses in a court of justice. There had been only twelve pardons during the last seven years; and he was convinced, that, in consequence, great impediments had been thrown in the way of public justice. He could not better illustrate this than by stating the circumstance which first called his attention to the subject. In the district of Oxfordshire with which he was connected, the worst sort of crimes had been committed for some time with impunity, and there was at last a prospect of bringing the perpetrators to punishment by means of the evidence of a man who had formerly been convicted of a felony. The act of the 31st of the King, which made persons who had been convicted of larcenies competent witnesses did not apply to felonies, and it was necessary to sue out a pardon under the Great Seal. The parties who conducted the prosecution were, however, astonished, when they found that the expense of this pardon would be 110*l.* in addition to the other heavy expenses which they were obliged to incur, and they were almost deterred from pursuing their object: finally, they did proceed, and were thus subjected to a considerable expense.—The hon. member observed, that if there were any thing in the case or character of a person convicted which rendered it proper to extend to him the mercy of the crown by the grant of a pardon, it was too much to say that such person should be compelled to pay the expense which, at present, attached to such a grant. To remove this evil was the object of the bill which he meant to bring forward. He did not think it proper to extend the provisions of the act of the 31st of the King to felons, and therefore he felt the necessity of another course of proceeding, in order to guard against the mischief, on the one hand, of allowing the officers of the crown to derive pecuniary benefit from the extension of the royal mercy; and on the other, to provide that persons should not be exempted from that mercy, merely because they had no pecuniary means.—The hon. member concluded with moving, "that leave be given to bring in a bill for diminishing the expense of Pardons under the Great Seal."

The Attorney-General said, that he did not mean to oppose the motion; but, from what the hon. member had stated, he felt it necessary to submit a few observations. The patents for pardon, the object of which was to restore convicts to their civil rights, were patents under the Great Seal, which were, in fact, subject to no more expense than was incurred for all other patents under the same seal, and that expense was necessary for purposes easily to be explained. One part of this expense was required to reward the clerks in office, for their trouble in transacting the business connected with those patents; another, to pay stamp duties imposed by the legislature. Those duties on each patent amounted in one office to 6*l.* and in another to 30*l.* The portion of the sum received for the warrant of pardon in the Secretary of State's office was invested in what was called the Fee Fund, out of which the clerks engaged in this branch of the business of that office, and the law officers of the crown, were rewarded for their trouble. Some part of the expense was also paid to the privy seal office. But it should be understood, that the greater part, if not the whole of the expense stated by the hon. member, independently of the stamp duties, was paid for duty actually done in the several offices to which he had alluded. The propriety of providing a remuneration for such trouble, or performance of duty, was, indeed, felt by the crown itself; for, whenever it was found necessary to pardon convicts, with a view to render them competent witnesses for promoting the ends of justice, the expense of such pardons was paid by the crown. But where a pardon was granted from favour—he did not mean from improper favour, but through peculiar circumstances connected with the case or character of the individual*—it was proper, he submitted, that the expense incurred by such pardon should be defrayed by that person, and that the clerks in the several offices should not be called upon to do business for nothing. For, although those clerks might, in such cases, be said to have little else to transact than mere matters of form, requiring no talent, still their time was employed, and, for such employment, they were justly entitled to remuneration. It was known, that some clerks in the Secretary of State's office, as well as the clerk in the attorney-general's office, reckoned upon the fees resulting from patents as a part of their salaries for labour actually performed. Whatever might be done upon this subject, he thought that a distinction ought to be made with respect to pardons granted on patents obtained through special grace or favour. The hon. and learned gentleman concluded with observing, that no case had been stated in which pardons were ever made a matter of traffic, or that a pardon was ever granted from any consideration of official emolument.

Leave was then given to bring in the bill.

CHIMNEY SWEEPERS.] The Earl of Shaftesbury moved, that the directors, secretaries, ar-

* The power of pardoning has been justly called the most amiable prerogative of the crown. By statute 27 Hen. VIII. c. 24. it is declared, that no other person hath power to pardon or remit any treason or felonies whatsoever; but that the king hath the whole and sole power thereof, united and knit to the imperial crown of this realm. But this power of pardoning is not merely discretionary; it is rather a judicial act, to be exercised only in such cases as merit an exemption from punishment. Bracton (lib. 2.) says, Non solum sapiens debet esse rex, sed et misericors, ut cum sapientia misericorditer sit justus, &c Quibus tamen et qualiter est miserendum, doceant eum merita vel immerita personarum, &c.—There are some cases where the king cannot pardon.

I. To preserve the liberty of the subject, the committing any man to prison out of the realm, is, by the habeas corpus act, 31 Car. II. c. 2. made a præmunire, unpardonable even by the king.

II. The king cannot pardon, where private justice is principally concerned in the prosecution of offenders: "non potest rex gratiam facere cum injuria et damno aliorum." (Bracton.) Therefore, in appeals of all kinds (which are at the suit, not of the king, but of the party injured) the prosecutor may release, but the king cannot pardon.

III. The king cannot pardon a common nuisance, while it remains unredressed, or so as to prevent an abatement of it; though afterwards he may remit the fine: because, though the prosecution is vested in the king to avoid multiplicity of suits, yet (during its continuance) this offence savours more of the nature of a private injury to each individual in the neighbourhood, than of a public wrong. (3 Instit. 238, 2 Hawk. P. C. 391.)

IV. Where an action popular is brought tam pro domino rege, quàm pro seipso, according to any statute, the king can discharge only his own part, because, by bringing the action, the informer has acquired an interest therein: but, after the action has been brought, the king may discharge the whole (unless it be provided to the contrary by the act), because the informer cannot bring an action or information originally for his part only, but must pursue the statute: and if the action be given to the party grieved, the king cannot discharge the same. (3 Instit. 238.)

V. The king cannot pardon any person impeached by the commons of high treason, or other high crimes, depending the impeachment. (12 and 13 W. III. c. 2.) But, after the impeachment has been heard and determined, his power is no further restrained; and, accordingly, it was exercised in the case of the six rebel lords, in 1715.

chitects, surveyors, and foremen of the firemen, of the different fire companies in London, and various other persons, be summoned to attend the committee on the chimney-sweepers' regulation bill.—Ordered.

LONGITUDE AND NORTHERN PASSAGE BILL.] This bill passed through a committee, and was reported without amendment.

WATER COMPANIES.] The Earl of Shaftesbury presented a petition from the Grand Junction Water-works' Company, observing at the same time, that there was a measure in progress in another place, which would probably soon bring under the consideration of their lordships, questions connected with those which formed the subject of the present petition. It was stated among other things in the petition, that the company had embarked a capital of 300,000*l.* in the concern; that they had been put to great expense, in consequence of the pavement act of last session requiring them to lay down iron instead of wooden pipes; that they desired only to obtain a fair profit on their capital; that they had been under the necessity of narrowing their operations, and concentrating their powers, in order to enable them the better to supply the inhabitants of the districts near their works with water, and to afford them security against fire; that they were surprised to find that what they had done in this respect had excited an alarm of their having entered into a combination with other companies, which was not true. The petitioners therefore prayed, that their lordships would be pleased to appoint a committee to inquire into their proceedings and conduct, under the act by which they were incorporated.

The Earl of Lauderdale thought himself called upon to take some notice of this petition. In consequence of what had been said a few days ago by a noble earl not then in his place, (Earl Grosvenor,) he had taken the liberty of stating his opinion on what appeared to him to be very extraordinary conduct on the part of certain water-works. Those water-works, he understood, had, by agreeing to form a junction, violated that principle of fair competition, to establish which had been the object of parliament in passing the acts by which they were incorporated. The day after he had stated his opinion on this subject, he received a letter from a gentleman, who, he understood was the secretary of the petitioners, in which that gentleman expressed his surprise that any statements of the kind which it appeared had been made, should have been brought forward under a total want of information. Though this was not precisely the way in which a member of that house ought to be addressed in reference to any subject which he might think it his duty to notice, yet he thought it right to see the writer of the letter, and had some little conversation with him. The result, however, was, that instead of finding his previous opinion wrong, he was more firmly convinced of the truth of the fact, that the companies had combined to divide the metropolis between them. The inhabitants suffered severely from this combination. He had received a letter from a householder in one of the districts supplied by these combined companies. This person had first paid 28*s.* a-year for his water, but another company offered to supply him for 24*s.* On his stating this to the company by whom he was served, they agreed to reduce their charge to 24*s.*; and at that rate he was regularly served, until the combination complained of took place, when the price was again raised to 28*s.* In that district of the metropolis with which a noble friend of his (the Duke of Bedford) was particularly connected, he understood it was a general complaint of the tenants, that they were confined to one water company. While there were two rival companies, there was some security that the public would not be imposed on; but, as the matter now stood, a monopoly was established, and he was sure, that their lordships must feel that it was impossible for them to consent to such a state of things, unless they meant to take into their consideration the supply of the metropolis with water, and to fix the fair price at which that first necessary of life ought to be sold to the inhabitants. It was not long since these companies had in vain applied for leave to consolidate their corporations; but they had now, by their own private arrangements, accomplished what parliament had refused to grant. It appeared to him, that if ever there was a case proper for the deliberation of parliament, this was one. The noble earl who presented the petition had alluded to a proceeding in another place, which was likely soon to come under the consideration of that house. If the measure referred to did not come before their lordships, he could only say that they would not do their duty, if they separated at the end of the session without some decision on this subject.

The petition was then laid on the table.

Wednesday, April 8.

COPYRIGHT BILL.] The following petition of Messrs. Cadell and Davies, booksellers and publishers, in the Strand, was presented, ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed. "That the petitioners, having observed that a bill has been brought into the house to modify the burthen of delivering eleven copies of books to certain libraries, as directed by a preceding statute, and that several petitions have been presented on the subject, are desirous, but without intruding long on the attention of the house, to state how heavily they are affected by the said delivery; the petitioners at an expense of much greater magnitude than usually attends the publication of books, have published a work, intituled, "Murray's Arabian Antiquities of Spain," consisisting principally of one hundred plates, with some descriptive letter-press of the most interesting and important remains of Moorish architecture in Spain; from the cost of the said work, it was necessarily published at the price of forty guineas, and as it consisted wholly of plates, with no other letter-press than a few lines to each describing its contents, the petitioners hoped that they would not be subjected to the grievance of delivering the said eleven copies, which, at the publishing price, would have amounted to four hundred and forty guineas; but they are informed that the addition of the letter-press description makes them liable to such delivery, and eight copies thereof have been already demanded; that on eight other works, that is to say, the Gallery of Portraits, Lysons's Cornwall, Cumberland, Derby, and the Britannia Depicta, Doctor Clarke's Travels, Farrington's Lakes and Drake's Shakspeare, the delivery of the said eleven copies have amounted to the sum of three hundred and thirty-eight pounds twelve shillings, at the lowest wholesale price; the petitioners have also found that the burthen of the delivery on all the other books which they have published has been a yearly grievance of very considerable amount, while all the expenses of their trade, and of publishing in general, continue unabated, and, as far as the petitioners can ascertain, no advantage of any sort has accrued to them as booksellers from the said delivery, nor do they believe that it increases the circulation of books; on the contrary, it appears to them that many persons read the works in these libraries who would otherwise have been purchasers, and they are satisfied that it is daily operating to discourage authors and artists from undertaking several works which, but for the delivery, they would have risked; the petitioners, therefore, respectfully beg the indulgence of the house to permit them thus to represent the grievance of the delivery of these eleven copies, both to themselves and to others, and to hope that the house will remove the same, or at least materially diminish it, by enacting that some portion of the published price of each book should be paid by the library demanding the same, or that the house would grant such other relief as in its wisdom shall seem most expedient."

The following petition of William Bernard Cooke, of York Place, Pentonville, in the county of Middlesex, engraver, was presented, ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed. "That the petitioner is now preparing for publication in imperial folio, Delineations of the city of Pompeii, with letter-press descriptions of the plates and an historical account of Pompeii, which he intends also to illustrate by vignettes of fragments, bas reliefs, and paintings, found in the ruins of that celebrated city, and to add outlines of sections, architectural details of the tombs in reference to the views, vases, helmets, implements, and utensils, discovered by recent excavations and restorations of the gates of Pompeii, and of the grand forum, with plans of the city and its principal buildings, and the whole, consisting nearly of one hundred plates, will be published in four parts, at four guineas each part, with a few proofs on India paper at eight guineas each part; the petitioner has stated to the house these particulars of his intended work, because they imply the quantity of skill and labour that must be employed to complete an undertaking so extensive, and the very heavy expenses that must attend its execution and publication: all such publications incur a risk in proportion to their magnitude, scarcely one work in twenty repays the expenses of its completion, and if they do not succeed, they involve the adventurous artist in ruinous consequences, yet, unless such works are undertaken in this country, our national reputation will suffer, and foreign states will attract to themselves the merit and advantages which have always followed a superiority in the elegant arts, and in undertaking works of this description on a grand scale; the petitioner therefore feels it to be a great grievance to him, as an individual, that instead of being encouraged by the subscriptions of any of the eleven libraries, to whom, by a late act, eleven copies of every book is to be delivered when demanded, he is to deliver eleven copies of the above-mentioned work without any remuneration; these works cannot be properly understood without some accompanying letter-press description, and yet, by the injunction of the said act, if a leaf or more of description be added to make the plates intelligible, it subjects the artists to a delivery of the said eleven copies; the petitioner humbly begs to represent to the house, that ten copies of the above work, in four parts, at four guineas each part, and one copy for the British Museum, on the best paper, at eight guineas each part, will amount to no less a sum of actual loss to the petitioner, than that of two hundred and one pounds twelve shillings; the petitioner states this as an actual loss, because the demand takes them from the petitioner's first, and therefore best impressions, and being fine plates, more than a certain number of impressions cannot be taken off without injury; and the petitioner humbly asks whether it can be just that he should be visited by so heavy a grievance, because he engages in a speculation, which, at an equal chance of loss as well as of profit to himself, gratifies intellectual curiosity, and contributes to the improvement of the arts and the honour of this country, at the same time that, in the consumption of the paper employed, it also benefits the revenue; the petitioner has also other works in preparation, as an artist, which, if he proceeds in, will experience a similar burthen; he has projected a work on the Southern Coast to contain eighty engravings, of which the delivery of eleven copies will take from him one hundred and twenty-four pounds, and another on the Thames, on which they will amount to eighty-seven pounds three shillings; and thus on these three works the petitioner will have to deliver copies to these eleven libraries to the amount of four hundred and twelve pounds fifteen shillings; the petitioner cannot but feel this to be an individual burthen that operates to repress the exertions of artists instead of rewarding them, and to vex and dispirit the artist, and he submits that no copies ought to be demanded without a due portion of the price being paid for them; the petitioner therefore humbly prays, that the house will take his grievance into its consideration, and by such modifications of the said act as in its equity and wisdom it shall feel to be proper, diminish the burthen above-mentioned, and relieve the artist from its heavy operation."

The following petition of William Daniell, of Cleveland Street, Fitzroy Square, engraver, was presented, ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed. "That the petitioner and his uncle Mr. Thomas Daniell, having made a large collection of drawings during a long residence in India, illustrating the architecture, scenery and costume of that interesting country, have been deterred from continuing the publication of the same from the injunction of the last act of parliament on that subject to deliver eleven copies of what they should publish to the eleven libraries therein mentioned; they have been frequently requested by many of the subscribers to their former publications of Oriental Scenery to add a volume or two to that work; but the certainty of a demand from the said libraries of eleven copies, which at the price of thirty pounds each, would have amounted to three hundred and thirty pounds, has prevented the petitioner from complying with these solicitations, the petitioner would have also published a separate volume on the costume of India, with descriptive letter-press, another on the animals and birds of that country, and another on the great variety of vessels peculiar to India, the cost of which would have been twelve guineas each but the same necessity which would have followed of delivering the eleven copies, amounting therefore to one hundred and thirty-two guineas, has deterred the petitioner from this undertaking; the petitioner was also desirous to have published a volume of plates on the scenery of Southern Africa and the island of Ceylon, from the original drawings which he has in his possession, but the same compulsory delivery has constantly checked his intentions, and discouraged him from beginning such an undertaking; and he believes that if this burthen shall be continued, many artists will be intimidated in like manner from many works that would do credit to this country, and benefit those branches of commerce which are connected with the fine arts; the petitioner therefore prays the house, that the burthen of delivering eleven copies as aforesaid may be removed, or so far modified, as they shall think expedient, to diminish its weight, and to prevent it from operating to the discouragement of authors and artists."

Lord Althorp presented the following petition of certain persons, the Authors and Composers of Books. "That the petitioners, observing that notice has been given in the house, and their leave obtained, to bring in a bill to amend the statute passed in the 54th year of his present majesty, which enacted the delivery of eleven copies of all books printed and published after the passing of that act to the eleven libraries or public bodies therein mentioned, request the permission of the house to state their view of the grievances which this compulsory delivery has produced, and to solicit such relief upon the subject as to their wisdom shall seem most expedient; the petitioners humbly submit, that by the common law of this country, and by the decision of its highest court of judicature, as well as by the principles of natural equity, and by the analogy of every other species of property, they would have had, if no statute had passed on the subject, an exclusive right to the copyright of their several works, and to all the benefit and produce arising from their sale, as every other subject of this kingdom enjoys as to all his effects and possessions, but the legislature of this kingdom having formerly thought it right to limit the enjoyment of this species of property, has now extended that limitation to the term of twenty-eight years, or of the author's life if he should survive that time; the petitioners are grateful to the equity of parliament for this extension, and only regret that it was accompanied by the enactment that eleven copies of all publications should be delivered on demand for the eleven libraries mentioned in the said act; the petitioners submit that the equitable right of the said libraries to these copies is quite distinct from the right of authors as to their copyright, the delivery of these copies rests merely on the enactment of the statutes on that subject, and is founded upon no previous right, for, as to the ancient contract alluded to between sir Thomas Bodley and the Stationers' Company in 1609, it was an engagement between those two contracting parties for reciprocal objects then in view, which do not now subsist, and binding only themselves, and confined to only one of the said libraries; but can by no construction of law, or rule of equity, be justly extended to the petitioners, and the authors in modern times, who have no connexion either with the Bodleian library or the Stationers' Company; the petitioners therefore submit, that this compulsory delivery is unjust in its principle, as it invades the great rules of law and policy which assure to every one the unmolested enjoyment of the produce of his labour and acquired property; and that it has this additional objection, that although every publication is not under the same circumstances of expense, circulation, or importance, yet the compulsory delivery is imposed without discrimination on all; the petitioners believe that it operates materially to the injury of authors, and to the discouragement of future publications; the petitioners cannot change the established custom of the printing profession of charging for printing any number less than 250 the price of printing 250; and therefore, to print eleven copies beyond any regular number incurs the charge of printing 250, and to deliver eleven copies out of the regular number printed of any work is a subtraction from the petitioners and their assigns of the whole trade sale price of those eleven copies when the impression sells, and if the impression should not sell, yet the petitioners are aggrieved by the loss of the amount of the paper and printing of so many copies; and they submit, that if this amount be in some cases not large, yet it is considerable in the aggregate of the whole quantity demanded, and no law of any country has made the amount of any property the measure or the standard of right and justice respecting it, the smallest quantity of value is protected to every one as much as the greatest, the legal right is the same whatever be the pecuniary amount, and all penal codes for the preservation of property are founded on this natural principle, so essential to the general welfare of society; as far as the petitioners can judge, the delivery of these eleven copies also operates to injure the sale of many books; it not only takes away the eleven libraries as purchasers of those which they demand, but, by the books being deposited in so many public libraries in the three great metropolitan cities, and the principal universities and libraries of these kingdoms, it enables a great many individuals to gratify their curiosity without purchasing the publication, and such members are satisfied with a temporary perusal of works daily issuing from the press; and the petitioners believe that the sale of several useful publications has been thereby greatly lessened; the petitioners are also satisfied that it makes the booksellers more averse to undertake the publication of expensive and of many important works; the price of the eleven copies taken away now becomes a material object of their calculation, and some have, on that account, declined the risk of publishing; the delivery also leads the booksellers to diminish the compensation to authors for their copyright in works where popularity is not certain, which is the case with most, and especially books of labour and expense, and as far as it operates to increase the price, it tends thereby to injure the sale; it prevents authors from receiving from their booksellers so many copies as they wish to give to their friends, and therefore it is a deduction of so much from the general produce and benefit of literature, which are already sufficiently uncertain, and in the great majority of instances exceedingly scanty; the petitioners are therefore decidedly of opinion, that the continuation of the demand and delivery of these copies without some modification, will discourage the future composition and publication of works; many valuable works are every year composed of great importance to science and learning, which from their expensive nature cannot be published unless booksellers can be found who will undertake the risk of the publication; but the petitioners are informed that the necessity of delivering these copies has occasioned some booksellers to decline the publication of some useful works whose sale was precarious; many authors are now projecting expensive works which the burthen of the delivery prevents them from undertaking, and the petitioners are satisfied that it will operate hereafter to prevent such works from being undertaken at all; the petitioners humbly submit, that in this great commercial and wealthy country, reputation alone cannot be a sufficient stimulus to authors to compose or publish valuable works, and more especially those which involve much expense; the affluence of the country operates not only to make the annual expenditure for subsistence considerable, but also to enhance the charges of every publication; the same prosperity of the country leading to costly habits of living, prevents men of literary reputation from holding the same rank in this country that it obtains in some others; justice also to the family who have to derive their nurture and respectability from the paternal labours, compels the parent to devote some portion of his attention to pecuniary considerations; hence an author can rarely write for fame alone; and every subtraction from his profit, and every measure that will diminish his ardour to prepare, and the readiness of booksellers to publish his work, especially as so many require such large sums to be expended and risked upon them, is an injury not only to authors, but to literature itself; the petitioners submit, that there never was a period in the history of the world, in which the people of every country have been more strongly emulous of each other, in scientific and literary attainments, than they are at this moment; and not only great national celebrity arises from superior excellence in works of art and literature, but it may be considered to be equally true, that whatever discourages or obstructs the progress of literature, in any country, will produce in time a national inferiority, and those political effects will be severely felt, when they will be with much difficulty remedied; the petitioners have been surprized to find, by the return of the list of publications entered at Stationers Hall, which has been laid on the table of the house, that copies of all that have been entered have been indiscriminately demanded by the said eleven libraries, with the single exception that two of them, and two of them only, namely, the Advocates Library and Trinity College, Dublin, have not demanded music and novels; the petitioners have remarked this fact with astonishment and regret; that all the promiscuous medley of modern publications should be incorporated with the important works that were formerly deposited in these libraries, and should there be open to the perusal of the most distinguished and most lively youthful minds of this empire, whose judgments have to be correctly formed, and should be there transmitted with all their sanction to posterity, seems to the petitioners to be incompatible with the objects and policy of those venerable institutions; if they be demanded and not deposited, then authors and publishers are burthened unnecessarily; and if all be deposited and read, the petitioners think, that if it be recollected how many multifarious theories, speculations, discussions, and doubts, are daily arising in society, and daily investigated in public by the press, an indiscriminate demand and compulsory delivery of every publication, must tend to lead the impressible minds of the educating youth (who cannot have yet attained that solid judgment which time alone can create), to imbibe and nourish whatever spirit of change, desire of novelty, or projects of innovation, the conversations and incidents of the day may excite; without this delivery, no publication is purchased till it is wanted, and the expense of the purchase diminishes curiosity; but the delivery brings before the eyes of the educating youth of this country, and their instructors, books that they would not else have noticed, and perhaps not have heard of, books often highly useful and important in themselves, but not advantageous to the young and inexperienced mind; the petitioners respectfully submit, that it is of the highest importance to the interests of our venerable universities, and the other valuable seats of knowledge and learning, that the utmost harmony of feeling should be established and perpetuated between these respected institutions and the intelligent minds that now abound and are increasing in the British community; but the petitioners feel that this promiscuous demand and delivery tends to diminish this desirable harmony, because it creates a sense of grievance on the one side, unmitigated by any perception of a public good resulting from its continuance; and the petitioners are informed, that in no country of Europe, nor in America, are so many copies taken from authors and publishers as by the enactment above-mentioned, although in those countries much larger editions are printed and sold than can be disposed of in this kingdom: books are also printed abroad at so much less expense than in Great Britain, that the petitioners are apprehensive many works will be lost to this nation by being printed and circulated exclusively elsewhere; the petitioners therefore most humbly pray, that by the bill now before the house on this subject, such relief as to their wisdom shall seem most expedient may be granted to the petitioners, either by lessening the number of copies to be delivered, or by some regulation that will make it expedient for the libraries not to demand, indiscriminately, all publications, and therefore to contribute some such portion of the price of the books they may demand, as to the house shall seem equitable, or that the house will be pleased to grant the petitioners such further or other relief on the subject, as to them shall be deemed most fitting."

Mr. Smyth said, that great prejudices existed on this subject. The signatures of many respectable individuals now appeared to petitions, though the same persons were totally silent in 1814, when the subject had been fully discussed. The bill passed at that time conferred many important privileges upon publishers and authors, which, it was expected, would indemnify them for the loss they considered themselves liable to, by the copies which they were required to deliver. He hoped the bill now before the house would not be pressed forward too hastily, but that the subject would meet with the attention which its importance deserved.

Mr. Gurney said, that the inconvenience of the present law to authors and publishers was very great. Mr. Lysons was then publishing a work, the price of which would be 60 guineas, so that, before he could derive the least profit from the sale, he must send copies to the various institutions amounting to 660 guineas.

Mr. Smyth observed, that the expense of engraving the plates of a work would be precisely the same, whether the eleven copies were deposited in the different libraries or not.—The petition was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

The following petition of the reverend Rogers Ruding, vicar of Malding, near Kingston, in the county of Surrey, was presented, ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed. "That the petitioner has employed many years in composing and compiling a work on the coinage of the realms, which he has published under the title of 'Annals of the Coinage of Great Britain and its Dependencies;' that the petitioner printed fifty copies of the said work on large paper, at 15*l.* 15*s*. each, and two hundred copies thereof on smaller paper, at 10*l.* 10*s*. each; that the whole of the large paper copies, excepting three, were subscribed for, and of the smaller paper no more than thirty-three or thirty-four remained for general sale, and within six months after publication, all the smaller paper copies which had not been subscribed for, were disposed of at 14*l.* a copy; by the operation of the act enforcing the delivery of eleven copies to the eleven libraries therein mentioned, the petitioner was thus deprived of the produce of such eleven copies, which, if they had not been so demanded, would have been sold to the benefit of the petitioner, and the same, at the actual selling value of 14*l.* each, would have produced to him 154*l.*; that the said work was from its nature a very expensive and laborious work, and of a limited sale, and the profit to the petitioner, from the whole produce of the same, has borne no adequate proportion to the toil, risk, and cost of his undertaking, and the petitioner was at one time apprehensive that, from the burthen of the delivery, he must have discontinued it; but, although the amount of the subscription at length enabled him to proceed, yet he submits, that to be deprived of 154*l.* on such a publication is too heavy a burthen to be borne by one individual for a literary undertaking, and can only tend to the great discouragement of similar works; the petitioner will also again be affected in making any improvements in his said work, in case another small edition should be thought advisable, because that will subject him to a repetition of the said delivery, unless he can print and deliver such additions separately, which it is difficult to do, and he fears that on this account many works will be reprinted with their imperfections uncorrected; he therefore prays, that the wisdom of the house will take the grievance of the said delivery into consideration, and grant such relief thereon as it shall think fit, in order to lessen the pressure on the authors and publishers of all future works, and on the petitioner, in case he should attempt a second improved edition of his said work."

The following petition of John Britton, of Tavistock Place, in the county of Middlesex, was presented, ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed. "That the petitioner has published several works illustrating the Antiquities, Topography, and the Fine Arts of this country, which have been his chief support and greatest pleasure for the last eighteen years of his life, all of which have been produced at great risk and expense, and some have not sold in sufficient numbers to repay the expenses bestowed on them; that the petitioner's losses and risk have been much increased, and his future literary undertakings will be discouraged, if not wholly suspended, by the heavy grievance of delivering eleven copies to the eleven libraries mentioned in the act of the 54th of his present Majesty; that the delivery of one copy on large paper, and ten on other paper, of his 'Architectural Antiquities of Great Britain,' four volumes quarto, would amount to 232*l.*; of his 'Fine Arts of the English School, one volume quarto, to 76*l.*; and of his 'History and Antiquities of Salisbury Cathedral,' one volume quarto, to 40 guineas; of his 'History, &c. of Norwich Cathedral,' one volume quarto, to 33*l.*; of his 'History, &c. of Winchester Cathedral,' to 42*l.*; and of his 'History, &c. of York Cathedral,' one volume quarto, to 48*l.*, amounting altogether, for only six works, to 471*l.*, a very heavy deduction from the produce of one author's works; the petitioner also begs permission to state, that his work on the Cathedral Antiquities of England has cost, from its commencement in 1813 to June 1817, when the publisher's accounts were made up, to the sum of 7,773*l.* 15*s.* 6*d.* and that the sale of the said book, up to the same period, has produced only 6,468*l.* 8*s.* 9*d.* whereby it is clear that there is at present a loss on the said work of the sum of 1,305*l.* 6*s.* 11*d.* yet on this work the eleven copies have been demanded and delivered, amounting nearly to 200*l.* instead of the petitioner being assisted by their purchase; the petitioner respectfully represents to the house, that if this act be not modified or abrogated, he must relinquish the publication of the above-named work, whereby not only the public revenue derived from the duty on paper, advertisements, &c. must be injured, but many artists, manufacturers, and tradesmen now employed in the work, will also suffer; the petitioner requests permission to state, that all works of this description not only contribute largely to the revenue, in the paper they consume, and in their advertisements, but also to many classes of meritorious artists, whose talents are called into action by the various branches of the publications, and whose comforts and subsistence are injured by every cause that contributes to discourage the undertaking of such works; and the petitioner is fully convinced, from his own experience, and the expressed feelings of our most respectable artists, that the continuation of the delivery will prevent many publications from being undertaken; the price of English embellished books is already so high that they will not circulate on the continent, and the foreign market can already greatly undersell us, and this delivery tends to increase the growing evil; the petitioner, therefore, humbly prays, that the house will in its wisdom either remove, or greatly modify, the compulsory enactment which requires the delivery of eleven copies to the eleven libraries as aforesaid, or grant such other relief to authors and artists as to their wisdom shall seem meet."

PRIVATELY STEALING (IRELAND) BILL.] This bill was read a second time.

EDUCATION OF THE POOR BILL.] Mr. Brougham brought in a bill "for appointing a Commission to enquire into the Abuses in Charities connected with the Education of the Poor in England and Wales." The bill was read a first time, when Mr. Brougham observed, that it had been suggested by an hon. member, that the operation of this bill should be extended to all charities. If the bill had been introduced with this title, it would have been contrary to the instructions given to the committee; but he had taken care from the hint which had been thrown out, that the bill should be so drawn, that, by drawing the pen through two or three words, it might be made to protect all charitable institutions, if the house should so think fit. He would now move that the bill be read a second time on Monday next, and that it be be printed.--Ordered.

BUILDING OF CHURCHES BILL.] On the motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, this bill was considered in a committee, and reported. The report was ordered to be taken into farther consideration, on Monday, the 20th of April.

POOR LAWS AMENDMENT BILL.] The following petition of owners of dwelling houses under the yearly value of 20*l.*, or of land suitable for the erection thereof, within the towns of Manchester and Salford, was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed. "That such parts of a certain bill now before the house, as will empower parishes in certain cases to assess the owners of dwelling-houses to the poor's rates thereof, instead of the occupiers, is unjust and oppressive upon the owners of the property in question, as it would throw the burthen of paying the poor's rates upon them, whilst the owners of every other description of real property would be wholly exempt therefrom, and thus the equality of bearing the burthen of the poor's rates, which every person ought to sustain in proportion to his rateable property, either real or personal, would be destroyed; that the reasons which induced the origin of the proposed measure are stated in the bill to be, that a great number of houses are let to tenants who quit their residences, and become insolvent before the rate charged on them can be collected; and it hath been found that, in many instances, the persons letting such houses do actually charge and receive much higher rents for the same, upon the ground and expectation that the occupiers thereof cannot be effectually assessed to the poor's rate, and will not be charged with and required to pay, such rates, and do thus obtain an undue advantage to themselves, and, by means of the premises, the other inhabitants of such parishes are unjustly compelled to pay much more than their fair and due proportion of the charges of relieving and maintaining the poor; which statement, so far as regards the frequent leaving of the tenants without the payment of the amount due, the petitioners readily admit, and which their own interest as landlords, has occasioned them feelingly to lament; but that part of it, which states that the owners of this description of property have derived any profit from the exemption of their houses from the poor's rates, they conceive, can only arise from misrepresentation; and it is in fact contrary to every principle of political economy, which lays down as an infallible rule, that no trade or mode of employing capital, open to all, possessing no secret process, and reputable in its nature, can for any length of time secure to itself more than a reasonable profit, for that the number of persons who will be induced to enter into it, will occasion a competition which will reduce the price or returns of the article within the limits of a fair emolument; that the former of the reasons assigned in the bill for the proposed measures, viz. that tenants of such houses quit their residences, or become insolvent before the rates upon them can be collected, appears to the petitioners to be a most cogent argument against the measures, for if the rates cannot be collected from these circumstances, the same difficulty must exist in collecting the rent, nearly the same summary process for enforcing payment existing in both cases; it is therefore manifestly unjust to make the very circumstance which renders the income of the owners of small houses so insecure, the reason for loading them with an additional burthen, whilst the owners of larger houses, factories, workshops, warehouses, and land, whose income is secure, and easily collected, are, as owners, to be wholly exempt from all call to make good any defalcation which may arise on the part of their respective tenants in the payment of the poor's rate; that the petitioners surmise that the idea of enormous profits being derived from the erection of cottages, originates in the circumstance of a few individuals having erected dwellings of this description in so flimsy a manner, as not to be calculated to endure for many years, and thereby have appeared to gain a large return upon their capital, but which return, if the duration of the premises is taken into consideration, will not be found ultimately to produce to the owners the large profits which it might appear to do, when regarded independently of any consideration of their durability; that the owners of the property in question are almost universally burthened with a heavy ground rent, and are also liable to constant charges for repairs, which the property of the tenant renders him unable to make; in the preparation of their conveyances, also, they are at much greater expenses (exclusive of the ad valorem duties) than the owners of property of much larger amount; in the collection of that portion of their rental which they are able to realize, they incur either the expense of a very heavy poundage, or much of their time and labour is occupied in collecting the same; the frequent change of tenants is also, by the repairs necessary to be made for every new tenant, the occasion of an expense attendant on cottage property, of which those who are not possessors of this kind of dwellings, can form no estimate; that these deductions being made from that nominal rental, diminish the real return on the capital employed to rather below a fair emolument for the same, as compared with buildings of a higher order, even in those times when trade is in a healthy state, but when commerce languishes, they have the effect of reducing the income of the cottage proprietor to an amount little more than nominal; that, in the commercial towns, the property in question is occupied by the labouring poor, who have generally been brought into the towns by the manufactories of those very persons who are stated in the bill to be compelled to pay much more than their just proportion of the expense of the maintenance of the poor; that the labour of the population inhabiting small houses has been the principal source from which they have derived the profits of their trade; yet when these poor become unable to work, and consequently chargeable to the parish, the profits of the employer are not chargeable with any rate for their relief, but merely with the common rate on the buildings which they occupy: therefore the idea that such persons pay more than their due proportion of the poor's rate, appears to the petitioners to be erroneous and mistaken; that the burthen thus attempted to be thrown upon the owners of small houses, is not rendered less oppressive by the power of enforcing it being given to vestry meetings of the lay payers, the resolutions of which will take immediate effect, whilst the owners of the premises will have no means of compelling the tenant (even in cases where he is able to bear the burthen) to pay any additional rent in a less period of time than that of six or twelve months, and in cases where the tenant proves refractory or poor, which will be cases of general occurrence, the owners will be compelled to have recourse to the tedious and expensive process of an ejectment, to recover possession of their property; that the proposed measure will compel the owners of such property, in the endeavour to shield themselves from loss, to raise the rentals to considerably above the sum which might ultimately prove to be necessary to cover the poor's rate, a rate in which the town of Manchester has varied within the last twenty years from twenty to fifty-two and a half per cent. on the rentals; a variation so great as to leave to the landlord no accurate means of defining what addition ought to be made to his rental to cover so fluctuating a charge; that the proposed measure would be dangerous to the public tranquillity, and particularly so to the personal safety of the owners of the property in question, as they would be compelled to leave notices in the dwellings of the entire of the poor of a change in their rentals amounting to from a fourth to one half of the sums now paid, which would produce a general state of irritation, the effects of which must be alarming to every considerate mind; that small houses are absolutely necessary for the residence of the poor in large manufacturing towns: and it is well known that some time ago, when in Manchester, and other towns, owing to the want of cottage-houses, the poor were crowded together in the rooms of larger dwelling-houses, they suffered the greatest misery from dirt and infectious disorders, and thereby the public health was much endangered; it was also found that in such dwelling-houses, the promiscuous intercourse of different families had a tendency to injure the morals of the younger part of them; that the law as it at present stands, gives to the churchwardens the power of rating the property in question to the poor's rate, to which measure the petitioners offer no objection; and the law also vests in the churchwardens powers for the recovery of the same nearly as summary (and which by a slight alteration in the law might be made quite so) as those of the landlord for the enforcement of his rent; the existing law has also provided, that the churchwardens, who are considered as disinterested persons, should have the power of mitigating the burthen in every case when relief might become necessary; but the proposed measure will have the effect of destroying this fair system, and in compelling the owners of the dwellings of the poor to pay the rate, will almost destroy the possibility of relief, by preventing the exemption of any, however distressed, from the burthen; the situation of the poor will thereby be rendered more miserable; the owners of the property, who have heretofore sacrificed to the miseries of their tenants in the time of distress a considerable part of their rental, by refraining to distrain when they were aware want alone prevented the payment of the rental, will thus be compelled to become the bailiffs of the parish, and, by the pressure of so heavy a rate upon themselves, be obliged to steel their feelings, and to resist the cries of the poor; and, in the opinion of the petitioners, the burthen of poor's rate, which it is so fallaciously supposed this measure will relieve, will be increased by the poor being driven to have recourse to it for the payment of the accumulation of rent, with the charges of the distress, and of the persons leving the same, in addition to the loss of from twenty-five to fifty per cent. on the value of their goods, occasioned by their sale under a process of law; and what is still more alarming, the spirit of pauperism, which has so rapidly increased of late years among the lower orders, and which it is the object of the legislature to counteract, will, by the increased number of persons whom the proposed measure will compel to have recourse to the poor's rates, be more extensively diffused; that the petitioners are aware that it has been urged, by those in favour of the proposed measure, that if the experiment does not succeed it can be abandoned, and that part of the act remain dormant, or be repealed; in answer to this argument, the petitioners reply that they are well aware the experiment will not be found to succeed in practice, and that, like the act of 31 Elizabeth, c. 7. for imposing restrictions on the erection of cottages, it will be abandoned, with a similar acknowledgment to that contained in the bill for the repeal of the act alluded to, viz. that the said statute had laid the industrious poor under great difficulties to procure habitations, and in divers other respects was inconvenient to the labouring classes of the nation at large: yet the petitioners deprecate the idea of attempting to try whether the poor can be made to pay the poor's rate through their medium, as a measure likely to be ruinous to the landlord, more burthensome to the poor, and more difficult in its abandonment in the event of its failure, than the present legal mode of trying the same experiment through its proper medium, the churchwardens and overseers of the parish; that the owners of cottage-houses are in general persons who, by the hard labour and frugal saving of years, in addition to the money raised by mortgage of the premises when erected, have been enabled to build a few cottages, and that the effect of the proposed measure, if they cannot succeed in raising the rent of the premises, will be to take from them the reward of a life of frugality and industry, and this without their having committed any crime, or the assignment of any other reason than that it is stated to have been proved before the house that some persons have made large profits by the erection of small dwellings, which the petitioners submit is no reason why the owners of such dwellings in general should be deprived of a great portion of their property, without its being proved that they, as individuals, have been guilty of the receipt of enormous profits, which act of individuals, unknown to the petitioners, will, if the proposed bill pass into a law, be visited by the indiscriminate punishment of the innocent and the guilty; that the measure appears more particularly partial and unjust, as it is a well-known fact that in the towns of Manchester and Salford numerous houses above 20*l.* per annum have, in former years, been excused from the payment of the poor's rate, and no attempts have been made to render the owners of such property liable to the same; the petitioners therefore humbly pray, that the proposed measure may not pass into a law."

PARDONS UNDER THE GREAT SEAL BILL.] Mr. F. Douglas brought in his bill "for diminishing the expense of Pardons under the Great Seal."—Read a first time.

BREACH OF PRIVILEGE.] Lord Archibald Hamilton said, that he wished to call the attention of the house to a subject of great importance, affecting the privileges of the commons' house of parliament. He would not at present enter into any details on the subject; he wished merely to state, that it related to a contest now going on in a county for the election of a member to serve in that house, in which contest a noble lord, a member of the other house of parliament, had thought proper to interfere. He intended to submit this matter to their consideration on Friday next: and he now desired merely to know whether, as this motion related to a breach of their privileges, it would not be entitled to precedency over other business. He should abstain from mentioning the names of the parties, or any of the particulars, unless the chair, or any honourable member, thought that he ought to be more explicit on the subject. If no farther explanation were required, he should now merely add, that he would bring forward this matter on Friday next.

Lord Castlereagh observed, that several matters stood on the orders for Friday next; but he apprehended that, if the noble lord wished to make his motion on that day, it would, as a matter of privilege, be entitled to precedency.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Lord Stanley begged to call the attention of the house to a petition which he held in his hands. He said, the house must be aware, that, in his situation of representative for the county of Lancaster, many petitions were frequently put into his hands, of which he could not approve either the matter or the manner. The petition which he now held in his hands, was signed on behalf of a meeting at Royton, by Mr. George Taylor the chairman. He was aware that the house did not recognise any petition so signed, as the petition of those from whom it purported to come, and that it could only be received as the petition of the individual who was the chairman of the meeting. But this was not the point to which he was most anxious to draw their attention. Among the petitions put into the hands of members, some came so near the line of right and propriety, that it became a matter of doubt whether they ought to be presented. With respect to this petition he owned that he had his doubts—it certainly came very near the line of propriety—but as he always wished to leave the right of petitioning as unfettered as possible, he should be sorry to do any thing to prevent the voice of individuals from being heard. There was hardly any thing in the prayer of the petition which was improper. Whether, in the body of the petition, some expressions might not be considered as improper, he should leave for the house to consider, when they heard it read.

The petition was brought up and read. It purported to be the petition of several thousands of people assembled at Royton, in Lancashire, on the 23d of March, 1818. It commenced by stating, that self-preservation was the first law of nature. It went on to state, that many of the petitioners were weavers, whose wages did not exceed seven shillings a week, a sum altogether inadequate to the support of themselves and families, and the payment of house rent and taxes—that, in this situation, they were bringing children into the world whom they could not support—that God never made men to labour and to starve—that the business of quarter sessions formerly used to last only about two days—but that the quarter sessions now usually lasted twelve or fourteen days—that this moral deterioration was the consequence of the unexampled misery and privation in the lower classes—that general misery was productive of ignorance and slavery—that a state of things like this could not be conducive to our prosperity either at home or abroad—that the property of a country consisted in the produce of its land and labour—that, if too much of this produce went to rent and taxes, the consequence was, a proportionate privation and suffering of those by whose labour that produce was realized—that the avarice and cunning of some individuals had succeeded in appropriating to themselves, and those who were instrumental to their views, so much, that nothing was left to others—that it was the duty of wise statesmen to check this evil, and to oppose, instead of supporting, expensive wars, the undertaking of which could neither be productive of good, nor prevent evil—that the weight of the burdens of these wars fell on the poor with double force—that, from the attention which they had given to the proceedings of the house on the subject of the poor laws, they could see no disposition on the part of the house to diminish the evils of pauperism—that, as wages increased, pauperism deceased—that his Majesty's ministers had imprisoned many of the best men in the country, on the pretence of treason, while no treason had been committed—that, as well might men have been committed for murder, while no murder had taken place—that any disorders which took place were solely attributable to spies and incendiaries employed by the government—and that they attributed their misery to the selfish principles which had influenced the hon. house for a long time. The petitioners, therefore, prayed the house to repeal the corn bill, that rents might fall—to retrench all useless and improper expenditure, that the burden of the taxes might be diminished—and to reform the commons house, and admit the people to the exercise of their just rights.

Lord Stanley then moved that the petition do lie on the table.

Mr. Bankes was of opinion, that as this petition professed to come from a public meeting, and was signed by the chairman only, it ought not to be received. He was aware, that the house sometimes extended their indulgence so far as to consider a petition of a public meeting the petition of the individual who signed it; but, as this petition alleged only general opinions, he thought it would be inconvenient to extend their indulgence to it.

Mr. Wynn contended, that there was a great difference between a petition like this, and one signed by a sheriff in the name of a county meeting. This alone was a ground for refusing to receive it; but when he looked at the manner in which it was worded, and the outrage offered to the house, by attributing selfish principles to them, he could come to no other conclusion, than that the petition was framed for the purpose of insulting the house, and, therefore, ought to be rejected.

Mr. Lambton said, he would not enter into the question of informality; he had attended to the wording of the petition, and he certainly could see nothing in it insulting or derogatory to the house. If the hon. member meant to propose that the petition should be rejected on the ground of improper language, he should feel it his duty to divide the house on that point (hear, hear.)

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that expressions were used in this petition which no hon. member could have employed without being called to order. The petitioners said, that the house had long been governed by "selfish principles." This was language which they ought not to hear.

Mr. Tierney said, it appeared to him that the petitioners had used the word "selfish" as intending to convey that the house had entered into a narrow view of the subject, and had not proceeded on general grounds. If the house were to reject such petitions as this, they might as well say at once, that men should never petition for parliamentary reform. Feeling as anxious as any man that the doors of the house should be open to petitions, he must declare his opinion, that there was nothing derogatory to their dignity in the language of this petition. The word "selfish" was the only unhappy word on which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had been able to place his hand. The right hon. gentleman had said, that any member who should use that word, in debate, would be called to order. Now he would use that word on the very first opportunity (a laugh), and he was sure that the right hon. gentleman would not call him to order (hear, hear.) If he thought that the house were biassed by their own interests in passing the corn bill, he could explain himself in no other way than by saying, that they were influenced by "selfish" principles.

The question being put "That the said petition do lie upon the table, the house divided. Ayes, 14—Noes, 43*.

* It may be useful to sum up, as briefly as possible, the several rules that must be observed with respect to petitions.—For the sake of general convenience, the Editor will arrange them under proper titles. Where Hatsell is cited, it is the last edition of his work, in January 1818, with the notes and observations of Mr. Speaker Abbot, now lord Colchester.

I. PETITIONS MAY BE SENT FREE.—Petitions are allowed to be sent free of postage, if in a cover open at both ends, and not exceeding six ounces weight. (54 Geo. III. c. 169.)

II. PETITIONS MUST NOT BE PRINTED.—Petitions must not be printed, neither private nor public. This was determined on the 6th of May, 1793; on the 30th of June, 1813; on the 17th of July 1813; and, finally, on the 3d of March, 1817, when 468 printed petitions were rejected. (These Reports, vol. 1. p. 516.)

III. PETITIONS MUST BE SIGNED.—Petitions must be signed by the party petitioning, with their own hands, by their names or marks, (14th November, 1689,) except in case of inability from sickness: (8th November, 1675.) And, on the 2d of June, 1774, Resolved, that it is highly unwarrantable, and a breach of the privilege of this house, for any person to set the name of any other person to any petition to be presented to this house.—On the 7th of March, 1817, a petition was offered from Horsham, having several false signatures: it was held, nevertheless, that those did not vitiate the good, and the petition was received. (2 Hats. 189.)—There must be some signature on the same sheet or skin as the petition itself. (2 Hats. 189. and these Reports, vol. 1. p. 516.)—The same rule prevails in the house of Lords. (These Reports, pp. 897, 973.)—And, if any thing follows the prayer of a petition, it must be signed. For example: a petitioner refers to authorities, which he sets out in an appendix. he signs the prayer, but does not sign the appendix: the petition will not be received.—The house does not allow an affidavit to be annexed to a petition; in that case, the affidavit is taken off.—One partner cannot sign for himself and his co-partners; the petition must be signed by all the parties.

IV. PETITIONS MAY BE SIGNED BY ANY NUMBER.—See the Speech of Sir S. Romilly, 3d of March, 1818, where he says, "there is no law to prevent the people from coming forward to sign petitions peaceably, however numerous they may be:" (these Reports, p. 706, and the note): and the speech of the Attorney General, 9th of March, 1818, where he animadverts upon "the system of obtaining petitions from twenty persons, and thus splitting a petition that might be signed by five or ten thousand, into so many different petitions, with a view to give a factitious importance to such applications." (These Reports, p. 841.)

V. PETITIONS SIGNED BY A CHAIRMAN.—A petition signed by the chairman of a public meeting on behalf of himself and others, who do not sign, can only be received as the petition of the individual signing. (These Reports, vol. 1. p. 495.)

FORGERY OF BANK OF ENGLAND NOTES.] General Thornton rose, pursuant to notice, to call the attention of the house to the great increase of forgery of bank of England Notes, the

VI. PETITIONS SIGNED BY A SHERIFF.—On the 11th of March, 1817, a petition from freeholders and inhabitants of Kent, signed by the sheriff, on behalf of the meeting, being offered; it was held, that it could only be received and entered as the petition of the sheriff. (2 Hats. 189. and these Reports, vol. 1. 495-6.)

VII. PETITIONS FROM CORPORATE BODIES.—Petitions from corporate bodies, signed in the name of the corporation, and sealed with its seal, are considered as the prayer of the corporation. (These Reports, vol 1. p. 495.)

VIII. PETITIONS FROM LONDON.—A petition from "the Livery of London in Common Hall assembled," must be signed by those individual liverymen who approve of its contents, and must be offered by a Member, like any other petition.—But, by the indulgence of the House, (for it is not of right) petitions from the "Corporation" of London, which are signed by the town-clerk, are presented by the Sheriffs, unless one of them is unable to attend, or is a member. On the 1st of February, 1724, one of the Sheriffs being a member of the House, and the other being ill, the petition from the Corporation was presented by two aldermen and four of the common council. So, on the 5th of March, and the 8th of May, 1770, both the sheriffs being members, the petitions from the corporation were presented by some of the aldermen, and several of the common council. (3 Hats. 237.)—On the 27th of February, 1818, a petition was offered to the House of Lords, purporting to be from the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Livery of London, in common hall assembled: it was signed by the Lord Mayor, two aldermen, and twelve liverymen,—(see these Reports, p. 572: it is there stated, by mistake, twelve common councilmen)—which, it was said, was the number requisite to constitute a common hall of the City of London; the Lord Chancellor said, it could only be received as the petition of those who had signed it, and it was laid on the table merely as coming from them.

IX. PETITIONS MUST BE COUCHED IN PROPER LANGUAGE.—Petitions containing language insulting to the House, are not admitted to lie on the table. On the 31st of January, 1817, when several petitions were presented, praying for "Parliamentary Reform," Mr. Speaker Abbot laid it down as a rule of the House, that "the Member who presents a petition should have previously read it, and then state the substance of its contents; and be prepared to say, that, in his judgment, it is also couched in proper language, and contains nothing intentionally disrespectful."—On the 4th of February, 1817, Mr. W. Smith, on presenting a petition from Norwich for parliamentary reform, insisted that he was not bound to form any opinion upon the subject; and would not make any such assertion, whatever his opinion might be. But the rule was stated to be otherwise; and upon debate, the motion for bringing up the petition was negatived without a division. (2 Hats. 189. 3 Hats. 240. and these Reports, v. 1. pp. 71. 100.)—On the 16th of February, 1818, a petition was offered to the House of Lords, which, on being read, was found to want the word "humble": it began "the petition of," instead of "the humble petition," &c. The Earl of Carnarvon said, he had read the petition, and could assure their lordships it was respectfully worded. The Lord Chancellor said, it was contrary to the practice of that house to receive petitions with the omission which occurred in this case. (These Reports, p. 404.) So, in a former session, where a petition was offered, addressed to "The Upper House of Parliament," instead of "The right honourable the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled," it was not allowed to be read.

X. PETITIONS FOR PUBLIC MONEY.—A petition which states any distress, and prays to be relieved from the charity or munificence of the public, ought not, in point of form, either to prescribe the quantum, or to mention the fund out of which that relief is to be granted. The prayer should be general; and it should be left open to the consideration of the house, what the nature of the relief should be, and to what extent. (3 Hats. 241.)—And, by an order of the 11th of December, 1706, which, on the 11th of June, 1713, was declared to be a standing order, it was resolved, "That this house will receive no petition for any sum of money, relating to public service, but what is recommended from the crown."—This order is founded on the principles of the constitution: for though it is the sole right of the House of Commons to grant the public money, it seems to be only for those services pointed out by the crown; and, upon this ground, the Committee of Supply arises only out of the King's speech; and if that Committee is closed (unless by accident, or unintentionally) it must be in consequence of a speech or message from the king, that it can again be instituted. As soon, therefore, as any petition for public money, is offered to the house, and before it can be received, it is necessary that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, or some other member, authorised by the King, should acquaint the house, "that his Majesty, 'having been informed of the contents' of the said petition, recommends the same to the consideration of the House." (2 Hats. 359, 360.) If the petition is received, it is referred to a Select Committee to ascertain the truth of the facts stated, and when their report is brought up, a committee of the whole House directs such proceeding upon it as may be thought proper. (3 Hats. 216.)—But, it is said that, the standing order above mentioned is not understood to apply to petitions for granting bounties; and, therefore, though the King's recommendation has been given in some instances of this sort, this was unnecessary. (3 Hats. 196.)

XI. PETITIONS FOR COMPOUNDING CROWN DEBTS.—No petition can be received for release or composition of debts to the crown, upon any branch of the revenue, without a certificate from the proper officer annexed, stating the debt, what prosecutions have been instituted for the recovery thereof, and what the petitioner and his security are able to pay. On the 25th of March, 1715, this is declared to be a standing order. —The petition is afterwards considered in a committee of the whole house. (3 Hats. 227, 228.)

XII. PETITIONS AGAINST PUBLIC TAXES.—A petition against a tax bill depending for the service of the current year cannot be received. "This rule was adopted very soon after the revolution, and upon this principle: that, a tax generally extending in its effect over every part of the kingdom, and more or less affecting every individual, and in its nature necessarily and intentionally imposing a burthen upon the people—it can answer no end or purpose whatever for consequence of which was, a general distrust of that species of currency. The number of criminals had so increased, that the Bank had been obliged to compromise the matter, and take any set of petitioners to state these consequences as a grievance to the house. The house of commons, before they come to a resolution which imposes a tax, cannot but know that it may very sensibly affect the commerce or manufacture upon which the duty is laid; but they cannot permit the inconvenience that may possibly be brought upon a particular branch of trade to weigh with them, when put in the balance with those advantages which are intended to result to the whole, and which the public necessities of the state demand from them. For these reasons it has been thought better, and more candid to the persons petitioning, at once to refuse receiving their petition, rather than by receiving it to give countenance to the application, and to mislead the petitioners into an idea, that in consequence of their petition the house of commons would desist from the tax proposed, and impose another, which, though it might be felt less by that branch of trade, might be more oppressive to some other branch." (3 Hats. 233-4.) The house of lords, upon the same principle, have established the same rule of practice. See their journal, of the 3d of May, 1736; and 18th of June, 1783; where petitions offered against bills depending, for imposing taxes for the service of the current year were rejected. (3 Hats. 241.) A petition against the pawnbroker's bill (A.D. 1783,) was received, as being against the regulation of the trade, not against the tax. But it is said, that it would have been much better to have kept these proceedings separate in two distinct bills. In a bill depending for imposing a tax upon Attornies and Solicitors, those gentlemen desired, that, as a tax was to be laid upon them, provision might be made in the same bill for preventing persons, not being solicitors or attornies, and who would not therefore be liable to the tax, from exercising their occupation. This proposal seemed reasonable; but it was thought adviseable not to tack it to this bill of supply, and that it was too late in the session to bring in this provision in a separate bill. (3 Hats. 238-9.) But this rule of not receiving petitions against Bills of Supply does not extend to petitions from the "Corporation" of London, as the forms used, by the indulgence of the house, in the receiving of their petitions, preclude the house from knowing the substance or prayer of them, till they are received and read. The contents are not opened by a member, as is required on the presenting of petitions from any other set of persons; but the petition is brought to the bar by the sheriffs; is, without a question, delivered to the clerk, who brings it to the table; and, when the sheriffs are withdrawn, the Speaker puts the question for reading it. If this is agreed to, the petition is read; and then, and not till then, the house are acquainted with the contents of it, and afterwards dispose of it as they think proper. (3 Hats. 236-7.) A copy, however, of all petitions from the common council is previously sent to the speaker, that he at least may not be taken by surprise. (3 Hats. 231.) On the 1st of May, 1815, a petition of the "Common Hall," complaining 'that his majesty's ministers had proposed the renewal of the property tax, and praying the house to stop the administration in their career,' was brought up, read, and on motion that it do lie upon the table, the question passed in the negative, 107 to 59. (3 Hats. 2?3.) But, petitions which desire the repeal or alteration of taxes imposed in a former session, may be received from any persons. "No public service is delayed by receiving and considering such petitions; nor can the time of the house be employed more properly than in endeavouring to lighten the burthens, which have been necessarily imposed upon the people, by introducing such regulations, in the manner of collecting the taxes, as experience shall point out; or even by repealing taxes, in instances where no regulation can make them fit to be continued." (3 Hats. 235.)

XIII. Petitions against Local Taxes.—A petition against a local tax may be received, and counsel ordered. On the 18th of March, 1725, a committee, to whom the petition of Mr. Campbell had been referred, complaining of great losses which he had suffered by a riot at Glasgow, reported a state of the facts, and their opinion that satisfaction ought to be made to him. This report was referred to a committee of supply; who, on the 16th of April, reported, "that the sum of 6,080*l.* ought to be allowed to him:" and on the 27th of April, a tax was reported from the committee of Ways and Means, to be laid upon the city of Glasgow, for raising the sum granted to Mr. Campbell. A bill being ordered in, and depending, for imposing a tax for raising this sum; on the 5th of May, 1726, the corporation of Glasgow presented a petition against the application of this tax; which petition was referred to the committee upon the bill, with an instruction to hear the petitioners by their counsel, if they thought fit. This proceeding was regular, and no ways contradictory to the rule mentioned above, as the tax to be imposed was for a local purpose, and in no part for the general service of the year. (3 Hats. 188.)

XIV. Petitions against apprehended Proceedings.—On the 18th of February, 1817, the report of a Secret Committee of the House of Lords was read, laid upon their lordships' table, ordered to be printed, and to be taken into consideration on Friday, the 21st instant.—At the sitting of the house on that day, and before any other business had commenced, a petition was offered from the Secretary of the London Union Society, representing, that he had read in the report then upon the table, that the London Union Society was connected with other societies, whose object was conspiracy, revolution, and treason; whereas (he stated) that Society never was affiliated to any society, or any body of men whatsoever; that it had not even met for nearly three years and a half last past, and, of course, that it was not now in existence. He therefore prayed the right hon. house to pause, and to hear further evidence, before it proceeded to adopt legislative measures upon the report. The Lord Chancellor, and other noble lords, contended, that this petition ought not to be received: it inferred that certain measures were to be adopted, of which the petitioner could know nothing. on comparing the statements of the petition and the prayer, it appeared that his inducement to come forward, was a desire that he might be heard, in order to prevent the adoption of measures similar to those of 1795, which he conceived the legislature had in view. Whether such measures were to be proposed or not it was impossible for him to know, and to what a state would their lordships be reduced, were they to permit individuals to come forward with petitions, not merely against measures before the house, but against measures which the petitioners apprehended might be introduced? Every individual in the country who apprehended that any measure affecting him-convictions on minor charges, to avoid the frequency of executions. It was shocking that this state of things should continue, without an attempt at a remedy, by increasing the obstacles in the way of forgeries. In 1797, a note was submitted to the Bank by Mr. Tilloch, which the great engravers of that day (Bartolozzi, Heath, and others,) considered as inimitable. Mr. Terry, the engraver of the Bank, produced what he conceived to be an imitation of it, but those artists declared that his imitation was so bad, that no person could be deceived by it. A reason should be given why this or some other plan had not been adopted. The expense had been mentioned, but no probable expense could over-balance the injury done to morals, besides the injury to property. The expense of prosecutions, when it was exhibited, would shew that this species of economy was misapplied. He trusted, therefore, that a committee would be moved for by some of the Bank directors, to know whether every thing had been done which was possible; if they did not perform this duty, he hoped that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would, especially after the notice he had given for a renewal of the bank restriction act. With the view of bringing the matter more fully before the house, he should move, "That there be laid before this house an account of the total nominal value of bank of England notes presented at the bank of England and refused payment on account of their being forged, for the last six years, to the latest period to which the same can be made up; specifying the total nominal value so presented and refused payment in each year respectively."

Mr. Grenfell said, he did not mean to oppose the motion, but he begged to suggest, that it might be proper to withdraw it for the present, as his hon. and learned friend, the member for Nairnshire (sir J. Mackintosh) had given notice of a motion which stood for Tuesday, and which embraced the same object.

General Thornton said, he was not aware that the motion for Tuesday would embrace the object which he had in view; but as the hon. member had stated that it would embrace that object, he would, with the leave of the House, withdraw his motion.

The motion was accordingly withdrawn.

CUSTOMS CONSOLIDATION BILL.] Mr. Lushington brought in a bill "to repeal the several duties of Customs chargeable in Great Britain, and to grant other duties in lieu thereof."—It was read a first time.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Thursday, April 9.

LONGITUDE AND NORTHERN PASSAGE BILL.] This bill was read a third time, and passed. It was in these words. "Whereas by an act passed in the twelfth year of her late Majesty Queen Anne, intituled An act for providing a public reward for such person or persons as shall discover the longitude at sea, it was enacted, that persons holding certain public offices therein stated, for the time being, and certain other persons therein mentioned by name, should be commissioners for the discovery of the longitude at sea, and for examining, trying, and judging of all proposals, experiments, and improvements relating to the same: and whereas another act was passed in the twenty-sixth year of the reign of his late Majesty King George the second, for rendering more effectual the last-recited act; and whereas by another act passed in the thirtieth year of the reign of his present Majesty, intituled An act for continuing the encouragement and reward of persons self, or the public in general, might at some time or another be introduced into that house, would have the right of appearing at the bar with his petition. On the other side it was moved, that the debate should be adjourned for a week, in order that the matter might be referred to a committee of privileges, with instructions to search for precedents, and to report whether there was any instance of a petition similar to the present being rejected. On this motion the house divided: Contents 18—Not Contents 64. So the petition was rejected. After this debate was ended, lord Sidmouth introduced a bill for suspending the habeas corpus act, which was read a first time. At the next sitting of the house (Monday, Feb. 24.) another petition was offered from the Secretary of the London Union Society, which, after stating that that Society was founded in 1812, that it never had any one branch, &c. and had ceased to exist, (as in the former petition,) concluded as follows: "That your petitioner has been informed, that a bill for the suspension of the habeas corpus is now before the house, and therefore your petitioner humbly prays, that your lordships will be pleased in your great tenderness for the liberties of his majesty's faithful subjects, to permit your petitioner to produce all the books and papers of the London Union Society at the bar of your right hon. house, where your petitioner confidently assures your lordships, that he is ready to prove all and singular the allegations contained in this his most humble petition." This petition was received, and laid upon the table. (See these Reports, vol. i. pp. 189, 213, 239.)

The Editor has now stated all the rules which occur to his memory as necessary to be observed in the framing and presenting of petitions; and if those rules were more generally known and attended to, it would prevent much inconvenience to the public, as well as great loss of time to parliament.—It may just be added, that any number of petitions may be offered at once. On the 3d of March, 1817, Sir F. Burdett offered 500 petitions for a Reform of Parliament.—In the commons, petitions, on being received, are frequently ordered to be printed; but the practice is otherwise in the lords. On the 12th of May, 1817, a petition was offered by earl Fitzwilliam in support of the Catholic claims: lord Kenyon moved that it be printed: the lord chancellor said, there was no instance, he believed, in which that house had ordered a petition to be printed. Lord Kenyon then withdrew his motion. (These Reports, vol. i. p. 1003.)

making certain discoveries for finding the longitude at sea, or making other useful discoveries and improvements in navigation, and for making experiments relating thereto, and for adding a commissioner to execute the several acts for the discovery of the longitude at sea, persons holding certain other offices, therein enumerated, for the time being, were added to and joined with the commissioners appointed by the said first-mentioned act: and whereas all the persons mentioned by name in the said first recited act are long since deceased: and whereas by reason of the residence at the universities of certain professors who are constituted members of the board of commissioners aforesaid, and by there not being a power of electing into the said board any persons but the said official commissioners and the said professors, it often happens that there are no persons, particularly versed in the sciences of the mathematics and astronomy, resident in London, and belonging to the said board; and that divers persons of great skill and ability, whose services would be most beneficial to the objects of the said board, are by the said constitution of the board excluded therefrom: be it therefore enacted by the King's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that the said recited acts shall be and the same are hereby repealed.

II. And be it further enacted, that from and after the passing of this act, the lord high treasurer of the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or the first commissioner for executing the said office, the lord high admiral or first commissioner for executing the office of lord high admiral of the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and such other commissioners for executing the office of lord high admiral of the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland as may be flag officers in his Majesty's fleet, the speaker of the house of commons, the president of the committee of council for trade and plantations, the governor of the royal hospital for seamen at Greenwich, the judge of the high court of admiralty, the secretaries of the treasury, the secretaries of the admiralty, the comptroller of the navy, the president and three fellows of the royal society, the royal astronomer at Greenwich, the Savilian, Lucasian, Plumian, and Lowndian professors of the mathematics and astronomy at the universities of Oxford and Cambridge, the observer at the Radcliffe observatory at Oxford, all now and for the time being, and three other persons well versed in the sciences of mathematics, astronomy, or navigation, to be annually selected, chosen, and named, as hereinafter provided, shall be commissioners for discovering the longitude at sea, and for examining, trying, and judging all proposals, experiments, and improvements relating to the same, and for rewarding persons making useful discoveries and improvements in or connected with navigation.

III. And be it further enacted, that the three members of the royal society, so to be commissioners, shall be the right honourable Charles lord Colchester, Davies Gilbert esquire, and colonel William Mudge; and that in the event of any vacancy by death, resignation, or refusal to act, of any of the said three persons, or of any person hereafter chosen to succeed them, such vacancy shall be filled up by the choice and election of the president and council of the royal society; and that the said three other commissioners shall be doctor William Hyde Wollaston, and doctor Thomas Young, and captain Henry Kater, who shall continue commissioners until the first day of January one thousand eight hundred and twenty, after which time the three persons to be the said last-mentioned commissioners shall be annually, or as often as a vacancy by death, resignation, or refusal to act, may occur, selected, chosen, and named by the lord high admiral, or commissioners for executing the office of lord high admiral, and shall be persons well versed in the sciences of the mathematics, astronomy, or navigation, and shall be generally resident in or near the city of London, and capable of attending at the board of commissioners, and of assisting in the objects herein intrusted to the said board.

IV. And whereas by the said recited acts, and by divers other acts passed from time to time, and all founded upon and referring to the said first-recited act, divers duties and authorities were imposed and conferred upon the commissioners constituted by the said recited acts, and divers sums of money for various purposes, and under different conditions, were from time to time granted and provided to be employed and expended towards the discovery of the longitude at sea, and for divers purposes in such acts mentioned, and for rewards to such persons as should ascertain the longitude within certain limits and conditions therein specified; and for enabling the said commissioners to cause a survey to be made of the shores of Great Britain and Ireland, and ascertaining the latitude and longitude of the capes, promontories, and headlands thereof: and whereas some of the provisions of the said acts have been repealed, and others thereof have expired; and it is expedient wholly to repeal the same, for the purpose of re-enacting and conferring upon the new commissioners such of the powers, authorities, and duties at present vested in the old commissioners, as are fit to be continued in force: be it therefore enacted, that all and every act, conferring any duty, authority, or power on the commissioners constituted by the said first-recited acts, shall be and are hereby repealed.

V. And whereas the longitude hath been ascertained within certain of the limits and conditions specified in the said acts: and whereas certain other of the limits and conditions still subsisting are considered as impracticable, and have never been tried: and whereas it may conduce to the advancement of science, and to the honour and interests of this country, that fit and proportionate rewards should be provided for persons who shall ascertain the longitude within certain new limits and conditions: and whereas it is expedient that such limits and conditions should not be immutably fixed by act of parliament, but should be regulated on scientific principles by the said commissioners for the discovery of the longitude, and should be varied from time to time according to the progress of discoveries and the advancement of science: be it enacted, that the said last-mentioned commissioners shall from time to time, as they may see proper, propose, by their memorial to his Majesty in council, to direct and establish three scales of proportionate rewards to be paid to any person or persons who shall, by any principle not already made public, ascertain the longitude within three corresponding scales of limit and condition, such rewards not exceeding the respective sums of five thousand pounds, seven thousand five hundred pounds, and ten thousand pounds; and if his Majesty in council shall be pleased to sanction and approve such proposal, then that the same shall be published in the London Gazette, and that the said commissioners shall have full power and authority to inquire into and examine all proposals which may be made for finding the longitude; and if on reasonable experiment, to be judged of and certified by the said commissioners, it shall be found that the longitude hath been ascertained within any of the said three scales of limit and condition, agreeably to the said order in council, it shall be lawful to them to pay or cause to be paid the proportionate reward assigned to the scale within which such discovery or experiment shall have ascertained the longitude.

VI. And whereas it is expedient that the said commissioners should be enabled to expend certain sums towards making experiments of instruments, modes, or proposals, and for making and publishing observations, calculations, and tables for ascertaining the longitude, or towards improving or correcting such as may have been already made, or for other purposes useful to navigation; be it enacted, that they may pay or expend any sum or sums of money, not exceeding one thousand pounds in any one year, towards the making, correcting, or publishing any such experiments, modes, observations, calculations, or tables.

VII. And whereas it is expedient that the said commissioners should be enabled to cause to be ascertained, as accurately as may be, the latitude and longitude of places whereof the exact situation hath not been already sufficiently ascertained; be it enacted, that they may expend or cause to be expended any sum not exceeding in the whole one thousand pounds in any one year for such purpose.

VIII. And whereas it may happen that proposals, inventions, and tables, or corrections and amendments of former proposals, inventions, or tables, ingenious in themselves and useful to science, and which may deserve encouragement, though they do not come within the limits and conditions specified for the before-mentioned rewards, may be made to the said commissioners; and it is expedient that they should be enabled to bestow such moderate rewards upon the person or persons who may have made such proposal, invention, or correction; be it therefore enacted, that the said commissioners may pay or cause to be paid such sum not exceeding five hundred pounds to any one person for any one proposal or invention, or two thousand pounds in one year, as they may consider the said proposals, inventions, tables, or corrections to deserve.

IX. And whereas by an act passed in the eighteenth year of his late Majesty King George the Second, intituled An act for giving a public reward to such person or persons, being his Majesty's subject or subjects, as shall discover a north-west passage through Hudson's streights to the western and southern oceans of America, a sum of twenty thousand pounds was provided for the owner or owners of any ship or vessel which should first find out and sail through such passage; and the persons holding certain offices therein named, for the time being, were appointed commissioners for the said discovery: and whereas by an act passed in the sixteenth year of the reign of his present Majesty, intituled An act for giving a public reward to such person or persons, being his Majesty's subject or subjects, as shall discover a northern passage for vessels by sea between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, and also unto such as shall first approach by sea within one degree of the northern pole; the reward in the last-recited act was extended to the commander or commanders, officers and seamen, of any of his Majesty's ships or vessels, and to the owner or owners of any private ship or vessel which should find out and sail through any passage by sea between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, in any direction or parallel of the northern hemisphere to the north of the fifty-second degree of north latitude; and further assigning a reward of five thousand pounds to the commander or commanders, officers and seamen, of any of his Majesty's ships or vessels, or the owner or owners of any private ship or vessel which should first approach within one degree of the northern pole; and appointing the commissioners of the longitude to be commissioners for executing this last-recited act: and whereas many advantages, both to commerce and science, may be expected from granting such proportionate rewards as well to such person or persons as may accomplish the objects of the said two last-mentioned acts, as to such other person or persons as may approach thereto within certain limits or conditions: and whereas it is expedient that the regulation of such limits and conditions, and the decision, whether and how far such object may have been accomplished, should be confided to the commissioners for the discovery of the longitude at sea appointed by this act; be it therefore enacted, that the said two last-recited acts shall be and they are hereby repealed.

X. And be it further enacted, that if any ship or ships, vessel or vessels, belonging to any of his Majesty's subjects, or to his Majesty, shall first find out and sail through any passage by sea, between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, in any direction or parallel of the northern hemisphere, the owner or owners of such ship or ships, vessel or vessels, if belonging to any of his Majesty's subjects, or the commander or commanders, officers, seamen, and marines of such ships or vessels, if belonging to his Majesty, so first finding out and sailing through such passage, shall receive a reward for such discovery, of the sum of twenty thousand pounds.

XI. And whereas ships employed both in the Spitzbergen seas and in Davis's streights may have opportunities of approaching the north pole: and whereas approaches towards the northern pole may tend greatly to the discovery of a communication between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, as well as may be attended with many advantages to commerce and science; be it therefore enacted, that if any ship or ships, vessel or vessels, shall approach within one degree of the northern pole, the owner of such ship or vessel, ships or vessels, if belonging to any of his Majesty's subjects, or the commander or commanders, officers, seamen, and marines, of any ship or ships, vessel or vessels, if belonging to his Majesty, so first approaching within one degree of the northern pole, shall be entitled to receive a reward of five thousand pounds.

XII. And for the encouragement of persons who may attempt the said passage, or approach to the northern pole, but not wholly accomplish the same; be it enacted, that the said commissioners for discovering the longitude at sea may, by their memorial, propose to his Majesty in Council to direct and establish proportionate rewards, to be paid to such person as aforesaid, who shall first have accomplished certain proportions of the said passage or approach; and if his Majesty in council shall be pleased to sanction and approve the said proposal, then, that the same shall be published in the London Gazette; and any person or persons accomplishing such passages, or the specified proportions of them, shall be entitled, on the award of the said commissioners, to receive such total or proportionate sums as may have been offered for the object which he or they may have then accomplished.

XIII. And, in order to ascertain who are the first discoverers of the said northern passage into the Pacific ocean, and who are the first approachers to within one degree of the northern pole, and to whom either the whole rewards or the proportionate rewards by this act respectively given do belong; be it further enacted, that the commissioners for the discovery of the longitude by sea, be authorized and empowered to call for the respective journal or journals, book or books, and papers, kept on board the respective ship or ships, vessel or vessels, of the claimant or claimants respectively; and also to examine upon oath all such persons as they, the said commissioners, shall think proper, with regard to any claim or claims, as well any person or persons produced by the respective claimant or claimants, or any other person or persons who may seem capable of giving any information; which oath the said commissioners are hereby empowered and required to administer; and the said commissioners being fully satisfied, upon such examination and proof, that such northern passage is effectually discovered and sailed through, or that such approach within one degree of the northern pole, or any specified proportion of the said passage or approach, shall have been made and accomplished, they are hereby authorized to pay, or cause to be paid, the said rewards, or such proportion of them as the claimant or claimants may under this act, or under such order in council, be entitled to receive.

XIV. Provided always, and be it further enacted, that if the said rewards, or either of them, shall be claimed by and adjudged to the commander or commanders, officers, seamen, and marines of any ship or ships, vessel or vessels, belonging to his Majesty, the same shall be disposed in favour of and distributed among such commander or commanders, officers, seamen, and marines, in such proportions as shall be directed by his Majesty in council, and in no other manner.

XV. And be it further enacted, that the executors, administrators, and assigns of any person or persons to whom any sum whatsoever shall be awarded by the commissioners for the discovery of the longitude, shall be entitled to receive the same, in the event of the death of such person or persons.

XVI. And whereas the publication of the nautical almanack, constructed by proper persons, under the directions of the said commissioners for the discovery of the longitude at sea, is of great importance to the safety of ships and persons, and highly conducive to the general interests of commerce and navigation; be it therefore enacted, that it shall and may be lawful to and for the said commissioners to cause such nautical almanacks, or other useful tables, to be constructed, and to print, publish, and vend, or cause to be printed, published, and vended, any nautical almanack or almanacks, or other useful table or tables, which they shall from time to time judge necessary and useful, in order to facilitate the method of discovering the longitude at sea; any law, statute, exclusive privilege, private charter, or other custom, to the contrary thereof notwithstanding.

XVII. And be it enacted, that no person or persons shall print, publish, or vend, or cause to be printed, published, or vended, any nautical almanack or almanacks, or other table or tables, constructed under the direction of the said commissioners, without being first licensed by the said commissioners; and if any person or persons not so licensed, or not being authorized by the person or persons so licensed by the said commissioners, shall print, publish, or vend, or cause to be printed, published, or vended, any such almanack or almanacks, or other table or tables, every such person or persons shall, for every copy of such nautical almanack or table so printed, published, or vended, forfeit and pay the sum of twenty pounds, to be recovered by action of debt, bill, plaint, or information, in any of his Majesty's courts of record at Westminster; and that one moiety of such penalty and forfeiture shall be to his Majesty, his heirs and successors, and the other moiety to him or them that shall prosecute, inform, and sue for the same.

XVIII. And be it further enacted, that the said penalty or forfeiture, shall be sued, informed, and prosecuted for by the secretary of the said commissioners of the longitude for the time being, or by some other person or persons authorized by the said commissioners, and shall not be sued, informed, or prosecuted for by any other person or persons whomsoever: and that such suits, prosecutions, and informations shall not abate by reason of the death of such prosecutors, or any of them, but shall be continued in the case of a sole plaintiff or informer dying before judgment obtained, in the name of the secretary of the said commissioners for the time being.

XIX. And be it further enacted, that no such nautical almanack or almanacks so published, under the directions of the said commissioners, shall be subject or liable to any stamp duty whatsoever.

XX. And be it further enacted, that there shall be annually paid to each of the three last-named commissioners and their successors, to be annually named according to the provisions of this act, such annual sum as his Majesty, by any order in council, shall be pleased to direct.

XXI. And whereas it is necessary to continue the appointment of a secretary to the board of commissioners for discovering the longitude: and whereas it is highly expedient to the interest of navigation, and the honour of this country, that the said nautical almanack should be accurately computed, compared, and published, and that the method of finding the longitude by timekeepers should also be encouraged, and that the timekeepers belonging to his Majesty, for the use of his ships of war, should be carefully examined and regulated; be it further enacted, that some person of competent skill and ability shall be nominated and appointed by the lord high admiral or commissioners of the admiralty to be secretary to the said board of commissioners, and for superintending, under the directions of the board in general, and the astronomer royal in particular, the due and correct publication of the nautical almanack, and for taking care of and regulating such timekeepers as may be intrusted to his care, by the lord high admiral or commissioners of the admiralty.

XXII. And be it further enacted, that the said secretary shall hold his said office during the pleasure of the lord high admiral or commissioners of the admiralty; and for his trouble and pains therein, he shall receive such annual salary as his Majesty, by any order in council, may please to direct; but if it shall so happen that a person shall not be found competent to execute the three several duties of secretary to the said board, and of superintending the publication of the nautical almanack, and the care and regulation of timekeepers, it shall be lawful to the said commissioners to propose to his Majesty in council to divide the said duties, and assign them to several persons, and to apportion to each person such part of the salary established for the performance of the united duties, as may seem to them fit and proportionate to the several duty or duties to be performed by such person.

XXIII. And be it further enacted, that the said salaries to the three annual commissioners, and the said secretary or persons performing the last-mentioned duties, shall be annually placed on the ordinary estimate of the navy.

XXIV. And be it further enacted, that no receipt of any salary or reward under this act, shall prevent any officer entitled to any military or naval half-pay, from receiving such half-pay in addition to any such salary or reward.

XXV. And be it further enacted, that the commissioners for discovering the longitude at sea, shall, at the beginning of every year, make an estimate of the sum or sums which they shall deem to be necessary for executing the purposes of this act, in such year, which estimate shall be transmitted to the secretary of the admiralty, and, on being approved or amended by the lord high admiral or commissioners of the admiralty, shall be placed on the ordinary estimate of the navy.

XXVI. And be it further enacted, that any sum or sums of money to be paid under the authority of this act, shall be paid, upon certificates under the hands and seals of the commissioners for the discovery of the longitude at sea, to the commissioners of the navy for the time being; and the commissioners of the navy shall forthwith make out a bill or bills for the sum or sums contained in such certificate or certificates, payable by the treasurer of the navy, and such sum or sums of money the said treasurer of the navy is hereby required to pay immediately to the person or persons mentioned in the said certificate or certificates, out of any money which shall be in his hands unapplied for the use of the navy: provided always, that all such sums of money as shall exceed the sum of five thousand pounds, shall be certified under the hands and seals of two-thirds, at least, of the said commissioners, and all such sums as shall exceed the sum of one thousand pounds, shall be certified under the hands and seals of the major part of them, and that all such sums as shall not exceed one thousand pounds, shall be certified under the hands and seals of any five or more of them; such certificates being in every case whatsoever signed by one, at least, of the following commissioners: that is to say, the Lord High Treasurer of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or the First Commissioner of the Treasury, the Lord High Admiral of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or First Commissioner of the Admiralty, the Secretaries of the Treasury, and the Secretaries of the Admiralty.

XXVII. And be it further enacted, that in any other respects where any power or authority is vested in the commissioners under this act, the same may be exercised by any five or more commissioners at the board assembled, in as full and ample a manner, as if the whole commissioners were then and there present; provided always, that at every such board one of the following commissioners, at the least, shall be present; that is to say, the first or one other of the commissioners, or one of the secretaries of the admiralty; and that also three other of the following commissioners, at the least, shall be present, that is to say, the president of the Royal Society, the Astronomer Royal, the Professors and Observer at the two Universities, and the three commissioners annually elected and receiving salaries as aforesaid.

XXVIII. And be it further enacted, that there shall be held at least four stated meetings of the said commissioners within every year, to be held on such days as his Majesty, by any order in council, may appoint, and such other meetings as from time to time may be necessary; of all which meetings due notice shall be given to the said commissioners respectively."

LEATHER TAX.] Lord Somers presented petitions from Canterbury and Bromley, against this tax.

Lord Holland said, he had come down to the house on Monday for the purpose of presenting some petitions, but happened to be a few minutes too late. They were against the additional duty on leather, which he considered a most oppressive and impolitic tax. Notwithstanding the decision which had been come to in another place, he considered it his duty to lay the petitions on the table, in order that their lordships' attention might be turned to the subject, and that those who asserted that the continuance of such burthens was indispensable to meet the expenditure of the country, should consider themselves called upon to shew, that various objects of that expenditure, which far exceeded this tax, were necessary; among these objects were certain monuments, and also churches, for which a very large sum had recently been voted. There was likewise the establishment at Windsor, which occasioned an expenditure nearly of the same amount as the produce of this leather tax; that was an establishment which could be of no utility, afforded no comfort to any one, and was not very creditable to those who persisted in maintaining it. Nothing had yet been said to convince their lordships or the country of the necessity of that expenditure, which formed the apology of the present intolerable taxation. His lordship concluded by presenting a petition from the tanners of the city of York against the tax. He afterwards presented petitions to the same effect from Nottingham and King's Lynn.—Ordered to lie on the table.

MARRIAGE OF THE PRINCESS ELIZABETH.]—The Earl of Liverpool rose to propose an address of congratulation to his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, on the subject of the marriage of his royal sister, the Princess Elizabeth. He also intended to move congratulations on the same event to her Majesty the Queen, to the Princess Elizabeth, and to the Prince of Hesse Hombourg. It could not be necessary for him to take up the time of the house in introducing these motions with any lengthened observations, as it was not possible to conceive that they would meet with opposition from any quarter. With reference to the event itself he should only say, that it certainly must be a proper subject of congratulation, that a union had taken place with a prince of a most illustrious family, high military reputation, and who had displayed great talents in the course of the long war in which he had been engaged. The noble earl concluded by moving an address to the Prince Regent, which he followed with motions for messages of congratulation to the Queen, the Princess Elizabeth, and the hereditary Prince of Hesse Hombourg.

The motions were agreed to nem. diss.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, April 9.

COPYRIGHT BILL.] Sir E. Brydges presented a petition from the Rev. John Valpy, M.A. of Pembroke College, Oxford, in favour of this bill.

Mr. W. Dundas was desirous that the house should not suffer itself to be run away with by the general and strong feeling that appeared to exist on this subject. The fact was, that the expense of these eleven copies to the publisher was merely that of the paper—an expense which, if the whole edition were sold, he was well able to afford; and if the whole edition were not sold, then the eleven copies would be as well in the libraries of the various public institutions as on the shelves of the booksellers' shops.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed. It set forth, "That the petitioner has been induced by the great scarcity of most of the Delphin classics to undertake to print and publish a complete edition of this valuable work from the best Paris copies, with maps and wood-cuts executed in the improved style of modern art, and also with notes from the best variorum editions, with the various readings of each classic, and with the most careful indices; that the impracticability of procuring complete sets of the Delphin Classics, the high reputation they enjoy, and the avidity with which they are sought after, are circumstances well known, and which the petitioner trusted would procure for his undertaking the countenance of all by whom classical learning is justly appreciated; but he requests the permission of the house to state, that this work will consist of 120 or 130 parts, each part containing 672 very closely printed pages, and published at 1*l*. 1*s*. each to non-subscribers, and from this statement of its extent, the very heavy expenses and labour which the petitioner must risk, and the chance of loss which he must incur in attempting so large a publication, will, he conceives, so obviously appear, that it will be unnecessary for him to detail them; the delivery of eleven copies of this work to the eleven libraries mentioned in the act passed in the 54th year of his majesty's reign, will take away from the petitioner's profits or receipts no less a sum than 1500*l*. so that instead of a work of this important nature receiving the support and patronage of those seats of learning which are most interested to encourage publications of this sort, the petitioner will have to pay to them this heavy amount, an evil which, if the subscription should not be equal to the petitioner's remuneration, will tend to discourage his undertaking, and will certainly, if this burthen be continued, disincline him from attempting other national works which he would be otherwise desirous to publish; the petitioner begs leave also to state an instance of the grievance of that part of the said act which requires the copy for the British Museum to be on the best paper on which any shall be printed; the petitioner, before this act passed, had purposed to have printed three copies of Stephens's Greek Thesaurus on vellum paper at 300 guineas each, a specimen of that elegant printing in which the most civilized nations are striving to excel each other; but as this act would have compelled him to have given up one of these to the British Museum, he was compelled to relinquish his design; the petitioner submits that the continuance of this enactment will materially diminish the practice of printing fine paper copies, to the injury of the national reputation, and of the printing profession, without any real benefit to the British Museum; the petitioner therefore humbly prays that the said delivery of copies to the said eleven libraries may be modified as to the wisdom of the house shall seem most fitting, and especially by requiring the said libraries to pay an adequate part of the price for the books which they shall chuse to demand, or that the house will grant such other relief as it shall deem most expedient."

Mr. Wynn presented the following petition of "the booksellers and publishers of London and Westminster," which was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed. "That by an act passed in the 54th year of his present majesty, to amend the several acts for the encouragement of learning, by securing the copies and copyright of printed books to the authors of such books or their assigns, it was enacted amongst other things that eleven copies of the whole of every book and of every volume thereof upon the paper upon which the largest number or impression of such book should be printed for sale, together with all maps and prints belonging thereto, which from and after the passing of the said act should be printed and published, on demand thereof being made in writing to, or left at the place of abode of the publisher or publishers thereof, at any time within twelve months next after the publication thereof, under the hand of the warehousekeeper of the company of stationers, or the librarian, or other person thereto authorized by the persons or body politic and corporate, proprietors or managers of the libraries following, videlicet. the British Museum, Sion College, the Bodleian Library at Oxford, the public library at Cambridge, the library of the faculty of advocates at Edinburgh, the libraries of the four universities of Scotland, Trinity College library, and the King's Inns library at Dublin, or so much of such eleven copies as should be respectively demanded on behalf of such libraries respectively, should be delivered by the publisher or publishers thereof respectively, within one month after demand made thereof in writing, as aforesaid, to the warehousekeeper of the said company of stationers for the time being; that the petitioners hoped and expected that the librarians, or other persons authorized by the proprietors or managers of the said eleven libraries, would have demanded the copies of such books only as would be of real and lasting utility in such libraries, and that a selection would have been made from the general mass of publications for that purpose; but the petitioners respectfully state that every book published and entered at Stationers' Hall has been demanded for the said libraries without any discrimination or selection, excepting that for two of them, namely, the Advocates' library in Edinburgh and Trinity College in Dublin, no music or novels are claimed, but for all the others both music and novels have been demanded; that, in the bill brought into the house on which the said act was framed, the said delivery of books was limited to those which should be first published after the passing of the said act, but, in the ultimate wording of the said act, as it now stands, the petitioners have become liable to a delivery of all reprints of books published before the passing of the said act, although the same may not contain any addition or alteration, and although a former edition of such books may be already in the possession of these libraries; and from the system of indiscriminate demand adopted by the said libraries, all such re-prints are so demanded, which operates to discourage the re-printing of former publications; the petitioners respectfully submit, that it cannot answer any object of instruction or improvement, that every book which shall be published, whatever may be its subject, its tendency, or its merits, should be demanded for the use of the said libraries, as, from this indiscriminate demand, a great number of books are taken from the petitioners which can only become waste, and they are thereby heavily burthened without any adequate advantage to the said libraries, while no instance has occurred in which any books demanded and delivered have been returned to the petitioners when they were found not to be necessary or useful to such libraries; and they humbly beg permission to infer, that it could not be the intention of the legislature that they should be burthened by the delivery of books which are not only not useful, but which are actually detrimental, or an incumbrance to the libraries themselves; the petitioners do not wish to deprive the said libraries of the beneficial enjoyment of their right under the said act, so far as the real objects of their respective institutions are thereby promoted, and so far as such right could be exercised with such modifications as will preserve the petitioners from unnecessary grievance; but the petitioners feel, that nine tenths of the publications daily issuing from the press, are neither necessary nor advantageous to all those libraries, and yet the delivery heavily burthens the petitioners, and that they are all aggrieved thereby, but on some, from the expense and risk of their publications, it falls with peculiar severity; the grievance under which the petitioners labour, and from which they humbly pray the house to afford them some relief, is not, as has been asserted, of a trifling nature; if it were so, they would not complain, but daily experience makes them feel more heavily the burthen, and convinces them that its effects will be seriously injurious to literature in general; they therefore respectfully hope for some legislative regulation which may induce the managers of these libraries to make a selection of the books which they may demand, so that the petitioners may have to deliver those only which are likely to be of real and permanent utility; and they humbly conceive, that to require the libraries to pay some part of the price of each book they may demand, will induce them to make such a selection as will be most beneficial to themselves, and will lessen the burthen to the petitioners; that they forbear to state in detail the heavy grievances which these demands and deliveries have occasioned to them individually, because they hope that some regulation to the effect above-mentioned will produce a material relief, and because they are informed that a bill is now before the house with this object in view; they therefore most humbly pray that the house will, in its wisdom, be pleased to grant them some relief as to the demand and delivery of the eleven copies of books for the libraries above mentioned, by enacting, in the bill now before the house, some regulations which will make it expedient that these libraries should only demand such books as it will be proper and useful that they should possess, either by requiring some part of the selling price thereof to be paid at the time of demand, or by such other provisions as to the house shall seem meet."

Mr. John Smith presented the following petition of several artists and engravers, which was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed. "That the petitioners having now had nearly four years' experience of the effects of that part of the act of the 54th of his present Majesty, which enjoins the delivery of eleven copies of all publications to the libraries therein mentioned, and having observed the impression which it hath made and is daily making on the authors and publishers of books, and perceiving that it is operating materially to the disadvantage of the arts and artists of Great Britain and Ireland, beg the permission of the house to express their earnest hopes that the said enacted delivery will be either removed, or so modified as to be less injurious to those whom it has always been the liberal policy of all civilized nations to encourage and support; the petitioners find it impossible to publish, to the satisfaction of those who are desirous to become the purchasers of works of art, any books consisting of plates, whether of antiquities, curiosities, scenery, costumes, or otherwise, without some small quantity of letter-press, containing some description or account of the objects represented: yet, on the necessary addition of this letter-press, the said libraries make their demand for the said eleven copies, and the petitioners are informed that the addition of this descriptive letter-press subjects them, under the words of the said act, to this burthensome delivery; the petitioners beg to state that the demand of these eleven copies of works so circumstanced is operating greatly to their prejudice, and of the arts in general; it deters artists from undertaking such works, and it lessens the produce of their skill and labour to those who, notwithstanding this grievance, have the courage to risk them; but the petitioners humbly submit that the profit of such works is sufficiently uncertain already to make this delivery a great evil, and the expenses of many of them are so very heavy that the addition of this delivery is but an addition of actual loss in many cases, where the encouragement of the public has not equalled the disbursements; the finer parts of engravings are injured by every impression that is taken beyond a certain number, and the said libraries, by making an immediate demand, take from the petitioners their most valuable impressions; therefore, fully convinced that the fine arts in the united kingdom will be greatly injured by the continuance of this demand and delivery, and believing that the prosperity of every nation increases where arts are most cherished and protected, the petitioners most respectfully solicit the attention of the house to this important subject, and that it will be pleased in its wisdom to free the arts from this growing evil, or, if that cannot be wholly done, to enact that the said libraries shall pay a reasonable proportion of the price of all works which they shall demand, or that the house will be pleased to grant such other relief or modification as to its equity and judgment shall seem most meet."

COTTON FACTORIES BILL.] Mr. Finlay presented the following petition of the directors of the Chamber of Commerce and Manufactures, established by royal charter, in the city of Glasgow. "That a bill has been introduced into the house, which proposes to restrict the hours of labour of all persons employed in cotton mills under sixteen years of age; that any legislative interference to control the employment of labour, the petitioners beg leave humbly to represent, is contrary to the established principles of political science, and must tend to paralyse industry, to increase poverty, and to injure the manufacturing and commercial prosperity of the country; that there appears to be no ground laid for such interference with the conduct of this manufacture in particular, as the number of persons under sixteen years of age employed in cotton mills bears no proportion to the number under that age employed in other branches of manufacture, and as their hours of labour are not more than those which every description of mechanics working in their own houses or shops usually impose upon themselves; that to abridge the hours of labour of these persons will necessarily have the effect to restrict the industry of all the other workers in the mill, and consequently to limit the use of the machinery, in the erection of which a great capital has been embarked; that at a time when every effort is making to establish a competition in this trade on the continent of Europe, it is peculiarly inexpedient to introduce new and hazardous experiments, which must assist the rivalship of foreign countries; that to tamper thus with a branch of industry from which so great a proportion of the income of the country is derived, and the unprecedented growth and prosperity of which prove the soundness of the principles upon which it is conducted, the petitioners humbly submit would be extremely impolitic; they, therefore, pray the house to reject a measure so contrary to principle, and in its effects so dangerous to the prosperity of the country."

Ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

Sir C. Mordaunt presented the following petition from the directors of the Chamber of Manufactures and Commerce at Birmingham.

"That the petitioners having received information that a bill has been introduced into the house for the purpose of fixing limits to the ages at which children shall be employed in cotton factories, and of controlling the hours of labour of all persons under sixteen years of age that may be employed therein, and of making other regulations relative thereto, are desirous of representing to the house, that although the petitioners have no means of judging how far the proposed measure of legislative control may be rendered necessary by the present condition of persons working in cotton factories, they feel considerable alarm and uneasiness at the prospect of a precedent being established, which may hereafter be extended to the manufactories and works in which the petitioners are concerned, and are therefore anxious to express to the house the following objections against its principle, which have occurred to them: 1st, that many manufactories afford various employments for children of an early age, which do not require any bodily exertion detrimental to health, but which greatly contribute to form early habits of attention and general industry; 2nd, that the clause which prohibits altogether the employment of children under nine years of age might have the effect of depriving many industrious mechanics of those resources, in the earnings of their children, which have contributed to the decent maintenance and education of their growing families, who in a great number of instances have been employed under their own immediate notice and superintendance at an earlier age than nine years; 3d, that the clause limiting to certain parts of the day the hours of employment of all persons under sixteen years of age would be most inconveniently felt in many large manufactories, in which the hours of attendance are necessarily dependent upon certain processes of the manufacture, which in many cases it is impossible to control in regard to the precise hours; 4th, that the proposed regulation for appointing visitors is liable to great abuse, from the vexatious interference manufacturers might experience, and from the exposures to which their concerns would be subject; 5th, that the powers proposed to be vested in the visitors, by substituting legislative authority for that of parents and masters, must tend to weaken and destroy that salutary control which is requisite for promoting habits of regularity and industry, and for maintaining that proper degree of subordination upon which the well-being of society materially depends; the petitioners being anxious, for the above-mentioned reasons, that the legislature should avoid establishing a precedent, which if afterwards extended to manufactories in general, would be followed by the most injurious consequences to those in which the petitioners are engaged, humbly pray that the house will be pleased, in the first place, to institute an inquiry, either by a commission of members of the house, or by such other manner as to them shall seem meet, for obtaining satisfactory information in regard to the condition of persons employed in cotton factories in general; and that the house will be pleased not to suffer the provisions of the said bill to pass into a law, until it shall appear to them, from the result of such investigation, that the condition of persons working in cotton factories is such as to render those provisions necessary for the health and comfort of the persons employed therein."

Ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

The following petition of several Labourers above sixteen years of age, employed in the cotton spinning manufactories of the township of Hindlay, in the parish of Wigan, and county of Lancaster, was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed. "That the petitioners feel themselves much oppressed by the immoderate and protracted labour to which they are subjected in cotton mills, extending to fourteen or fifteen hours per day (inclusive of the time granted for dinner), with a slender abatement thereof on Saturday alone, in apartments of high temperature and infected air, without generally any time being allowed for breakfast and the afternoon's refreshment, which they are obliged to take as the works are going on; that in consequence of taskwork thus severe, and in places so impure, they experience to their sorrow premature debility and distempered frames, which under various shapes make the prime of their manhood the termination of their usefulness, and the prelude to still heavier evils, as procuring their dismission from the only employment which they have been taught as soon as in any degree they prove insufficient to this exorbitant labour; that not for themselves alone, but yet more if possible for their children and relatives of tender years, do the petitioners intreat compassionate regard, witnessing as they do with painful feelings the miseries thus entailed upon those thus dear to them, too manifest to every eye, in the pallid looks and frequent distortions hence originating, and in the less known, but more deadly mischief of constitutions early broken, and some of the worst evils of age treading on the heels as it were of infancy and youth; and the petitioners cannot here omit to state, in addition to the other hardships of this infant class of labourers, many of them are detained three or four days in the week, during the time usually allowed for dinner, to clean the machinery; that the owners of factories, being deeply interested in perpetuating the system complained of, and jealous of yielding to a competitor the chance of a superiority in the market, no hope exists in reason or in past experience that they will depart from a rigid adherence to a plan which to their dependents is so oppressive; that the petitioners, aware of this, and having heard that the notice of the house had been called to this subject so long ago as in the year 1815, they consoled themselves with the prospect of the only remedy that seemed proportioned to the hardship of their case, and it is only when at length, after a long and painful suspense, the hope which they had so fondly cherished is attempted to be wrested from them, and both themselves and their cause publicly misrepresented, that they humbly now represent their grievances to the house, and pray that the provisions of Sir Robert Peel's original bill, to which they have before adverted, curtailing the working hours to twelve, and so as to allow therein half an hour for breakfast and one hour for dinner, may pass into a law, with such other regulations as shall seem expedient to the wisdom and humanity of the house, for the relief of the petitioners, and of the children whose condition they have so much reason to regret."

POOR LAWS AMENDMENT BILL.] General Gascoyne presented a petition from the owners of houses in Liverpool, against that part of the poor bill which subjected the owners, instead of the tenants of houses under 20*l*. per year, to the payment of the poor's rates.

General Thornton thought the clause in question so objectionable, that he hoped every town in the kingdom would petition against it, and that it would be eventually thrown out of the bill.

The petition was then ordered to be printed. It was as follows. "That the petitioners have learned that a bill is now in its progress through the house to amend the laws for the relief of the poor, and that it contains various amendments which the petitioners believe will be most beneficial to the country; that the petitioners are nevertheless compelled to state, that so much of the said bill as relates to dwelling-houses rented at 20*l*. a year and under (with respect to the owners thereof), if passed into a law, will be in its operation partial, unjust and oppressive, and therefore contrary to every principle at all former times adopted in the formation of poor laws, and inasmuch as it would render liable to the payment of the poor rates, the owners of houses let at 20*l*. or under, a year, the fair and equitable proportions of which have been heretofore payable by their respective tenants, not only to the total exemption of those tenants, but also to the exemption of other house owners whose rentals exceed 20*l*. a year per house; that the immediate consequence of such an imposition would be a decrease in the value of houses rented at or under 20*l*. a year, of at least one fourth or 25*l*. per cent., to the injury chiefly of a class of his Majesty's subjects who have moderate incomes arising from the rents of such houses; that the reasons stated in the said bill for the amendment complained against by the petitioners, are not, as they most humbly and respectfully submit to the house, generally applicable, and as the petitioners are well prepared to shew, with the permission of the house, but on the contrary, that the owners of small tenements are under many disadvantages which the greater land owners are wholly unacquainted with; the petitioners therefore most humbly and earnestly intreat the house to take the premises into their consideration, and to reject that part of the said bill against which the petitioners have humbly complained."

LUNATIC ASYLUMS (SCOTLAND) BILL.] Mr. Boswell presented a petition from the inhabitants of the county of Ayr, against the Scotch lunatic asylum bill.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Petitions in favour of a reform in parliament were presented from inhabitants of Broseley, Derby, and Nottingham.—Ordered to lie on the table.

The committee were empowered to send for persons, papers, and records, and were instructed to inquire into and report upon the state of Cold Bath Fields prison, Tothill Fields bridewell, and Clerkenwell prison.

MARRIAGE OF THE PRINCESS ELIZABETH.] Lord Castlereagh, in pursuance of the notice which he had given, rose to make a motion on a subject on which he was convinced there was but one sentiment on both sides of the house. He was persuaded, that all parties were most solicitous to offer their congratulations to his royal highness the Prince Regent and the royal family on the recent marriage of her royal highness the Princess Elizabeth with his serene highness the hereditary Prince of Hesse Hombourg; a prince whose character stood so high in Europe; who had been a distinguished soldier all his life; who had partaken in almost all the great battles by which the independence and tranquillity of Europe had been achieved, and who had exhibited in the field all those qualities which characterise a brave, zealous, and able officer. Convinced as he was that all who heard him entertained the most sincere wishes for the happiness of this illustrious pair, he should trespass no further on the house, but merely move, "That an humble address be presented to his royal highness the Prince Regent, to offer the dutiful congratulations of this house to his royal highness, on the happy nuptials of her royal highness the Princess Elizabeth, daughter of his Majesty, with his serene highness Frederick Joseph Louis Charles Augustus, landgrave and hereditary prince of Hesse Hombourg; and to assure his royal highness of the sincere and heartfelt satisfaction which this house derives from a circumstance that must add so much domestic happiness to his Majesty's family."

The motion was agreed to, nem. con.

The following resolutions were then put, and carried.

Resolved, nemine contradicente,—"That this house do congratulate her Majesty on the happy nuptials of her royal highness the princess Elizabeth, daughter of his Majesty, with his serene highness Frederick Joseph Louis Charles Augustus, landgrave and hereditary prince of Hesse Hombourg."

Ordered, "That Lord John Thynne, Mr. Disbrowe, Sir Thomas Acland, Mr. Frederick Robinson, Lord Viscount Valletort, Mr. Long, Lord George Beresford, and Mr. William Dundas, do attend her Majesty with this congratulation."

Resolved, nemine contradicente,—"That a message be sent from this house to congratulate her royal highness the Princess Elizabeth, daughter of his Majesty, and his serene highness Frederick Joseph Louis Charles Augustus, landgrave and hereditary prince of Hesse Hombourg, on their happy nuptials."

Ordered, "That Lord Viscount Clive, the Marquis of Worcester, the Earl of March, Mr. Bootle Wilbraham, Mr. Peel, Lord Viscount Lascelles, Lord Viscount Bridport, and Mr. Cartwright, do attend the Princess Elizabeth, and the hereditary prince of Hesse Hombourg, with the said message."

SPANISH SLAVE TRADE TREATY BILL.] Lord Castlereagh brought in a bill "to carry into execution a treaty made between his Majesty and the King of Spain, for the preventing of traffic in slaves."—Read a first time.

PRIVATELY STEALING (IRELAND) BILL.] This bill was considered in a committee, and ordered to be reported to-morrow.

BANK RESTRICTION BILL AND BANKERS' NOTES BILL.] The house having resolved itself into a committee on the Bank restriction act, and on the act for the regulation of private bank notes,

The Chancellor of the Exchequer rose to submit to the committee the propositions of which he had given notice. He observed, that he had waited with great anxiety, and had postponed the discussion of the question to a period of the session as late as was consistent with the expectation of a full attendance of members, in the hope that some events might arise of a nature so decisive as to enable the Bank of England at once to return to cash payments. Under present circumstances, however, he was not able to propose any proceeding of so distinct and positive a nature: but, on the contrary, he felt it his imperative duty, with a view to the public safety, and to the convenience of commerce, to submit to the committee a proposition for extending, although for a very limited period, the act of restriction. In order to render what he had to say as intelligible as possible, he begged the committee to revert to the state of things under which the restriction act was originally passed, and under which it had subsequently and at various periods been renewed. The last renewal of that act for two years, in 1816, took place with the understanding that the Bank should employ that period in providing for the resumption of cash payments at its expiration. It would also be indispensable to advert to the course of the exchange during a considerable portion of the period to which he had alluded. The committee would recollect that, prior to the retreat of the French army from Russia, at the close of the year 1812, the price of gold bullion was 5*l.* 12*s.* an ounce, and of silver dollars, 6*s.* 6*d.* an ounce. At that time, therefore, any attempt to restore the metallic currency would have been utterly unavailing, as the coin would have been collected and melted as fast as it issued from the coffers of the Bank. But when the French army retired into Germany, and was beaten there; and when a prospect arose of a successful termination of the war, gold fell to 5*l.* an ounce; and subsequently, when the allied army entered into Paris, to 4*l.* 6*s.* 6*d.*; and there was every indication of its speedily falling to so low a rate as to enable the Bank to resume their payments in cash. The unfortunate events, however, which were notorious to the house, and which again involved Europe in the calamities of war, prevented this pleasing prospect from being realized. After the return of Buonaparte to France in March, 1815, gold rose from 4*l.* 6*s.* 6*d.* to 5*l.* 7*s.* an ounce. It was obvious that, as long as a state of hostility continued, any attempt at a resumption of cash payments would, for the reasons that had operated in preceding cases, prove wholly futile. From the period at which hostilities ceased, it was but justice to the Bank to state, that they had adopted every measure of precaution to enable them to resume cash payments with safety. Their collection of specie had been very rapid, and to a large amount; indeed, to an extent beyond what he could have supposed possible within the same space of time. Another preparatory measure of the Bank was, an experiment which was first tried by them in January, 1817. He alluded to their notice, that they were ready to make payments in cash of a certain description of outstanding notes. The extent of the notes for which payment might have been demanded was about one million sterling. The result of the experiment might be considered as indicative of what would take place on a general resumption of cash payments. It was then found, that so far from the public being anxious to obtain payment of those notes which were payable in cash, no demands whatever were made on the Bank. No preference whatever of metallic currency to paper was shewn on that occasion. At that time gold bullion, which had been continually sinking during the preceding year, was reduced to 3*l.* 18*s.* 6*d.* and silver to 4*s.* 10*d.* the ounce. It was therefore probable, that if, at that time, the Bank had returned to general cash payments, scarcely any would have been demanded. It was in the recollection of several of those gentlemen who heard him, and who had had opportunities of being acquainted with those transactions, that the facts were as he had stated them. He did not wish to enter into any detail on the subject, but he might mention one circumstance as peculiarly illustrative of the feeling of the country. When the old silver coin was exchanged for the new, a large quantity of the latter was sent down to the banks in Scotland for the purpose of being exchanged. After the required exchanges were made, there remained a sum of about 7,000*l.* in the hands of the Royal Bank, the directors of which stated, that it was desirable that it should be retained for the convenience of the country, and asked, as a favour, that they might be allowed to pay for it in gold rather than in bank-notes. He could acquaint the committee with other circumstances of a similar nature, but this might be considered a sufficient illustration. In October last, the Bank of England tried another experiment on a more extensive scale. On the 22d of September, in pursuance of the directions of an act passed in the 37th year of his present Majesty, for confirming and continuing, for a limited time, the restriction contained in the minute of council, of the 26th of February, 1797, on payments of cash by the Bank; and also of the several acts since passed for continuing and amending the same, the following notice from the governor and company of the Bank of England was published in the London Gazette, namely, "That on and after the 1st of October next, the Bank will be ready to pay cash for their notes of every description, dated prior to the 1st of January, 1817." (See vol. i. p. 1526, note.) But the result of this experiment varied considerably from that of the former. Payment in cash was demanded to a considerable amount; not for the purpose of internal circulation, for this he hardly apprehended was the opinion of any person, but for the purpose of being remitted to foreign countries. To the causes which produced that state of things he should presently advert. It appeared from a return made to the other house, that the Bank issued under their notice of the 22d of September, no less than 2,600,000*l.* Of that large sum hardly any part remained in circulation in this country. He should now call their attention to the circumstances which, in his opinion, had occasioned that result, in order to shew how unadvisable it would be, at this time, that the Bank should resume cash payments. Those circumstances appeared to him to be, in the first place, the deficient harvest of 1816, and the harvest of last year not being more than ordinary one, the consequence of which was, that we were under the necessity of importing a considerable quantity of corn, which was paid for in specie. The sums drawn from this country by emigrants might be assigned as another cause. At the same time it was necessary to observe, that those sums were by no means so large as many persons might think. He held in his hand a list of the number of persons who had embarked at Dover for the continent, and who had returned from the continent to that port Dover was so much the most considerable port at whcih persons embarked from this country to the continent, that all the emigration from the other ports might be considered as unimportant; and the committee might therefore assume the emigration from Dover for the continent, as a criterion for determining the numbers of our emigrants. It appeared then, that the whole number of persons, exclusively of aliens, who, from the year 1814 to the 24th of February last, had embarked at Dover for the continent, amounted to somewhat above 11,000. The number of English who, during the same period, had returned to Dover, amounted to 77,530. The same persons might be included twice in this return; but that did not affect the conclusion which might be drawn from it. The difference, then, between these two numbers amounted to 12,700; so that it might be safely affirmed, that the number of Englishmen residing abroad did not exceed 13,000. If the committee assumed that these individuals expended on the average 200*l.* a year each, which, as a number of them were servants, might be considered a sufficiently high estimate, the amount of their annual expenditure would be somewhat about two millions and a half. But, they must also take into the account the large sum expended by our army abroad; for, although the French government provided for the support of our troops, great private expense was incurred by the officers. The two circumstances which he had mentioned, namely, the importation of corn, and the residence of a large body of English abroad, could not be considered of a permanent nature; but they were such as were likely to recur from time to time. But there was another circumstance of a very different nature, which had contributed to the change in the state of things. He alluded to transactions which had taken place in the course of the last two years, namely, the negotiation in this country of large loans for foreign powers. In June, 1816, the French government negotiated a large loan. The provision was six millions of francs of rentes, and the sum borrowed amounted to about five millions sterling. In 1817, a provision was made by the French legislature of thirty millions of rentes for a loan of about 24 millions sterling of stock, or about 15 millions of money. This sum was raised in three several loans. The first amounted to about ten millions of rentes. That operation took place in February, 1817; the second, of eight millions of rentes, in March; and a sum of nine millions of rentes, in July, leaving a sum of three millions to be raised in the present year. If they compared these dates with the rate of exchange, they would find that the exchange first began to fall soon after the conclusion of the first French loan. Gold, which in May, 1816, was as low as 3*l.* 18*s.* 6*d.* rose in the succeeding month, and had continued to rise till February in the present year. He was very far from wishing to throw any blame on the individuals who had contracted for those loans. It was but justice to them to say, that he firmly believed, if they had thought that by contracting for loans with foreign powers they should do any injury to their country, they would by no means have entered into them. At the same time it ought to be considered, that these were subjects with which government ought not to interfere. Every man had a legal right to the disposal of his own property; and there were political advantages of great importance connected with these loans: they had contributed to support the French government, and to enable it to make good its engagements with foreign powers. Under those circumstances, it would have been impolitic in this government to prevent any voluntary transactions of its own subjects with the French government. The effect, however, of those transactions had been such as he had described. The two millions and a half of cash issued by the bank in payment of their notes, had immediately gone out of this country, and had enabled the contractors for the French loan to make good their engagements. The loan which the French government had contracted for, in the present year, was twelve millions sterling; but he should hardly have thought it necessary to interfere with any preparations which the bank had made to return to cash payments, were this the only loan that was to be made. There was now a negotiation on foot, which might end in the raising of a much larger sum. (Hear, hear, hear.) As the measure which he intended to submit might be necessary in consequence of the negotiation to which he had alluded, he would state the precise object of it. They were aware, that, by the treaty of Paris, the allied army might either leave France in the course of the present year, or remain there two years longer. If it should happen, that the allied army left France in the course of the present year, and that the French should fulfil their pecuniary engagements in the present year, in addition to the sum of twelve millions, the French government would probably want twenty millions sterling to liquidate all the claims upon it. He would leave the committee to imagine what the effect of a loan to such an amount would necessarily be. He had before stated, that in so far as regarded our internal situation, there could be no danger in the resumption of cash payments, for that there existed in the public very little disposition to call for payment of any large proportion of the notes of the bank. But when so large a drain might be made from this country, he would put it to them, whether the danger of attempting the operation of resuming cash payments at an undue time, would not more than overbalance any disadvantage which might arise from a temporary prolongation of the restriction? It would hardly be thought advisable that the bank should resume cash payments under circumstances extremely similar to those which existed when the restriction was first imposed. Nothing could be stronger than the resemblance between the circumstances of the two periods, and to shew it, he would read to the committee one or two documents. The right hon. gentleman then read the resolutions of the company of directors of the bank of England, dated the 3d of December, 1795, in which they declared that, after a solemn deliberation, they were unanimously of opinion, that should the proposed loan to the Emperor take place, judging from the effects of the last loan, and the drain of bullion which it had caused, they had every reason to apprehend very momentous and alarming consequences. On the 11th of February, 1796, the directors came to still stronger resolutions. They then declared, that if any farther loan to the Emperor, or to any other foreign power, should, in the present state of affairs, take place, it would, in all probability, prove fatal to the bank of England; and they solemnly protested against any responsibility for the calamitous consequences which might ensue. Thus similar were the circumstances of the two periods. Every one must be aware of the difficulty with which the change of a long established order of things must be attended; and more particularly in the case of currency and circulation. He should, perhaps, be asked, whether the nature of our currency was to depend on the operations of foreign powers? He should say, certainly not. If we could really return to a state of permanent and secure circulation, with safety, we ought to return to that state of things without delay. But surely the moment would be ill chosen for making the attempt, when we were under the influence of circumstances very like those which took place when the suspension was first proposed. He should be told, perhaps, that the restriction was first proposed in a time of war and danger, and that the measure was necessary, in consequence of the advances made by the bank to a foreign power, under the guarantee of government. He was aware of the force of this; but still it did not counterbalance the greater extent of the operations at the present time. For the Imperial loan amounted to only four millions and a half—a farther loan of three millions was in contemplation, but it was stopped by those resolutions of the Bank to which he had just adverted. Now, besides the loan of last year to France, 30 millions might be necessary in the present year, and five millions had been negotiated for Prussia. This would occasion a drain on this country to a much larger amount than that of 1795. He wished it to be distinctly understood, that he did not propose to continue the restriction of cash payments in consequence of any circumstances in the internal state of the Bank, which, he believed, was fully prepared to make good its payments, but, on account of those external circumstances which would render a return to cash payments peculiarly unpropitious and dangerous at the present moment. He hoped, however, that another measure which he should have the honour to propose, might have the effect of considerably alleviating the evil of the restriction—a measure which, he trusted, would, at the present moment, place a great part of our paper currency on a more secure footing than ever. On the resumption of cash payments, it would be proper that our paper currency should return as nearly as possible to what it had been. The committee might be assured, that if they were anxious for that state of things, the Bank directors were as sincerely desirous of bringing it about. They were most willing to adopt every measure which might be thought necessary for effecting that object, and for confirming every regulation which parliament might wish to propose. But he was now to direct their attention to the other part of the subject to which he had alluded, and which he should endeavour to explain as shortly as possible. He had to propose a plan, which, in the course of no long period of time, would give the public such a security for a considerable part of our paper circulation, as it never before possessed. It was his intention to propose, that the restriction act should be continued for one year, namely to July 1819, and that, in one year from that period, the operation of this new plan should commence. There could be no doubt that the most perfect and desirable currency for any country was a mixed one of specie and paper. It might be advisable that there should be a paper circulation to a large amount, but it was advisable at the same time that it should always be convertible into specie, so that the holders might have the most perfect reliance, that, whenever they pleased, they could convert the paper into a metallic currency. Many plans had at different times been in contemplation, respecting the best means of security from the abuse of paper currency. It had been proposed, that paper should be issued on the security of various deposits—on the security of landed property, and of other property. The great objection against issuing paper on the deposit of property was, that, whatever value the property deposited might possess, at the time the deposit was made, it could be converted into money only under favourable circumstances, and, that when attempts were made to convert it into money under other circumstances, it often fell so much in value as not to realize the sum advanced on the security of it. All land banks were subject to this inconvenience. From the many difficulties attendant on the conveyance of landed property, and on converting the land into money, land banks had generally been unsuccessful. This sort of uncertainty, however, did not prevail with respect to another description of property which existed in this country to a great extent—he meant funded property. It was not indeed free from fluctuation, but it might always be considered as available to a certain extent. If, at the time when funding was first introduced, a paper currency had been founded on it, and such currency had grown up with it, we might have possessed a paper currency as perfect as could be desired. If on the deposit of a certain amount of stock, a certain amount of paper might have been issued, such paper would have been free from the insecurity of the paper currency which we now possessed. At present our paper currency was not of equal security in different parts of the kingdom. Scotland, from the nature of its currency, and the extent of the capital of the persons engaged in banking, had experienced no considerable failures, and enjoyed great advantages in her paper circulation. No inconveniencies could be charged against it. In England, however, and still more in Ireland, this was not the case. But all those circumstances of so powerful a nature, arising out of the insecurity of the paper of private bankers, might be prevented by the plan which he should propose. In that plan, he wished to keep in view the difference between that part of the paper currency, which might be considered as the representative of cash, and notes of larger value. He meant, that he should be directed in his views by those which the legislature took, when they prevented the circulation of notes under 5*l.* Permission was first given to circulate notes under 5*l.* and of not less than 20*s.* value, when the metallic currency was suspended by the act prohibiting cash payments by the Bank. The period now fixed for the circulation of those notes was one year after the expiration of the term at which the suspension of cash payments should terminate. The suspension act would expire on the 5th of July, 1818; but as he should propose the continuance of the suspension for another year, it was his intention also to propose, that the alteration with respect to the circulation of private bankers should not take place before the 5th of July, 1820. There was an act now in force, permitting the issue of notes under the value of 5*l.* of the Bank of England. It was not his intention to interfere with that circulation, as it might be considered to rest on good security, the Bank giving, in fact, that very security which he now proposed to demand from the private bankers. They had advanced fifteen millions to government, and they always necessarily held in their hands a considerable amount of floating government securities. It was his intention to propose, that, after the 5th of July, 1820, no private banker should issue notes in England and Ireland (for he would except Scotland, as the objection against the paper circulation of the private bankers of England and Ireland did not apply to Scotland,) for any sum under 5*l.* without making a deposit of government securities, either in stock or exchequer bills. He proposed, therefore, that it should be enacted, that every private banker should transfer into the names of the commissioners for the reduction of the national debt an amount of stock double that of the nominal value of the notes of that description issued by them, or deposit exchequer bills of equal value to that issue. He proposed an amount of stock double that of the nominal value of the notes, as, from the frequent fluctuation in the price of stock, the nominal value of the notes in stock might become a very inadequate security. The interest arising on the stock transferred, or the exchequer bills deposited, would, of course, be paid to the owners after the deduction of charges for management. With respect to the notes to be issued on this credit, he meant to propose, that they should be stamped in a way to denote the security on which they were issued. Some farther collateral security against fraud or forgery might be devised, but that was a matter for future consideration. This was the general outline of his plan, which, he hoped, he had rendered sufficiently intelligible. There were, however, two objections that might be made to the plan, and which he was desirous of anticipating. One was, that it might tend to produce a great and unlimited paper circulation. It would be said, that as this paper was founded on the immense amount of the funds, it might be considered as co-extensive. The answer to this objection would be short, but he trusted satisfactory. It was impossible that there could be a greater temptation to an over-issue in the case of a paper founded on security, than in the case of one founded on no security, and which depended on the will of the banker, and of the party who was willing to receive it. There was no limitation at present but the will of the banker, and the will of those among whom the paper was to circulate. So long as the paper did not return upon the banker to an inconvenient amount, he had no inducement to limit his circulation; he might, therefore, issue as much paper as the public were willing to receive: but, if this plan were adopted, the banker would feel a considerable restraint from the necessity of depositing a valuable consideration. The other objection was, that the circulation of paper, under the value of 5*l.* was not so profitable to the banker as to induce him to continue it under the circumstances of a deposit—that he might consider the deposit so great an inconvenience, in addition to the other charges on banking, that he might not be disposed to engage in this plan. (Hear, hear, hear!) To this he would answer—undoubtedly, if the banker had his option to issue notes with or without security, there could be no question which he would choose. As issuing paper without security was more advantageous to him than issuing it with security, he would naturally prefer it. But, supposing that the safety of the public required that a security should be afforded, he felt persuaded that the banker had a sufficient interest in continuing his operations, subject to such security. It was perfectly certain that every banker must have a large sum in his possession to answer the demands which might be made upon him: and this sum was wholly unproductive. But, under this plan, he could make the payment of demands upon him in his own stock notes, which would be received as cash in paying off his large notes. He would be left without restraint in all issues of notes beyond 5*l.* in value. He would have all that parliament thought it proper he should have before the restriction act was passed. Nothing would be taken from him to which he could be considered as having a well founded claim. He would still, therefore, have a very sufficient profit. Many private bankers were already stockholders to a very large amount. In that case, where would be the inconvenience of depositing in the hands of the commissioners a certain portion of that stock? The only difference was, that the amount deposited would be available only to the holders of the notes, instead of being available to creditors in general. But this safety which the public would receive, would far outweigh any inconvenience to the private banker. Strictly speaking, a banker at present had hardly occasion for any capital. But one consequence of the proposed plan would be, that it would have a tendency to engage men of large property in banking concerns, and to exclude those who did not possess an invariable security for their creditors. The leaving out of all that part of the circulation which exceeded 5*l.* would continue the operation of banking as advantageously to the banker as was compatible with the safety of the public. The committee were placed here in an option of difficulties. No man would say, that they ought to prohibit the circulation of all paper under 5*l.* in value. Opinions of this kind might be entertained; but they were, at all events, very rare. Those, however, who had any acquaintance with the commercial affairs of this country, could not but believe that such a system was impossible. A metallic currency was so cumbersome for mercantile dealings, that we could never conveniently return wholly to it. The question therefore was, whether, as it might not be desirable to return to a metallic currency, but as it might be wished that we should have a paper as near in value to a metallic currency as possible, we would allow an issue of paper without such a deposit as might secure the creditor against the danger of improvident speculation on the part of the banker, and the banker himself against the temptation of it? He thought, however, that it was desirable in every respect that full time should be given to private bankers before the system should be carried into operation, and that time, he conceived, he had given. During the two years after which this measure was to take effect, the country bankers would be enabled to reduce their transactions within the amount which might be convenient to them. Besides this, two years formed a convenient period, as the notes of country bankers were generally by themselves calculated to wear out in two years. The bankers would thus have a fair warning, lest they might incur expense by stamping other notes which might be useless. The restriction on the Bank of England being to continue one year longer, one of the inconveniences which had been anticipated from that measure was, that it would cause an inordinate issue of country notes. But, by the measure which he had just proposed, the bankers would be restrained from issuing largely, as they would be obliged, at a certain time, to draw in all for which they could not give security. A secure and permanent paper circulation would thus be provided, after the resumption of cash payments, which would afford that relief to the public that could not be effected by a complete return to the metallic circulation, with all the incumbrances attending it. He had thus shortly stated the measures which he had to propose, the latter of which he should have thought desirable, even if he had not recommended the continuance of the restriction. Considerable preparation would be necessary before that part of the plan which related to country bankers could be brought into operation. Inquiries must be made as to the species of stamp which ought to be put upon their notes, so as to afford the most effectual security against imposition. The public would thus have the best security which the country bankers could devise against forgery, superadded to all that a public office could do; which together would be as perfect a security as the nature of the case would allow. As soon as these preparatory arrangements were completed, every banker who was willing to issue notes on the security of stock or exchequer bills might do so; and it would no doubt be the wish as well as the interest of many bankers to do this before the period (July 1820,) which he had mentioned. Many of the country bankers were holders of stock, and they might thus, perhaps, add two or three per cent. to the interest of that stock. It might be said, that it would be inconvenient to them to transfer double the amount of their issues—but they had the choice of depositing exchequer bills, merely equal to those issues.—The right hon. gentleman concluded with moving, "That leave be given to bring in a bill for further continuing an act of the 44th year of his present majesty to continue the restrictions contained in several acts of his present majesty, on payments of cash by the Bank of England."

Mr. Tierney said, that the statements of the right hon. gentleman, so far as they went, were intelligible enough; but he was far from being convinced by his arguments. He begged the committee to consider the state in which they were placed. They were called upon to adopt quite a new system of currency, and that in a time of peace, without any previous committee, and without examining a single person. On the sole credit of the chancellor of the exchequer, they were not only to continue the bank restriction, but to effect a total change in the circulation of the country, as far as all notes below 5*l.* were concerned. On this part of the plan he should give no opinion at all. He did not know whether it was intended to sweep away the circulation of all private paper, and to replace it by that of the Bank of England, or greatly to enlarge the issue of such paper. But one effect of this prospective measure would be, that the characters of the country bankers would stand tainted for the next two years. They were now represented as unfit to be trusted for an hour, but that it suited the convenience of the chancellor of the exchequer to let them do what they would for two years. As to the securities which the bankers were required to deposit—no man would choose to deposit stock. They were required to deposit double the amount of their issues in stock. In order to issue 100*l.* in notes, they must have 200*l.* in stock; or, according to the present price, 160*l.* No one would issue notes upon those terms. How such a proposal could be made, he could not comprehend. But the answer was, that if they did not like to give security in stock, they might deposit exchequer bills, and that they might issue notes to the full value of those bills. But what would this be but an issue of exchequer bills? (Hear.) With respect to notes of the value of 5*l.* and above, they would be driven entirely out of circulation; for no man would be such a fool as to take 5*l.* notes from a private banker, while he could get 1 and 2*l.* notes, the payment of which was secured by stock or exchequer bills. (Hear.) Was this the well-digested measure which the chancellor of the exchequer had had in contemplation for some months? Would he pretend that he had not a much more extensive plan, if he had not been corrected by others? Of the debentures, however, which were not issued, he should say nothing—de mortuis nil nisi bonum. But the plan which was actually proposed was deserving of a thorough investigation, which it could not have in a discussion in the house. However clear the statement of the chancellor of the exchequer, or the speeches of those who might follow him, they could not be satisfactory to the mass of the country without a reference of the subject to a committee, by which the various speculative opinions would be received, compared, and digested. But he would ask, why was the measure proposed two years before it was to take effect? Here was a new principle, which, for some reason or other, the chancellor of the exchequer wished them to admit two years before it was to be acted upon. The only reason which had been given was, that the bankers might have fair play—that they might not issue notes which would be drawn in before they would be worn out. But there would be no difficulty in having the old ones stamped. As to the continuance of the restriction, the chancellor of the exchequer professed that he felt the utmost grief in being obliged to bring it forward. He might be in great grief, but there was not a man in the house who had felt any disappointment at hearing his proposition. The moment the chancellor of the exchequer said that he had great doubts as to the resumption of cash payments, there was not a man in the country who had the smallest doubts on the subject. (A laugh.) The moment the doubts had got into his head, they had got out of the heads of all others. After all his magnificent promises, he brought in a bill for the continuance of the restriction, and made new promises, of which no one believed a single word. The restriction was to be continued for one year; but the words "no longer" had been avoided, as they had formerly been brought into discredit. (A laugh.) The chancellor of the exchequer had said that he was most sincere in his wish to resume cash payments, and he answered for it that the bank were equally sincere. In this, he believed him. The bank, and the chancellor of the exchequer, were just as sincere the one as the other. The system of finance on which the right hon. gentleman proceeded, was irreconcilable with the system of cash payments—and as the bank lived on their profits, which they could not increase indefinitely if they were obliged to pay in cash, they thus agreed together perfectly well. The chancellor of the exchequer trembled at the very idea of resuming cash payments—he knew that he should not then be able to talk of an increase in the revenue, or of lowering the interest of the debt—and of this the bank had availed themselves. It was said, that the bank had done every thing in their power to prepare for the resumption of cash payments at the time provided by parliament. Quite the contrary. They had done every thing in their power to avoid it, by increasing the issue of their notes by two millions and a half. And did the bank think that people were such dolts and idiots (to borrow an expression of a right hon. gentleman opposite) as to suppose that they contemplated the resumption of their payments? He did not know, without inquiry, whether the bank could, by any possibility, resume cash payments in July. He believed that it would produce a violent revulsion, a great change in both the domestic and foreign pecuniary relations of the country. But, was it not a grave charge against the bank, that they had neglected those preparations which they should have made, and had increased their issues? But how had this increase of issues taken place? By purchases of exchequer bills, or by advances to government on exchequer bills. Of ordinary securities—bills which they had discounted—they had hardly any, as bills could be discounted by others at so much lower a rate. Here was the mutual accommodation; the bank by purchasing government securities, raised the price of them, and enabled the chancellor of the exchequer to make flourishing speeches; and while he was making flourishing speeches, they were making flourishing profits. The chancellor of the exchequer having brought forward this proposition in the teeth of his solemn assurance, had given, in the way of an argument, an account of the state of things twenty-seven years ago; but, for any reference to the present question, he might as well have stated what had happened in the time of king William. The only question now was, what would happen if cash payments were resumed in July next? The chancellor of the exchequer had read two resolutions of the bank in 1795 and 1796, declaring, that that body would be in great jeopardy if the Austrian loan of four millions and a half were negotiated. But, if his recollection were correct, the price of bullion was not at all affected by the remittances for that loan. But they must consider the different circumstances of the times. Men did not then demand gold to send it abroad, but to hoard it. A small body of French had shortly after contrived to throw themselves on the coast of Wales, and many timid persons thought it safe to have 100 or 150 guineas by them, in the dread that the bank would not be able to fulfil its engagements. The sums of money which were brought forward at the conclusion of the war proved this. But at this time, according to the chancellor of the exchequer, there was a laudable abhorrence of the precious metals, and if there existed one thing which Englishmen dreaded more than another, it was the sight of gold. The commerce of the country was flourishing—but the chancellor of the exchequer, on the look out for arguments to support the restriction, had produced lists of the persons who had gone abroad. His first statement of 90,000 persons who had left the kingdom was very appalling. But he had happily shewn them, that all but 12,000 had come back again. Those persons the chancellor of the exchequer had calculated drew two millions and a half a year from the country. This seemed a high calculation. He himself had been four times on the right hon. gentleman's travelling list, twice going and twice returning from France during the last two years, and the calculation of the average expense was certainly above his mark. (A laugh.) The foreign loans had been also spoken of as a reason for the present measure; but, until they were negotiated, it could not be said what effect they would have. The sums might be exaggerated by interested persons. But, at any rate, it was necessary that it should be known what sums would go out of this country. If he were allowed to examine the proper persons, he had no doubt that he could shew that the amount of the sums were so small, and the manner in which they would be transmitted so gradual, that they could not justify the continuance of the restriction even for a moment. He trusted, therefore, that a committee would be appointed to inquire into the reasons for the renewal of the restriction, which, at present, were so suspicious, that, it seemed it had been determined to continue it for ever. The bank, by their purchases of exchequer bills, were the masters of the chancellor of the exchequer. It was strange that the right hon. gentleman, who was alive to the danger of persons investing their money in foreign funds, should try to make our own as unproductive as possible. When he made that attack upon the sinking fund, which reduced it to its present state, he had given as a reason, that if the sinking fund went on increasing, it would lower the interest of money. Yet now the object of all his plans was, to effect this reduction of the rate of interest which he had before dreaded as an evil. At the present price of our stocks, persons would embark money in the French funds, in which they got an interest of seven per cent. which, if the security was not so good, afforded an ample insurance against risk. Besides the 12,000 persons who were constantly abroad, there were many others who were continually making remittances of their capital for the sake of higher interest, and every step which the chancellor of the exchequer took promoted this. When the rate of interest fell in proportion to the prosperity of the country, it was to be welcomed as a signal of that prosperity; but he deprecated the artificial system of raising the funds by the exertion of the government. Since the 25th of June last, every exertion of the chancellor of the exchequer had been directed to that end. He had been authorised to raise 300,000*l.* on the security of the woods and forests, but, as he did not immediately want the money, he had put it in the funds. Luckily, the speculation had succeeded—but, in a private individual, this would have been called stock jobbing. There was the clause also to augment the produce of the sinking fund in November and December last. By these acts, the price of stock had been raised, and the efficiency of the sinking fund had been consequently diminished. The expectation of reducing the 5 per cents. had, however, failed, and they now remained just as they were, though, not long ago, the chancellor of the exchequer had not doubted that the interest of them could be reduced at least to 4 per cent. The fluctuations which had taken place in the funds had originated in the doubt, whether or no cash payments would be resumed. That doubt had now been settled. The evil day was postponed, because the chancellor of the exchequer was afraid of facing it. There was reason to fear that the return to the former system of the country would be attended with difficulty, and some danger; but this was a reason why it should not be postponed, as by every delay the difficulty and danger were increased. Every ground on which the resumption of cash payments had been formerly opposed was now entirely done away. The pretext of the foreign loans was now brought forward, and it was for the house to say, whether they would hold up to Europe the example of a paper circulation, merely because other countries took a different course. The drain on this country by French loans would not be considerable. There was much unemployed capital in France; and he was persuaded, that the consequence of the course which that country now pursued, would be, that they would not need much pecuniary assistance from abroad. He again pressed on the house the necessity of a committee. Without some inquiry, who could affirm that the bank might not be able to resume its payments? Perhaps, six months might be time enough for it to prepare for resuming them. And, above all, some enactments should be made to compel them to make preparations against the time fixed by law for the expiration of the restriction. This, too, the chancellor of the exchequer would resist, more than all the rest. His object was, to keep up a great paper circulation, to force up the stocks, and to reduce the 5 per cents. But the house, he hoped, would not lend itself to this project without examination. If the report were brought up on Monday, he should move to postpone it, in order to move for a committee. Without some inquiry, the right hon. gentleman could not with decency require the assent of the house to his plan; nor would Mr. Pitt, with all his confidence in himself, have ventured to demand it under such circumstances.

Mr. Grenfell concurred in the sentiments which had been so ably delivered by his right hon. friend. He would not now enter into details, but he could not refrain from making a few allusions to the many pretexts on which the restriction act had been prolonged, and which, if continued, would have so injurious an effect upon all the property of the kingdom, and necessarily produce here the same mischiefs that such a system had uniformly produced in every country in the civilized world which was left to depend on a paper issue not convertible to a metallic currency. (Hear.) The right hon. gentleman had stated something like three reasons for the continuance of the restriction act, (that of the country banks he looked on as a minor consideration in comparison with this.)—The first was, the state of foreign exchanges, and the prices of gold. Now, he recollected, that in 1815, the reasons urged were, that the course of exchange was 11 per cent. against us, and the price of bullion 11 per cent. But what had been done in the following year to redeem these solemn pledges which had been given? The exchange was then in our favour; gold was only 3 per cent. above par, and silver considerably below it. Notwithstanding this favourable change, nothing had been done by the right hon. gentleman, who said, that it was better at such a moment to let matters subside and settle. The state of the harvest of 1816 was likewise alluded to, and also that of the following year; but the right hon. gentleman could not forget, that, for the whole spring and summer of 1817, the course of exchange was greatly in our favour, and the price of the precious metals at par. It was in the autumn that these advantages ceased, and then, not on account of the harvest, but in consequence of the increased issue of bank notes. There was the index and the barometer by which the real cause and its progress would be distinctly explained. The last reason was, the foreign loans. This was equally futile. If a wealthy German merchant happened to settle here, and contract for a Prussian loan—and a rich English merchant should go over to Paris and treat for a French loan, was it to be borne that, for such a reason, incalculable mischiefs should be endured by a whole people. (Hear, hear.)—He could not dwell without warmth on such flimsy pretexts; but he would at present restrain himself, and defer his observations until the bill was brought in. On the subject of the country banks, he would at present only put one question to the right hon. gentleman, and that was, whether the stock deposits were to be held as security for one and two pound notes only, or for five pound and higher notes also?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, he had no intention whatever to cast any reflection upon country bankers, nor was such a supposition warranted by the character of the measure which he proposed to bring forward; for this measure was not suggested by any degree of distrust or suspicion of those individuals, but by a reasonable and proper solicitude for the interest and satisfaction of the public. With regard to the question of the hon. gentleman who had just sat down, he had to state, that the proposed deposit of stock by country bankers was to form a security for all notes under five pounds which those bankers might issue, but any surplus deposit would be deemed an additional security for their other notes. As to the assertion of the right hon. gentleman, with respect to the influence of the foreign loans in 1795 upon the price of bullion, he should refer to the evidence of Mr. Abraham Newland before a committee of that house. From that evidence it appeared, that the price of bullion in 1797 was four guineas an ounce. To the observation of the right hon. gentleman respecting the issue of debentures upon the capital stock of the country, he could say, for the satisfaction of the right hon. gentleman and the public, that no such plan was ever in his contemplation.—He had seen what had been written upon this subject by Mr Dunn, by whom so much discussion as to this point had been excited in the public newspapers. He had also had some communications with that individual, and, without meaning to say that no case could arise in which it might not be expedient to convert the capital of our debt into a floating security, he objected to the adoption of Mr. Dunn's plan at present, because he conceived that, while there were so many exchequer bills in the market, either these bills or the proposed debentures must fall in value. The plan of issuing a paper circulation upon the security of stock, was suggested many years ago in the pamphlet of Mr. Weston, a most respectable solicitor, but Mr. Pitt did not then think it expedient to act upon that suggestion. There was, indeed, a part of the scheme of Mr. Weston to which he (the chancellor of the exchequer) felt a strong objection, namely, that of rendering such paper a legal tender. This pamphlet of of Mr. Weston's was, however, of considerable value, and he was free to confess, that a part of the plan which he had that night had the honour to submit to the committee, was taken from it. He hoped that this plan would serve to provide a remedy against the introduction of an insecure currency into the general circulation of the country. If it were said, as it had been urged in the course of the discussion, that this plan would leave the larger notes of country bankers comparatively insecure, he should answer, that that objection was of no importance, as such notes were always liable to be considered with more care, and received with more caution.

Mr. Grenfell observed, that it was somewhat singular that a pamphlet published in 1800, and so much applauded, should only now come to be acted upon. He expressed his surprise, that although there were seven directors of the bank present, not one of them had thought it worth while to favour the house with a single observation upon a subject so materially affecting the credit of the establishment with which they were connected. With respect to the evidence of Mr. Newland, which had been referred to by the right hon. gentleman, he distinctly recollected the particulars of that evidence. Mr. Newland was asked, whether the price of gold in 1797 was not so high as four guineas, and he answered in the affirmative. But this, he (Mr. G.) could affirm, was not the market price of gold, as would appear from an examination of the tables. It was indeed true, that the bank paid four guineas an ounce for gold, but this expence was incurred upon gold imported in 1797 from Hamburgh through the house of Eliason and Co. and this gold, when brought to the bank, cost four guineas an ounce; that, however, was not the market price of the day.

The motion was then agreed to. The house resumed, and leave was given to bring in two bills: one, "for farther continuing an act of the 44th of his present majesty, to continue the restrictions contained in several acts of his present majesty, on payments of cash by the Bank of England;" the other "to authorize bankers in England and Ireland to issue and circulate promissory notes secured upon a deposit of public funds, or other government securities."

Mr. Grenfell asked, what was meant to be the charge upon the proposed deposits?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer replied, one-eighth, or 2*s.* 6*d.* per cent. upon the original deposit, and one shilling per cent. per annum during the continuance of such deposit.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday, April 10.

STATE OF THE CURRENCY.] The Earl of Lauderdale said, that after what had passed last night in another place, to which he conceived he was at perfect liberty to allude, he thought it necessary to advert to the motion of which he had given notice, respecting the currency of the country. The business to which he referred was intimately connected with the subject of his motion, and was of the greatest importance. Two measures, he understood, had been proposed: first, the continuing of the bank restriction act; secondly, a regulation respecting the notes of country bankers. Both were measures which called for the serious consideration of their lordships; but the latter was, besides, an extraordinary innovation on the general principles on which banking establishments had hitherto been conducted, and one which, in his opinion, required the immediate attention of that house. Under these circumstances, he had resolved not to postpone his motion, which would not be confined merely to the relative state of the money issued from the mint; but would have for its object the paper-currency, as well as the coinage, of the country. He should therefore bring it forward on Thursday next, for which day he moved that the lords be summoned.—Ordered.

FEES OF COURTS OF JUSTICE.]—The Marquis of Lansdown rose to move an address to the crown, for copies of the reports of the commissioners appointed in 1814, to inquire into the fees paid to officers of the several courts of justice in the united kingdom. He could not anticipate any opposition to this application; at the same time, the discoveries which the commissioners had made with respect to the practice of taking fees, especially in one part of the united kingdom, were of so extraordinary a nature, that, he apprehended, he might be excused, if he called their lordships' attention to them by a few observations. When the authority was given for the inquiries which had been instituted, it certainly never was supposed that any of the venerable persons at the head of the courts in the united kingdom had, in any way, sanctioned the abuses which had grown up. Accordingly, it was found upon inquiry, what, indeed, no inquiry was necessary to establish, that their character was unimpeachable, and that the more it was investigated, the more evident its purity would appear. It must, however be obvious to their lordships, that it was perfectly impossible for the heads of courts to superintend all the details of the practice of clerks and inferior officers, in which the interests of suitors were involved. It had, indeed, been found, that in one part of the United Kingdom, (Ireland) suitors had suffered most severely from the unjust and illegal exactions of officers holding situations in the courts of law. He should briefly allude to some of those iniquitous extortions, and, in doing so, he must remind their lordships, that no class of persons stood in so defenceless a situation as poor suitors, who were destitute of all means of resisting the extortions imposed upon them; and that, therefore, none were more entitled to their attention and protection. It would, however, appear from the reports for which he was about to move, that there was scarcely an instance of any alteration in the practice of certain courts having been enacted by the legislature, though intended for purposes unconnected with fees, which was not made an instrument of new extortions from the suitors. It would be found also, that rules expressly made by the courts for the benefit of suitors, had been perverted to their injury. A remarkable instance of this kind occurred with regard to an order made by the Court of Chancery in Ireland, to allow the solicitors in causes to attend, instead of the six clerks. It had been contrived to evade the effect of that order; and, in one case, no less than 197 attendances were charged to a suitor, though not one of the clerks had attended. It would likewise appear, that most unjustifiable extortions had been practised with regard to offices executed by deputies. In some instances, where the emoluments of the principal arose from fees, he had appointed a deputy, who increased the fees; that deputy again sometimes appointed a clerk, who made additional fees; so that the unfortunate suitors had, first, to pay the principal; secondly, the deputy; and, thirdly, the clerk. Indeed, in many of the courts in the sister kingdom, the clerks had been in the habit of varying the price paid for the sheet of office copies of papers, without assigning any reason, except that they found some solicitors willing to pay more than others. When they met with solicitors who were disposed to do their duty towards their clients, they abated in their demands; but when the solicitors were inclined to yield, the exactions of these gentlemen increased in proportion. In some of these courts, the practice followed in taxing bills of costs, was often rendered a subject of great vexation to the parties. It might be expected, that the party to whom that duty was referred, would be one who had no direct interest in the matter. Yet, in one court, it had so happened that the party who made the charges had been allowed to tax the costs. It thus often happened that the charges were 50 per cent. higher than they ought to be. There was an instance in one of the courts, in a case of error, where the demand for office copies of papers amounted to 400*l.*, though the property in question did not exceed 300*l.* This enormous demand had induced the party to make an application to superior authorities; but he found he could obtain no relief, except by proceeding with his suit, which would have increased his expense. He was therefore induced to abandon all farther proceedings, though it was generally understood that the opinion of the court was favourable to his claim. There was one circumstance more connected with law proceedings, to which he should take the liberty of referring, and in what he should say on that subject, he was fully persuaded he should be supported by the concurrent opinion of the noble and learned lord on the woolsack. He meant the state of the law with regard to stamps on legal proceedings. The duties on stamps had been imposed during a time of war; but, if the necessities of such a period could be urged as a reason for laying them on, it might reasonably be hoped that the burden would be lightened on the restoration of peace. Their lordships were now called upon to consider whether these oppressive duties ought to be continued. In his opinion, the public distress had afforded no excuse for these taxes, which were levied on private distress—which were often extracted from misery itself. Disapproving of all law-taxes, which were burdens imposed on the necessitous, and obstacles to the obtaining of justice, he could not but condemn the enormous duties levied by law-stamps. Great, however, as the evil was, it had been immensely aggravated by the ingenuity of clerks and officers in some of the courts to which he had already alluded; for when, by an act of the legislature, stamp-duties were required on office-copies of certain papers, these clerks had availed themselves of that circumstance to increase their fees. In Ireland, the fees had, on this ground, been in general augmented 25 per cent. There was a case mentioned in one of the reports, where the stamp-duties came to 69*l.*; but the charge, including fees, was 459*l.*: so that when the legislature intended that parties were to be charged only 69*l.*, about seven times that sum was extorted from them. Thus property was destroyed by the means to which it was necessary to resort in order to secure it. He was far from imputing any blame to his Majesty's government on account of these nefarious transactions. He had no doubt that ministers would visit the offenders with just severity, and believed them to be perfectly disposed to check, and even extirpate, the evil; but it would be satisfactory to the house to know what measures had already been taken towards this end; and this was certain, that it was their lordships' duty to see that the object was accomplished. The noble marquis concluded by moving an address to the Prince Regent, for copies of the reports referred to in the commencement of his speech.

The Earl of Liverpool said, he did not rise for the purpose of opposing the motion, which, on the contrary, had his most cordial support, but to make a few observations, suggested by what had fallen from the noble marquis. Their lordships must have heard with satisfaction what had been stated by the noble marquis respecting the heads of the different courts, whose conduct, as might have been expected, had been found liable to no kind of imputation whatever. He must also take the liberty of remarking, that nothing in the statement which their lordships had heard, and the matters of complaint in the reports, in scarcely any respect applied to the courts of England or Scotland, but were confined almost exclusively to Ireland. The investigations had been carried on with the greatest impartiality and all practicable diligence; and he believed, he spoke the opinion of every man who had seen the reports, when he said, that the conduct of the commissioners had been most exemplary. Indeed, every circumstance mentioned by the noble marquis tended to prove the honourable and upright manner in which their inquiries had been prosecuted. Four reports had already been made, and there were two more in a very forward state. The report on the court of chancery had been referred, after it was drawn up, to the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, and the Master of the Rolls, by whom the labours of the commissioners were approved. With regard to the court of exchequer, in which the right of appointment to the office of the Clerk of the Pleas had become a question of legal dispute, the report was equally approved. A decision had been given in favour of the crown by the Court of King's Bench in Ireland as to the appointment of the Clerk of the Pleas; but an appeal had been made to their lordships' house, where the final judgment must now be given. The report respecting the Courts of Error was important, and he could assure the noble marquis that his Majesty's government would be happy to carry the recommendations of the commissioners into effect. He had thought it necessary to make the few explanations with which he had troubled the house. It would be for their lordships, when the reports should be before them, to consider whether it would be requisite to apply farther remedies to the evils complained of, which had arisen from no neglect in his Majesty's government, and the existence of which could scarcely have been suspected before the investigation of the commissioners disclosed them. In the mean time, it could not escape observation, that this inquiry was one of the advantageous results of that measure by which the two countries had been united, and the proceedings which might be instituted on the reports would afford a farther proof of the attention of the united parliament to the interests of the people of Ireland. The motion, as he had already observed, was one for which he would most willingly vote.

The Earl of Lauderdale observed, that he had great satisfaction in hearing that none of the extortions which his noble friend had recited were chargeable on the courts in Scotland. He could not help, however, reminding the noble lords opposite, that an inquiry of the same kind, which was now acknowledged to be so salutary, had formerly received their disapprobation. The commissioners who had been appointed to inquire into the state of the courts in Scotland, had not only reported what they considered as abuses, or unnecessary burdens, but had pointed out the means of redress. He hoped, however, that a report which he had heard would not prove true, namely, that appointments had lately been made to some of the offices in Scotland, the abolition of which had been recommended by the commissioners. He was exceedingly glad that these reports were to be laid on the table, which would give their lordships the opportunity of judging whether the commissioners should continue their labours. It would be proper to take care that these commissions were not maintained longer than was necessary; for they were attended with no little expense. If maintained too long, they would justly deserved the name of jobs, and parliament ought to be as careful in guarding against the evils which might arise from their undue continuance, as in abolishing those abuses which they had been the means of disclosing.

The motion was then put, and agreed to.

Friday, April 10.

COTTON FACTORIES BILL.] Sir R. Peel presented a petition from labourers employed in the cotton spinning factories at Stockport, in favour of this bill. The hon. baronet said, that the petition was signed by seven master manufacturers, the opinion of one of whom, Mr. Entwistle, was entitled to the greatest consideration; and by thirteen resident clergymen, who had an opportunity of knowing the condition of the objects of it; and by eight medical gentlemen.

Sir J. Graham said, he wished to guard the house against some of these petitions. It was well known how easy it was to stir up discontented persons to make complaints. Many of the signers of the present petition were discarded and worthless workmen, who conceived that they did too much, when in employment, for the wages which they received. He was an advocate for free labour; and had not free labour existed when he was a boy, he never should have had the honour of a seat in that house.

Mr. Curwen thought that, if the house agreed to legislate for restricting labour to ten hours and a half, they would next be petitioned to limit it to nine hours. He hoped and trusted that the humane feelings of manufacturers would reduce it to twelve hours.

Sir R. Peel said, that to his certain knowledge, the character of the petitioners varied materially from the character given of them by the hon. baronet. They were respectable inhabitants of Stockport, professional men, and clergymen.

Mr. Butterworth said, he knew that many respectable persons in the north complained of the length of labour to which young persons were subjected, and who thought that some remedy was necessary to prevent the rising generation from being a worthless race.

Mr. Finlay observed, that children as young as those employed in cotton-spinning were employed in flax-spinning, in button-making, in the silk-factories, and in the potteries. If the evil were once proved and admitted, the remedy must be applied generally, and the legislature must interfere with the freedom of labour. The manufacturers themselves might shorten the hours of labour. He deprecated the proceeding to legislate on principles merely of humanity, without taking every other principle into view, and was convinced, that the effects of the present bill would operate more to the injury than the benefit of those for whom it was intended.

Mr. Wynn said, that it was a general principle not to interfere with free labour, because it was to be presumed that the labourer, if required to do more than suited him, would seek other employment; but here was a case regarding the employment of young children, and it surely was within the province of the house to protect those who could not protect themselves.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Three petitions from Birmingham, one from Portsmouth, and four from Littlemoss, Taunton, and Waterloo in Ashton-under-line, praying for a reform in parliament, were presented, and ordered to lie on the table.

PARISH VESTRIES BILL.] The report of this bill was further considered, the bill recommitted, considered in a committee, and reported.

POOR LAWS AMENDMENT BILL.] The report of this bill was further considered, the bill recommitted, considered in a committee, and reported.

BREACH OF PRIVILEGE.] Lord A. Hamilton rose, pursuant to notice, to bring before the house his complaint of a breach of its privileges, by a member of the other house of parliament. The noble lord said, that he was not actuated by personal feelings alone. It could not be denied by any hon. gentleman who heard him, that the privileges and the independence of that house were the sources of our national power and prosperity. They had all heard much of the reproaches which had been cast upon the character of that house by those who had petitioned for a reform in parliament; and the best answer that could be made to such charges would be, to evince a disposition to investigate cases of the nature of that to which he was about to call their attention. The representation of Scotland had been peculiarly an object of attack; more, perhaps, from the mode of election in that country, than from any thing in the character of the people; and it was, therefore, peculiarly desirable, that any specific imputation on that country should be strictly inquired into. The case which he was about to detail regarded the county which he had the honour to represent. To explain it, he must observe that, above a year and a half ago, Sir Alexander Cochrane announced his intention of becoming a candidate at the next election for the representation of the county of Lanark; since which time, a most active canvass had been carried on; the whole influence of every partizan and dependent of government having been exerted against him (Lord A. Hamilton) in a way which he could not avoid calling unfair and improper. A noble lord, a member of the other house, had warmly espoused the cause of Sir Alexander Cochrane; and though he did not mean to charge that noble lord directly with a breach of the privileges of the House of Commons, he had evidence to shew that such a breach had been committed in some quarter. The case was simply this: he held in his hand a letter written by a person of the name of Thomas Ferguson, who was employed under the factor of the noble lord to whom he had alluded, and who must therefore be regarded as acting under the noble lord's influence; especially as it was stated in the letter, in plain and distinct terms, that the writer had his lordship's authority. At the same time, he was bound to state, that he had communicated with the noble lord on the subject, intimating his intention of bringing it before parliament, and the noble lord had given a general denial that the letter was written by his authority. He by no means meant to say, that the noble lord's assertion was untrue; but, when two individuals told any circumstance so differently, that it was impossible to believe them both, it was indispensable to weigh the evidence on each side, and to give credit to that party for which it preponderated. And besides, the noble lord's answer was couched in terms so general, as not to be altogether incompatible with the inference that Ferguson had written the letter with his authority. If it should turn out that the charge conveyed in that letter were not well-founded, it would be matter of regret to him, that, in the prosecution of his duty, he should have been obliged to use the name of the noble lord in the way in which he was now under the necessity of mentioning it; but on the other hand, if it should be manifest to the house, that the letter was actually authorized by the noble lord, he should feel it his duty to resort to stronger measures. The letter was addressed to William Dykes, esq. a freeholder of the county of Lanark, and was in these words:

"Glasgow, May 24, 1817.
No. 50, Miller Street.

"Dear Sir,—According to your desire, I communicated to Lord Douglas your wish to have a situation under government for your young friend, Mr. Dykes; and I am authorized to state, that if you support his lordship's views in politics, at the first election, his lordship will secure an eligible situation for your friend, which will be of great advantage to him; and and as you are independent of the Hamilton family, I think you should accept of Lord Douglas's offer.

"If you have not made a promise to Lord A. Hamilton, I think you have good grounds to get clear off from what you mention regarding your vote, for you certainly have not been well used.

"If an application is made to you from the Hamilton family to promise your vote, I think you should not grant it, until I see you in Glasgow, when I will tell you all about the matter.

"Sir Alexander Cochrane is not at home just now, otherwise I would have written you more particulars. Have the goodness not to mention this matter until the whole is arranged. I will write you when the noddy is painted, and I hope to have the pleasure of seeing you and Mrs. Dykes at Glasgow.—I am, dear sir, your most obedient servant,

"THOMAS FERGUSON."

(Addressed)
William Dykes, Esq. of Lambhill, by Strathaven.

Now, the point at issue was, whether any authority had been given to Ferguson to write this letter. It appeared to him to be impossible that any person, situated as Ferguson was, should, without any authority, use the name of Lord Douglas, state the names of the candidates, request support for one of them, and, at last, beg secrecy until the whole affair should be arranged. Some authority might have been given by some person acting under Lord Douglas, and yet the noble lord himself might not have authorized the writer. It was highly proper, however, that the truth should be ascertained; and, for that purpose, the house might either order Ferguson to attend at their bar, to give an account of the authority under which he acted, or they might refer the matter to a committee of privileges. They might, indeed, direct the Lord Advocate to prosecute Ferguson, but he did not recommend that proceeding. He was not aware of the existence of any precedent immediately in point. The act of 1809, commonly called Mr. Curwen's act, had created some embarrassment in his mind, with respect to calling Ferguson to the bar; as the first question to be put to him would be, on what authority he wrote that letter, and it might be considered unfair to call on him to acknowledge that which might eventually subject him to prosecution. But, on the whole, he conceived that that act applied only to cases of treating, and not to a case like the present. He should propose, therefore, that Ferguson should be called to the bar, and the house might afterwards proceed to other resolutions on the subject. He thought that he owed it to the independent, unbought, and unbiassed freeholders of the county which he had the honour to represent, and who had heretofore returned him without fee or reward, to submit this case to the consideration of parliament; and in doing so, he felt that he did no more than sustain their rights, the privileges of that house, and the liberties of the country. He therefore moved, "that Mr. Thomas Ferguson do attend this house on Tuesday the 21st of April."

Mr. Wynn observed, that the regular course was, to deliver in the letter of which the noble lord complained.

Lord A. Hamilton said, he had no objection to do so. The letter was accordingly delivered to the clerk, and read.

Mr. W. Dundas said, he thought that, after the correspondence which had taken place between the noble lord opposite and Lord Douglas, this motion might have been spared. If he could not satisfy the noble lord on the subject, he was sure he should be able to satisfy the house; for he was desired by Lord Douglas to declare, upon his honour, that he never gave any order to any person to make any such promise as was mentioned in the letter which had been read to the house. He was desired, too, by the noble lord to state, that he was sure the house was too generous to doubt this unqualified and express denial, and too just to entertain any hasty and unfounded suspicion.—He therefore conceived, that, after having made this statement by the desire of Lord Douglas, the house would not agree to the motion now before it, without implying a distrust in the word of honour of that nobleman. Having done with the conduct of Lord Douglas, he wished to say a word or two respecting the conduct of the noble mover himself. There was an old saying, of which every day's experience proved the truth—that "a man who lives in a glass-house should beware of throwing stones." What had the noble lord's own conduct been? Had the privileges of the house never been violated in his own case? When the noble lord first came forward as a candidate for the county of Lanark, he was backed by no mean interest, by no common individual. To further his election, letters were written by a person of the first rank in the nobility of Scotland, by the duke of Hamilton, the father of the noble lord. A complaint of this kind did not, therefore, come with the best grace from such a quarter.

Mr. Wynn said, that this was a case of direct bribery—a most serious invasion on the privileges of the house. That this offence had been committed by Lord Douglas no man could for a moment suppose, after the positive denial which that noble lord had directed to be given on his part to the charge. But that the offence had been committed by some one, the letter indisputable proved, and it ought not to be passed over. He would not detain the house by quoting precedents on this subject. It was one of their standing resolutions, that it was a high infringement of their privileges for any peer to concern himself in the election of members to serve for the commons in parliament*. In the year 1779,

* "Resolved, That no peer of this realm, except such peers of Ireland as shall for the time being be actually elected, and shall not have declined to serve for any county, city, or borough of Great Britain, hath any right to give his vote in the election of any member to serve in parliament.

"That it is a high infringement of the liberties and privileges of the commons of the United Kingdom, for any lord of parliament, or other peer or prelate, not being a peer of Ireland at the time elected, and not having declined to serve for any county, city, or borough of Great Britain, to concern when a complaint of this nature was made against the Duke of Chandos, the question was referred to a committee of privileges. The same thing was done in the case of the mayor and corporation of Oxford. The house, then, might either refer the present case to a committee of privileges to take evidence, or, if it should be thought more convenient, they might order the party at once to the bar. They would be totally forgetful of their own dignity, if they did not inquire who the guilty persons were, and if, after discovering the offenders, they did not prosecute them with the greatest severity. (Hear, hear.)

The Lord Advocate said, that, according to the notice of the noble lord, the subject of his motion was, the interference of a peer with the election of a member of that house. Now, he would put it to the house, whether the noble lord, in his statement, had brought any proof of the interference of a peer of the realm with the election of a member to serve for the commons in parliament. The evidence referred to in his statement was, a letter from a person who was not a factor or servant employed by Lord Douglas, or even employed on any estate of his lordship, in Lanarkshire. Whether he had been employed on any other estate of that noble lord, he had had no means of ascertaining. But this assertion rested simply on the declaration of Ferguson, that authority was given to him by the noble lord. In opposition to this, they had the positive averment of Lord Douglas, that this assertion was unfounded. The conduct of Ferguson was another matter. The motion before them was, that Ferguson should be ordered to attend at the bar. Now, he presumed, that the noble lord had considered the questions which he would put to that person when he was there. It was a matter of very grave consideration, whether he should be forced to answer questions by which he might criminate himself. The noble lord had alluded to another mode of proceeding: he mentioned, that he had had it once in contemplation, that his Majesty's advocate should be directed to prosecute Ferguson. Whether or not the noble lord relied on the individual who now filled that office, he did not know; but this he would say, whatever orders might be given by the house on this subject to him, to the best of his poor abilities he would endeavour to execute. He thought it would be more consonant to justice and to law, that the person in question should be put on his trial, than that he should be brought to the bar of the house. By bringing him there, they would lay the foundation of a prosecution against him, and his own statement would be made a ground of crimination against him. The noble lord had said a great deal about the attempts of the servants and agents of government to remove him from the representation of the county of Lanark. He, for one, would state, that his own conduct had been the direct contrary of this from beginning to end, for he had not the means of influencing any person in the county—he had neither directly nor indirectly interfered in the election. If he had had the means of so doing, it might be another question; and for this reason—that having a most cordial personal attachment to the noble lord's opponent, the gallant admiral, he should be proud of having it in his power to serve him. Was there any disgrace in opposing the noble lord? If that were a disgrace, it was a satisfaction to him that he should share it with a majority of the freeholders of Lanarkshire. The noble lord had talked of the interference of the peerage. Did the noble lord dispute, that the noble duke, his father, finding that the contest was likely to turn out not very successfully for the party whom he supported, had not been satisfied with the fair votes of the freeholders, but had been obliged to make out of his great estate in the county of Lanark 80 votes, called paper or parchment votes*, to himself in the election of members to serve for the commons in parliament, except only any peer of Ireland at such elections in Great Britain respectively, where such peer shall appear as a candidate, or by himself or any others be proposed to be elected; or for any lord lieutenant, or governor of any county, to avail himself of any authority derived from his commission, to influence the election of any member to serve for the commons in parliament.

"That if it shall appear that any person hath procured himself to be elected or returned a member of this house, or endeavoured so to be, by bribery, or any other corrupt practices, this house will proceed with the utmost severity against such person." (See page 64.)

* In order to explain what is meant by paper or parchment votes, the Editor will extract one or two passages from the petition, for a reform in parliament, which was presented to the house by Mr. (now Earl) Grey, in 1793, and which was framed by Mr. Tierney and other distinguished characters.—"In Scotland, the grievance arising from the nature of the rights of voting, has a different and still more intolerable operation. In that great and populous division of the kingdom, not only the great mass of the householders, but of the landholders also are excluded from all participation in the choice of representatives. By the remains of the feudal system in the counties, the vote is severed from the land, and attached to what is called the superiority. In other words, it is taken from the substance, and transferred to the shadow, because, though each of these superiorities must, with very few exceptions, arise from lands of the present annual value of four hundred pounds sterling, yet it is not necessary that the lands should do more than give a name to the superiority, the possessor of which may retain the right of voting notwithstanding he be divested of the property. And on the other hand, great landholders have the means afforded them by the same system, of adding to their influence, without expense to themselves, by communicating to their confidential friends the privilege of electing members to serve in parliament. The process by which this operation is performed is simple. He who wishes to increase the number of his dependent votes, surrenders his charter to the crown, and, parcelling out his estate into as many secure the election of the noble lord? Was not this an interference of a peer of the realm in the election for a county? Had the noble lord rested on the free and independent interest, he would not have referred to such matters.—There was no evidence whatever to implicate Lord Douglas in the conduct of Ferguson, and he thought that they ought not to agree to the motion. Of the name of Ferguson he had never heard till that day. He would admit, that they were bound to proceed against that individual in some way or other, if guilty. But he thought that it was not desirable, that that individual should be brought to the bar, that he might be afterwards prosecuted on his own statements.

Mr. Brougham said, that, among the old sayings, for which the right hon. gentleman opposite, (Mr. Dundas) seemed to have a strong predilection, there was this—"there is nothing new under the sun." But, notwithstanding such high authority, he would venture to say, that he had heard that night such a code of the privileges of that house, from the learned lord, as he believed, was quite new to every member; for every chapter of that code contained nothing which any one had ever heard any thing of before. He had heard from the learned lord, that they ought not to call Ferguson to the bar, because the motion referred to the conduct of Lord Douglas, and this motion was not consonant with the notice, and that the noble lord was therefore precluded from taking up a question of privilege, which could not be taken up without notice. Now, he thought it had been known to the whole house, that, in a question of privilege, all notice was superfluous; he should have thought it was known to the learned lord himself, that every member had a right to bring in a matter of privilege without notice; and that, on going up to the table of the house, and producing the letter, or other voucher, by which it was evident that a breach of privilege had been committed, the house were bound to entertain the motion. Had the noble lord, therefore, gone up to the table without notice, and produced the letter, the house were bound to entertain the motion, and to give it precedency of all other orders or notices. But the novelty did not stop here. Ferguson, it seemed, ought not to be called to the bar of the house, because his noble friend having probably turned over in his mind the questions which he should put to him, Ferguson might criminate himself. He supposed that his noble friend knew the questions which he should put—at least he knew that he would put one question to him—"Are you the author of that letter?" And if he did not answer that question, he would be committed to the custody of the serjeant at arms. And if the learned lord asked any of the gentlemen beside him—for, it seemed, he knew nothing of the matter himself—he would find, that what he had said was the greatest injustice, was not only not a new proceeding, but was, in fact, the only way they had of asserting their privileges. No man could refuse to answer the questions of the House of Commons, or, if he did, he would be committed for contempt: and he had no right to say he would not answer, because he would not criminate himself. He would be told, "whatever you confess here you do in perfect safety, except in so far as respects the offence against this house." How did it happen, when poor printers who had no peers to support them —who did not act under the authority of peers —(in that case they would probably not be called on; for that house was often a little select in this respect; and when printers, in their attacks, were so fortunate as to be supported by noble lords, they were seldom brought there; but if, without that support, they ventured to attack members, then those poor printers were sure to be before them)—how did it happen, that no one ever ventured to object to their being called to the bar of the house, and that no one ever attempted to say they ought not to answer, because they might criminate themselves? He had not been long in parliament, but he had seen several instances where a member only produced a letter or paper, and the printer or writer was immediately ordered to appear at the bar. He believed the house were a little select with respect to their persons, but such an inequality as that which was now proposed was not only unknown in practice, but had never been contemplated by any man; for, on the part of the house, it would be openly disgracing and vilifying itself in the eyes of the whole country. For what would it be saying? It would be saying, that persons had only to attack those who were opposed to his Majesty's ministers, and they would receive the support of the agents of government, and that there was nothing so atrocious which they might not do in such a case, not only with impunity, but even without inquiry or investigation*. Never lots of four hundred pounds per annum, as may be convenient, conveys them to such as he can confide in. To these, new charters are, upon application, granted by the crown, so as to erect each of them into a superiority, which privilege once obtained, the land itself is reconveyed to the original grantor; and thus the representatives of the landed interest in Scotland may be chosen by those who have no real or beneficial interest in the land.

"Such is the situation in which the counties of Scotland are placed. With respect to the burghs, every thing that bears even the semblance of popular choice, has long been done away. The election of members to serve in parliament is vested in the magistrates and town councils, who, having, by various innovations, constituted themselves into self-elected bodies, instead of officers freely chosen by the inhabitants at large, have deprived the people of all participation in that privilege, the free exercise of which affords the only security they can possess for the protection of their liberties and property."

* If such a case should arise, it might seem, perhaps, to be only a necessary consequence of the privilege which the house claim of being the sole judges till the present case had a motion of this nature been resisted on such grounds. This was what the house would bring on themselves, in the minds of all reasonable men, if they resisted the motion; but he, for one, could not bring himself to think that they would. It was unnecessary to detain the house one moment longer. The motion was confined to Ferguson—it said nothing at all respecting Lord Douglas; but even if the motion had related to Lord Douglas, that did not preclude them from inquiry. For how stood the case as to the charge against Lord Douglas? Here they had evidence primâ facie against him. And what had they against that evidence? The simple denial of Lord Douglas. This was not only no ground of defence for Lord Douglas, but every friend of Lord Douglas ought to defy Ferguson to come forward, that he might be subjected to all the inquisitorial powers of the house for the sake of the vindication of that noble lord. If he were the friend of Lord Douglas, for his sake alone he would support the motion; for they might rest assured, that to Lord Douglas a very great suspicion would attach, if no farther explanation were given with respect to his conduct.

The Lord Advocate in explanation, said, he had never stated that the house were precluded from entering into the question, because notice had not been given. What he had stated was, that the motion fell short of the notice.

Mr. Brougham said, that no member who heard what had originally fallen from the learned lord, could entertain any doubt that he had stated it correctly.

Mr. Bathurst said, the question before the house was, the conduct of a private individual, who appeared to have committed a very high breach of privilege. (Hear.) The question for their consideration was, not whether it ought to be passed over without any notice, but in what way it ought to be noticed. With respect to the mode in which this individual ought to be punished, the noble lord said, that he had not made up his mind. The general mode of proceeding in case of a breach of privilege was, to refer it to a committee of privileges. Another course was, that which had been adopted on the complaint of Sir John Packington against the bishop of Worcester, in the reign of queen Anne, in 1702. In that case, Mr. Lloyd, the son of the bishop was also complained of, and the house, after hearing the charges against them, ordered that the son should be prosecuted by the attorney-general*. The general course however was, to refer the matter to the consideration of a committee of privileges. The noble lord had very candidly admitted that an whether a particular act amounts to a libel. In matter of libel, they act as their own Counsel, Jury, and Judge; they are the accusers and the punishers; they are judges of the law, and of the fact; and the party is committed during their pleasure. In 1810, the Editor published an argument respecting the right of the house to commit for a breach of privilege in the case of a libel on the conduct of one of their members. (See Howell's State Trials, vol. viii. p. 13.) In the case of Sir F. Burdett against Mr. Abbot, the Speaker, and Mr. Colman, the Serjeant of the House, the courts of Westminster Hall decided in favour of that right. The question was afterwards brought by two writs of error into the House of Lords, where it was ably argued, by Mr. Brougham and Mr. Courtenay, for Sir F. Burdett, the plaintiff in error. The Lords, without hearing the counsel for the defendants, affirmed the judgment of the courts below. Many lawyers and statesmen, however, still entertain doubts upon this right, and it does seem, that, in some cases, (for instance, the case put above) it may defeat its own object.—The late Bishop of Landaff, in a letter to Mr. Harrison, who had written to him on the subject then in agitation, the imprisonment of Sir F. Burdett, expressed himself in these words.—"The power of expelling a member from the House of Commons is a privilege essential to the constitution of it as a House; but the committing a member, or not a member, to prison, and by military force, for a speech or writing which has not been found by a jury to be a libel, is a privilege which I cannot prove to my own satisfaction to be either necessary to the constitution of the House of Commons, or useful to the State. What the decision of the present question may be is wholly uncertain. Should it be in support of the Speaker's warrant, I think it ought to be followed by a law prohibiting such violence in future, and defining, as far as can be done, the extent of privilege; for I must ever adhere to the maxim, Ubi jus incertum ibi jus nullum." (See his Life, vol. ii. p. 403.)

* The complaint of Sir John Packington in this case was reduced to the following heads:

I. "That soon after the last parliament rose, the bishop of Worcester took upon him to send to me to desist from standing to be elected knight for that county, and to threaten me, that if I would not desist, he should think himself obliged to speak against me to his clergy.

II. "He sent some letters himself, and his secretary sent others to several of his clergy, with directions to make what interest they could against me in their several parishes, and where they could not prevail with such who voted singly for me in the last election, to give a vote for one or both the other candidates, they should desire them to stay at home; and in order to this, his lordship sent them copies of the poll of their respective parishes.

III. "He aspersed me to his clergy, branding me and my ancestors with several vices; and at his confirmation and visitations solicited his clergy to vote against me, representing me as very unfit to serve in parliament, and threatening them with his displeasure, if they did not vote against me.

IV. "He aspersed me and my ancestors to several of the laity, who were his tenants, and threatened them, that if they would not vote against me, they should never renew any estate under him, and that he would set such marks upon them, that his successors should not suffer them nor their children to renew any more.

V. "Mr. Lloyd, the bishop's son, aspersed me, and gave scandalous characters of me to several freeholders, whom he solicited to vote against me, act of parliament affected this question. Admitting, then, that the offence against this house was also an offence against the statute law of the realm, he submitted, whether it would not be better to proceed under the statute law: he suggested, whether it would not be more advisable to refer it to a committee of privileges. This, he conceived, would answer all the purposes of the motion; and if the noble lord did not think proper to adopt this course, he himself would take the liberty of moving as an amendment, "that it be referred to the consideration of the committee of privileges to examine the matter of the said complaint, and to report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the house."

Lord A. Hamilton said, that as his only object was to have the question fully investigated, he had no objection to the amendment.

Mr. Bathurst begged to understand, whether the noble lord intended to withdraw his motion?

Mr. Speaker said, it would be proper to put the original question, and then to state the amendment which the hon. member had moved.

This being done—

Lord A. Hamilton rose, and begged to offer a few words in reply. He said, he was not aware of having stated this as a party question, nor of having stated it unfairly (hear, hear.) He had brought it forward on general grounds, as a high breach of the privileges of that house; and the right hon. gentleman opposite must feel some disappointment that the house had and told them I voted for bringing in a French government.

VI. "The bishop's secretary aspersed me to several freeholders in the like manner, representing me as unfit to sit in the house, threatening them with the bishop's displeasure; and said, they might as well vote for the Prince of Wales as for me."

Upon a full hearing of the whole matter, the house came to the following resolutions:

"Resolved, nem. con. That Sir John Packington has by evidence fully made out the charge which he exhibited against the lord bishop of Worcester.

"Resolved, nem. con. That Sir John Packington has by evidence fully made out the charge against Mr. Lloyd, the said lord bishop's son.

"Resolved, That it appears to this house, that the proceedings of William lord bishop of Worcester, his son, and his agents, in order to the hindering the election of a member for the county of Worcester, has been malicious, unchristian, and arbitrary, in high violation of the liberties and privileges of the commons of England."

"Resolved, That an humble address be presented to her Majesty, that she will be graciously pleased to remove William lord bishop of Worcester from being lord almoner to her Majesty."

"Ordered, That the said resolution and address, be presented to her Majesty by such members of this house as are of her Majesty's most honourable privy-council. 2. That the further consideration of the matter relating to the lord bishop of Worcester, be adjourned till this day se'nnight. 3. That Mr. attorney-general do prosecute Mr. Lloyd, the lord bishop of Worcester's son, for the said offences, after his privilege as a member of the lower house of convocation is out."

Nov. 20. Mr. Comptroller reported to the house, that their resolution and address to her Majesty for the removing of William lord bishop of Worcester, from being lord almoner to her Majesty, had been presented to her Majesty; and that her Majesty was pleased to give this most gracious answer:

"I am very sorry that there is occasion for this address against the bishop of Worcester: I shall order and direct, that he shall no longer continue to supply the place of almoner, but I will put another in his room to perform that office."

Resolved, That the most humble thanks of this house be returned to her Majesty, for her Majesty's most gracious answer to their address relating to William lord bishop of Worcester.

Ordered, That Mr. Comptroller of her Majesty's household, do return the said most humble thanks of this house to her Majesty.

Nov. 21. The Speaker acquainted the house, that there had been with him that morning, the prolocutor of the lower house of convocation, and also the dean of Canterbury, arch-deacon Ottley, and Mr. Moor, and had brought him the following order:

Nov. 20, Ordered, "That the prolocutor, the dean of Canterbury, arch-deacon Ottley, and Mr. Moor, do attend Mr. Speaker of the honourable house of commons, and return our most humble thanks to him, and to that honourable house, for the great favour to the church and convocation, which they had on all occasions been pleased to express, and particularly for that late regard which they of themselves, without suggestion, were pleased to have to the privilege of this house, in the case of one of our members, who had the misfortune to fall under their displeasure."

Upon this the house passed a resolution, That they would upon all occasions, assert the just rights of the lower house of convocation.

The lords, alarmed at these proceedings of the commons, against a member of their house, agreed upon the following address to the queen, "That it was the undoubted right of every lord of parliament, and of every subject of England, to have an opportunity of making his defence, before he suffers any sort of punishment; and therefore humbly desired her majesty, that she would be pleased not to remove the lord bishop of Worcester from the place of lord almoner, nor to shew any mark of her displeasure towards him, till he be found guilty of some crime by due course of law." This address being presented to the queen, she returned answer, "That she agreed, that every peer and lord of parliament, and indeed every other person, ought to have an opportunity of being heard to any matters objected against him, before he be punished. That she had not yet received any complaint of the bishop of Worcester, but she looked upon it as her undoubted right to continue or displace any servant attending upon her own person, when she should think it proper." The lords, upon this answer, resolved the same day unanimously, "That no lord of their house ought to suffer any sort of punishment by any proceedings of the house of commons, otherwise than according to the known and ancient rules and methods of parliament."

not got rid of the question on the simple denial of the noble lord. He was not aware of having departed from the notice which he had originally given: he had stated on the former night, that the matter of charge regarded the interference of a noble lord with the privileges of that house, but he had never said, that the matter rested exclusively with that noble lord. It had been attempted to rebut this charge by an assertion, that, at a former period of his life, he had had no objection to aristocratical influence, and that, in fact, it had been exercised for him. To this he would reply, that he was not responsible for the conduct of others, and that whatever had occurred fifteen or sixteen years ago, should have been made matter of complaint at the time, instead of being now raked up to defend other acts of impropriety. There was, however, a great distinction between the two acts. The mere personal request or solicitation of an individual bore no resemblance to such an influence as that of which he now complained, which was palpably corrupt, and went to destroy the rights of the electors. The learned lord had said, that he had not exercised any influence, because he had none to tender—this was certainly a very sufficient reason. He had also alluded to the manner in which electors were made in Scotland, but he at the same time well knew, that there was no other mode of contesting a county election in that country than by creating these paper or parchment votes; for a man might have 20,000*l.* a year in land, and yet not be entitled to vote.—The noble lord concluded by acceding to the amendment, which was accordingly put and carried.

It was then proposed, that the committee should sit and proceed on the matter of the said complaint on Monday.

Mr. Tierney suggested, that as no time should be lost on such an inquiry, the committee ought to sit to-morrow.

Mr. Wynn expressed the same opinion.

Mr. Bathurst said, he had no objection to this proposal.

Lord A. Hamilton wished to know, whether he should have the liberty of suggesting to the committee what queries should be put to the witnesses? He asked this question, as his name did not stand on the committee of privileges.

Mr. Bathurst observed, that although certain members only were named on the committee, yet it was open to all knights of the shire, gentlemen of the long robe, and merchants of the house.

Mr. Speaker admitted that this was the case, as appeared by the standing orders moved on the opening of the session (see p. 63); but it would be better, perhaps, that the name of the noble lord should be added to the committee.

This was accordingly done, and the committee were ordered to sit to-morrow.

POLICE OF THE METROPOLIS.] Mr. Shaw Lefevre, Mr. Alderman Wood, Mr. Blair, Mr. Mellish, and Mr. Byng, were added to the committee.

ORDNANCE ESTIMATES.] The house having resolved itself into a committee of supply, to which the ordnance estimates were referred,

Mr. R. Ward said, he would not trespass long upon their attention. A variety of regulations and retrenchments had taken place within the last year in the department of the master-general, and there was only a single addition in one particular branch. The general outline of the establishment for the current year as compared with the peace establishment of 1788, presented an augmentation of only 47,000*l.* which, considering the extended nature of the present service, was an extremely small addition, and at once shewed the pains that had been taken to make every possible reduction. He would reserve any explanations till they should be called for, as the estimates were read. He therefore moved, "that a sum not exceeding 596,469*l.* 1*s.* 8*d.* be granted to his Majesty, in full, for the charge of the office of Ordnance for Land Service in Great Britain for the year 1818."

Mr. Bennet wished to say a few words in behalf of a class of officers whom he could not but consider very hardly treated—he meant those of the drivers' corps. After very long service they had been put upon half pay, without any chance of being ever again called upon to act. There was a captain Humphries, who had served for three and twenty years' in a most meritorious way, and in different parts of the world. He was now reduced to 6*s.* 8*d.* a day, while officers, not of three years' standing, had retired upon full pay. There was this difference between the officers of the drivers' corps and others, that the former could not be restored to full pay by the commander-in-chief. The same observation might be made with respect to the Irish artillery. The officers of one of the Irish artillery corps had, after a long service, been dismissed upon half pay, while those of another corps had their choice either to continue in the army, or to retire upon full pay. He trusted that something would be done to meliorate the condition of the gentlemen to whom he had alluded.

Mr. Benson concurred in the sentiments expressed by his hon. friend. He hoped, that whatever might be required for those meritorious officers, as a reward for their services, would be granted with that liberality which had been always evinced.

Mr. Ward said, that the corps of artillery drivers had increased during the late war to 7,000 men, who were divided into twelve troops, with twelve captains and other officers. They had deserved well of their country, and distinguished themselves on every occasion, as far as the nature of their service allowed. It was not, therefore, for any fault of theirs that they were reduced: they had experienced the same fate as the army. Eight troops had been reduced out of the twelve, and put on half-pay. When, after the campaign of 1815, a fresh organization of the remaining four troops had taken place, as they were still retained, full pay was given to the officers who retired, and from that arrangement there had been no deviation. If captain Humphries was in one of those four troops, and did not receive full pay, he was not in the situation in which it was intended he should be placed, and he might not only claim his full pay, but its arrears. But if he belonged to one of the eight troops which had been reduced, he was not entitled to more than half-pay.

Mr. Bennet and Mr. Benson again observed, that the case of those officers, who had served so many years, was very hard. The latter stated, that a promise had been made, that they should retire upon half pay.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that there were a great number of situations in which ministers were placed, in which it was very difficult and delicate to regulate their conduct. In the present instance, it was a matter of doubt whether the officers in question should be favoured beyond the usual rule of the service. If the case, as had been stated, was one in which a promise had been made, that would, no doubt, be fulfilled; but if the merits and services of the persons concerned were the foundation of their claim, he was sure the noble lord on whom such cases depended for decision would give the matter every consideration that could be given to such affairs. He submitted, whether it would not be better to allow the case, after what had been stated, to be considered by the noble lord, and to leave him to decide on it as its merits demanded. It would still be equally open to be brought forward at any future period in the way of address, or in any other way that might appear proper.

Mr. Ward said, he was extremely anxious to do any thing he could on the subject; but with respect to a promise, it was in his opinion impossible that any could have been made, except with regard to the four troops he had mentioned. It was true that they could not return to any other military service; but certainly, no promise had been given to them. If the reduction had been expected, and notified the usual time before it took place, the officers alluded to suffered no more hardship than was suffered by a great number every year.

Mr. Bennet thought there was no reason why the officers of artillery drivers should not have the advantages of other officers. They were discharged, and it was said to them "there is an end of you." Their case was an entire anomaly; and unless the hon. gentleman could produce an instance of officers retiring without a chance of returning to service, he had adduced no case in point.

The resolution was then agreed to: after which, the following resolutions were severally put, and carried.

"That a sum, not exceeding 28,419*l.* 17*s.* 2*d.* be granted to his Majesty, for defraying the expense of services performed by the office of ordnance for land service for Great Britain, and not provided for by parliament, in the year 1817."

"That a sum, not exceeding 115,609*l.* 19*s.* 11*d.* be granted to his Majesty for the charge of the office of ordnance for Ireland, for the year 1818."

"That a sum, not exceeding 233,408*l.* 2*s.* be granted to his Majesty, for the charge of the office of ordnance for Great Britain, on account of the allowances to superannuated, retired, and half-pay officers, to officers for good services, and to wounded officers, to superannuated and disabled men; also for pensions to widows and children of deceased officers late belonging to the several ordnance military corps, for the year 1818."

"That a sum, not exceeding 11,406*l.* 14*s.* 3*d.* be granted to his Majesty, for the charge of the office of ordnance in Ireland, on account of the pay of retired officers of the late Irish artillery and engineers, and of pensions to widows of deceased officers of the same, for the year 1818."

"That a sum, not exceeding 10,394*l.* 7*s.* 10*d.* be granted to his Majesty, for defraying the expense of the allowances to superannuated and half-pay officers, to superannuated and disabled men, and also for pensions to widows of deceased officers late belonging to the several ordnance military corps in Great Britain, and not provided for by parliament, in the year 1817."

"That a sum, not exceeding 29,727*l.* 13*s.* 8*d.* be granted to his Majesty, for the charge of allowances, compensations, and emoluments, in the nature of superannuated or retired allowances, to persons late belonging to the office of ordnance in Great Britain, in respect of their having held any public offices or employments of a civil nature, and also for the charge of widows' pensions, for the year 1818."

"That a sum, not exceeding 4,164*l.* 6*s.* 3*d.* be granted to his Majesty, for the charge of allowances, compensations, and emoluments, in the nature of superannuated or retired allowances to persons late belonging to the office of ordnance in Ireland, in respect of their having held any public offices or employments of a civil nature, and also for the charge of widows' pensions, for the year 1818."

"That a sum, not exceeding 5,000*l.*, be granted to his Majesty, for repairing damages done to the sea walls at Portsmouth and Haslar by the late violent storm."

BANK RESTRICTION BILL.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer brought in the Bank Restriction Continuance Bill.—It was read a first time, and ordered to be read a second time on Friday next.

BANKERS' NOTES BILL.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer brought in the Bankers' Notes

Bill.—It was read a first time, and ordered to be read a second time on Monday the 20th of April.

SURGERY REGULATION BILL.] The following petition of the Royal College of Surgeons in Ireland, was presented and read. "That the petitioners having seen the copy of a bill for regulating the practice of surgery throughout the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, lately introduced into the house, humbly beg leave to submit the following statement; the petitioners are far from objecting to the principle of the bill, so far as it is calculated to restrain persons from practising surgery for lucre or profit, whose qualifications and fitness thereto have not been ascertained by a competent tribunal; and it is manifestly just and expedient that all regularly educated surgeons should be placed on an equal footing in any and every part of his Majesty's dominions; but the petitioners humbly submit, that the power of granting diplomas on the mere test of an examination is liable to much abuse, and it was upon the proof that such abuses did actually exist, that his Majesty was graciously pleased to grant letters patent bearing date the 11th of February 1784, constituting certain persons therein named a corporation, by the title of the Royal College of Surgeons in Ireland, empowering the court of examiners of the said college, to grant letters testimonial, or diploma, but restraining them from admitting to an examination for such diploma any person who had not served an apprenticeship, for the full term of five years, to a regularly-educated surgeon; although the petitioners have every reason to be satisfied with the result of a regulation, which, by obliging the student in surgery to devote a suitable portion of his time to the study of the various duties of his profession, assures to him, at least, the opportunity of acquiring knowledge, still they are far from affirming that this mode of surgical education is exclusively to be preferred; they observe however with pleasure, that the principle of education by apprenticeship has been fully recognized by the other colleges, and has uniformly been acted upon by those able surgeons who administer the public hospitals of London, and whose talents and acquirements have illustrated the character of British surgery in every quarter of the civilized world; the petitioners humbly submit to the consideration of the house, that the Royal Colleges of Surgeons of London, Edinburgh, and Dublin, cannot be considered as being placed upon a footing of equality, so long as the Dublin college is restrained from granting of diplomas, except upon a service of five years, while the colleges of London and Edinburgh have the power of granting them at their discretion; in such a state of things, it is obvious that the Royal Colleges of London and Edinburgh can at any time assure to themselves a monopoly, not only in the granting of diplomas, but in the education of candidates, since a legal qualification to practise will always be sought where it can be obtained at the least expense of time, labour, and money; if, on the other hand, it should be deemed advisable so to alter the charter of the Royal College of Surgeons in Ireland, as to place all the colleges upon an equality, in respect to the power of granting diplomas, the petitioners humbly submit that such an arrangement would, by increasing the facilities of obtaining a mere legal qualification to practise, eventually give rise to a competition between the colleges, which would lower the standard of professional attainment in the empire; it has been stated, that the competency of the candidate can be ascertained by the test of an examination, and that the skill and integrity of the examiners stand as a defence between the candidate and the public; but to this the petitioners humbly beg leave to object, first, that as surgery must be considered in the light of a practical art, as well as of a science, that oral examination can scarcely be considered a test of professional competency; secondly, that it is proved by experience, that tests of this kind have a strong tendency to degenerate into matters of mere form, inasmuch as the indolence, if not the good-nature of mankind, in affairs which do not touch their interests or their passions, lead them insensibly to mitigate the strictness of their scrutiny; thirdly, that, strong as they feel in the rectitude of their own motives, the petitioners would nevertheless decline being placed in a situation in which their interests might too frequently be found in opposition to their duty; and they feel themselves strengthened in this decision from having observed, that in another country, in which medical degrees have been conferred upon the mere test of an examination, that a competition among the universities has produced the dangerous abuse of granting diplomas for a certain consideration to persons residing in a distant country, and of whose professional qualifications the examiners could have no knowledge; in proof and illustration of the ill consequences which must result from equalizing the privileges annexed to diplomas obtained upon unequal terms of service; the petitioners are prepared to adduce evidence before the house, that there are at this moment in Ireland persons possessed of diplomas from the Royal College in London, who have obtained them within a period of eighteen months from the commencement of their professional education, and who have never within the course of that time enjoyed the advantage of attending to the practice of a public hospital; should the proposed bill pass into a law, such persons would be eligible to the situations of surgeons to county infirmaries; and it is well known that the appointment to such situations is conferred by persons who are, from their situations in life, unable to appreciate the professional attainments of the candidates, and to whom a legal qualification to practise must be considered as a sufficient title to their confidence; the petitioners therefore humbly pray, that if it shall be deemed expedient to place the surgical profession in Ireland upon a different footing from that in which it was placed by the charter of incorporation of the year 1784, that the house will, in its wisdom, provide that the qualifications necessary for becoming a candidate, and the amount of the fee paid on receiving the diploma, shall be equalized in the United Kingdom, and shall be regulated by law."

Mr. Courtenay then moved the second reading of this bill. The hon. member animadverted on the danger of suffering ignorant and unqualified persons to practise, since but a small proportion of the public could form a correct opinion of their talents and abilities. He thought the present bill was adapted to obviate this danger.

Sir C. Monck thought, that the adoption of this measure would be inconsistent with justice and sound judgment, as well as with the conduct of that house, which had recently abolished the restrictions imposed by the laws of Elizabeth, upon the subject of trade. He was not among those who deprecated the policy of the laws which subjected to a pecuniary penalty those who set up particular trades, without having served an apprenticeship to them: such laws were, in his opinion, necessary to secure to society persons of competent skill in the mechanical professions. But it had recently become the fashion to deprecate those laws, and, therefore, they were repealed about four years ago*. Would it, then, become parliament, after acceding to that repeal, upon the ground of removing undue restrictions, to adopt

* That part of the act of the 5th of Elizabeth which prevented persons from exercising certain trades without having served an apprenticeship, was repealed by the 54th Geo. III. c. 96, which, however, contains a saving clause as to the customs of the city of London.

The hon. baronet remarks, that it had recently become the fashion to deprecate the statute of apprentices. With great submission, it may be observed, that the impolicy of that act was seen and acknowledged above a century ago.

3d Modern Reports, p. 317.—Judge Dolben said, that "no encouragement was ever given to prosecutions upon the statute 5 Eliz. and that it would be for the common good if it were repealed; for no greater punishment could be to the seller, than to expose to sale goods ill-wrought, for by such means he would never sell more."

2 Salk. 613. The Queen v. Maddox.—It was held by the court, "that upon indictments on the statute of 5 Eliz. the following of a trade for seven years was sufficient without any binding; this being a hard law."—And so held in Lord Raymond, 738.

Rennard and Chase, Brewers, 1 Bur. Rep. p. 2. —Lord Mansfield. "It hath been well observed that this act (viz. 5 Eliz. cap. 4.) is, 1. A penal law. 2. It is a restraint on natural right. 3. It is contrary to the general right given by the common law of this kingdom. 4. The policy upon which this act was made, is from experience become doubtful. Bad and unskilful workmen are rarely prosecuted. This act was made early in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, when the great number of manufacturers, who took refuge in England after the Duke of Alva's persecution, had brought trade and commerce with them, and enlarged our notions. The restraint introduced by this law has been thought unfavourable; and the judges, by a liberal interpretation, have extended the qualification for exercising the trade much beyond the letter of it, and confined the penalty and prohibition to cases precisely within the express letter."

Accordingly, it was held by the courts, that the 5th of Eliz. did not affect a trade which was not in existence at or prior to that time. In a qui tam action, Pride v. Stubbs, (reported in the 2d vol. of Campbell's cases at Nisi Prius, p. 397.) Lord Ellenborough said, that it did not extend to the trade of coachmaking, as "the trade of a coachmaker did not exist in England in the 5th of Elizabeth. The Queen went on horseback to open the very parliament at which this statute passed; and she used frequently afterwards, on occasions of state, to ride behind the Earl of Leicester. Coaches were not known in England till the middle of Elizabeth's reign."

Burn's Justice.—"So detrimental was this statute thought, that by 15 Car. II. all persons spinning or making cloth of hemp or flax, or nets for fishing, or storm or cordage, might exercise those trades without serving apprenticeships.—And so little did the legislature, at subsequent periods, think that any benefit was to be derived from the statute of 5 Elizabeth; or that manufactures were made better, or improved by this restraint;—and the minds of men being more liberal, that trade should, as much as possible, be flung open; it was enacted, by 6 and 7 W. III. that any apprentice discovering two persons guilty of coining, so as they are convicted, shall be deemed a freeman, and may exercise his trade as if he had served out his time."

And, in order still stronger to shew how little the legislature thought that the seven years' binding improved manufactures, it was enacted, by 3 Geo. III. cap. 8. that "all officers, mariners, and soldiers who have been employed in his Majesty's service, and not deserted, may exercise such trades as they are apt for, in any town or place."

So dangerous and fatal had been the evil of combinations and conspiracies amongst journeymen, that, in particular instances, as in trades where many hands were required and very little skill, as dying, and such like, the legislature made express laws to give relief to masters. The 17 Geo. III. cap. 33; enabled dyers, in Middlesex, Essex, Surrey, and Kent, to employ journeymen who had not served apprenticeships.—And to such a pitch had this mischief, in the West Riding of Yorkshire increased, by the conspiracies facilitated by the 5th of Eliz. that it went to the total annihilation of our staple manufactures, and every other trade, which hoped for success not only by the home, but from foreign consumption.——See the report from the committee of the House of Commons, on the woollen trade and manufacture of these kingdoms, on the 4th of July 1806.

Lord Coke says: "At the common law, no man could be prohibited from working in any lawful trade; for the law abhors idleness, the mother of all evil—Otium omnium vitiorum Mater—and especially in young men, who ought in their youth (which is their seed time) to learn lawful sciences and trades, a measure which proposed to invest certain corporations with the power of deciding who should or should not practise surgery? Such restrictions could only be tolerated upon the ground that it was necessary to provide against unskilful practitioners; but no such necessity was shewn to exist; and if it existed, how did this bill propose to remedy the evil? Why, merely by making it obligatory upon persons to submit to an examination before certain colleges. But what guarantee did such examination afford to the public for competent practitioners? The usual examination before the college of surgeons was conducted in a very loose and slovenly manner. Then, as to the college of surgeons in Edinburgh, the fee for a testimonial or diploma there was, in the first stage, about 30*l.*; but, in a subsequent stage, the fees required were 250*l.*, and those fees were exacted by the mere by-law, or internal authority of the college. Was the house, under all these circumstances, prepared to compel every candidate for the practice of surgery, to appeal to these colleges, and to depend upon their will for the right to pursue his profession? He had no objection to a law to regulate the practice of surgery, and to prevent the evil of improper practitioners; but he thought the hon. mover had begun at the wrong end; for, instead of proposing a measure at the instance of the public, for whose benefit such a measure ought to be adopted, he brought it forward at the instance of the college of surgeons of London, whose benefit it was calculated to promote.—He should therefore move as an amendment "that the bill be read a second time this day six months."

Mr. W. Dundas stated, that the fee required by the college of surgeons of Edinburgh, from a person desiring to practise as a licentiate, was only 5*l.*; but that any one requiring (and this was wholly voluntary) to be admitted as a member of that corporation, which admission would entitle him to certain advantages for himself, his widow, and his children, was called upon to pay 250*l.* for the benefit of the general fund.

Captain Waldegrave mentioned a case which had come to his knowledge, and which seemed, in his opinion, to shew the necessity of making some provision that the people should not be exposed to the danger of incompetent medical practitioners. This case had occurred in his own neighbourhood, (Bedford) where, upon the regular surgeons refusing to inoculate for the small pox, conceiving vaccination preferable, some people were, through prejudice and imposition, induced to apply to chemists, and other unqualified persons, who inoculated for the small pox, and the consequence was, that the contagion spread so rapidly, that, in one parish, 800 persons were infected by it.

Mr. Peel reprobated the idea of legislating upon a single fact, however respectably authenticated. He entertained insuperable objections to the regulation proposed by his hon. friend. In the first place, he considered it as raising an obstruction to the free exercise to which every man in this country was entitled, of his own abilities in that way for which he deemed himself best qualified. As far as the bill applied, as a measure of regulation to Ireland, he believed it to be quite unnecessary. The effect of a measure like the present, would only be, in his opinion, to make the payment of a fee, the amount of which must continue in the discretion of the constituent body, the ultimate test of adequate qualifications. With respect, indeed, to Ireland, he believed that the system of probation established there was the best that could be devised, requiring, like the ordinances of the English universities, a certain period of residence. independent of other circumstances, and of oral examination. In the course of his own experience in that country he had never heard any complaint of want of skill in the practitioners of surgery; and another objection which he felt to this bill was, its necessary operation in confining the practice of midwifery to regular surgeons to the exclusion of women*.

which are profitable to the commonwealth, whereof they might reap the benefit in their old age; for "idle in youth, poor in age."

And therefore the common law abhors all monopolies, which prohibit any from working in any lawful trade. And that appears in 2 Hen. V 5. b — A dyer was bound not to use the dyer's craft for two years: and there Judge Hall held "that the bond was against the common law; and by G—d if the plaintiff was there, he should go to prison till he paid a fine to the King." And see 7 Edw. III 65 b. "And, if he who takes upon himself to work is unskilful, his ignorance is a sufficient punishment to him. for Imperitia est maxima mecanicorum pœna et quilibet quærit in quâlibet arte peritos:—which is, that want of skill is the greatest punishment of mechanics; for every body will employ those who are the best skilled in their business. And, if any on takes upon himself to work, and spoils it, an action on the case lies against him."

* It appears singular, when we consider the instinctive modesty of the sex, that midwifery should be so little practised by women. It must have been difficult at first, to deviate from employing females in a department to which decency seems peculiarly to have allotted them. In those parts of the world where science was first cultivated, the practice was solely committed to women. That the ancient Hebrew and Egyptian matrons employed their own sex on these occasions, is evident from Genesis, ch. 38. ver. 27, and Exodus, ch. 1. ver. 15. With respect to the Greeks, Dr. Potter informs us that the ancient Athenians used none but women midwives, it being forbidden by one of their laws, that women or slaves should have any concern in the study or practice of physic. This proving very fatal to many women, whose modesty suffered them not to entrust themselves in the hands of men one Agnodice disguised herself in man's clothes, to study physic under a professor called Herophilus: and having attained to

He believed that the present bill was the child of the late attorney-general, who transferred it to the hon. and learned mover, by whom, with all his paternal care for the bantling, it had not, he was sorry to say, been much amended or improved.

Sir John Newport was averse to the bill, on the ground of its tendency to destroy competition, and to reduce the ultimate test of ability to the payment of an arbitrary fee. The examination would become a mere formality.

Mr. Courtenay said, he was not disposed to press the bill against the sense of the house.

Mr. D. Gilbert said, that, although he considered the present measure objectionable, he thought that some plan should be devised to guard against those abuses, which, he feared, were too general.

General Hart said, that this was one of the most exceptionable measures ever submitted to parliament. Its framers might with equal propriety have demanded, that the surgeons of the united kingdom should pass through a certain turnpike and pay toll, in order to qualify them for the exercise of their functions, as to regulate their efficiency by such a test as was now proposed.

The amendment was then carried, by which the Bill was lost.

EMPLOYMENT OF THE POOR.] Mr. Alderman Wood rose to move for leave to bring in a bill for the encouragement of the fisheries, manufactures, and commerce of the united kingdom. His object was to promote the employment of labour in the different branches of industry pointed out in the title of the bill.

Mr. Speaker said, that no motion of this nature could be entertained, unless it grew out of some proceeding by a committee of the whole house.

Mr. Alderman Wood then altered the terms of his motion, and moved, that the subject matter of his bill be submitted to the consideration of a committee of the whole house.

Mr. Grenfell observed, that as far as he understood the nature of his hon. friend's bill, it was not merely to amend the acts which regulated the Irish trade and fisheries; but, by extending the main provisions of those acts to this country, to do away with the 6th of George I. for preventing the formation of joint stock companies, and to innovate considerably on the whole commercial system of Great Britain. The bill, as it appeared to him, would, if passed, enable any number of individuals to form themselves into a joint stock company, and to enter upon any undertaking, on the mere responsibility of each subscriber, to the amount of his interest or share in such undertaking. He was aware that such a law had beneficially existed with respect to Ireland; but in every view which he could take of the subject, he could not but regard it as so extremely inapplicable to the situation of this part of the empire, that he felt it his duty to intimate to his hon. friend that he should oppose it in every stage.

Mr. Alderman Wood said, he was desirous that the bill should be brought in, if it were merely for the purpose of examining in a committee the proposed amendments of the acts of the 21st, 22d, and 26th of the king relating to Ireland.

Mr. Grenfell observed, that all he had meant to say was, that the bill was entirely new, as far as it went to legislate for England.

Sir J. Newport wished the question to be entertained, without expressing at the present moment any decided opinion on its merits. From his own knowledge, he was satisfied that such companies had proved very beneficial to Ireland, in encouraging the employment of capital.

Mr. Finlay observed, that a similar practice prevailed abroad, but here he was convinced that it would be attended with the greatest possible disadvantage to trade and commerce. He hoped the worthy alderman would so separate the two objects, that if what related to England were rejected, that which related to Ireland might remain.

Mr. D. Gilbert considered the measure to be one which would affect a fundamental principle in our commercial system, and, therefore, it would require the most deliberate attention of the house.

The motion for a committee was then appointed for Monday next.

SCOTCH BURGHS.] The Lord Advocate rose

a competent skill in that art, she revealed herself to her own sex, who agreed with one consent to employ none besides her. The rest of the faculty, displeased at their want of business, cited her before the court of Areopagus, as one that corrupted men's wives. To obviate this accusation, she discovered her sex; upon which the faculty prosecuted her with great eagerness, as violating the laws, and encroaching upon the prerogative of the men; when, to prevent her ruin, the principal matrons of the city came into court, and addressed themselves to the judges, telling them, "that they were not husbands, but enemies, who were going to condemn the person to whom they owed their lives." Upon this the Athenians repealed the old law, and permitted free women to undertake this employment. (Antiq. of Greece, vol. 2. p. 324.)—With regard to the Romans, we find that the word obstetrix and the word medica are synonymous in the books of the ancient lawyers. "Quoties de prægnatione dubitatur, quinque obstetrices, id est medicæ, ventrem jubentur inspicere." (Ulpian, lib. 1.) Dr. Freind says, that Paulus (who lived in the seventh century, and who is the last of the Greek classical physicians) seems to be the first instance upon record, of a professed man-midwife, for so he was called by the Arabians, and accordingly he begins his book with disorders incident to pregnant women. (Hist. of Physic. v. 1. p. 159.) In latter times, the obstetrick art has been exercised chiefly by men; but, in France, midwives are very generally employed. They are called sages femmes, and are regularly educated for their office.

to move for leave to bring in a bill to regulate the funds of the Royal Burghs of Scotland. He observed, that this measure would partially revive the obsolete laws of that country, which called the magistrates to account for the revenues of the burghs in the court of exchequer. In addition to this, it would oblige them to submit their accounts annually, and empower the burgesses, if they saw grounds of an improvident expenditure, to make representations to the court, which, on the complaint of five burgesses, would be authorized to control the payments. He would, therefore, move "that leave be given to bring in a bill for better regulating the mode of accounting for the common good and revenues of the Royal Burghs of Scotland, and for controlling and preventing the undue expenditure thereof."

Lord Archibald Hamilton congratulated the house, and more particularly the country with which he was immediately connected, that, at length, after all the petitions which had been presented, all the complaints of abuse and bankruptcy, the learned lord admitted, what before he had uniformly denied, that the Royal Burghs had very just reason to complain of serious injuries. For more than thirty years Scotland had been asking this boon of the house: but no longer ago than last session, the learned lord had denied that there was any necessity for the measure. He was rejoiced that redress would be afforded at last, but he considered it redress of a very partial nature. The complaints had been, not only that the burghs had no control over their funds, that they were dissipated, and rendered unavailing; but that the burgesses had no voice or control in the election of the magistrates, who disposed of their funds and property. That grievance, it seemed, the learned lord meant to leave wholly untouched. He regretted that the noble lord had so long delayed his measure. Two months ago, he (lord Hamilton) had stated his intention of calling the house to a consideration of the subject at large; (see page 400), but he gave up his intention, in consequence of the learned lord stating, that he had long had it in contemplation to introduce a measure of this nature; yet, from that time to the present, they had heard nothing on the subject, and this bill seemed to embrace only a part of the evil—it did not reach the self-election of magistrates, in some cases for life, and the dissipation of the funds consequent on that self-election. The learned lord had spoken of statutes that were unoperative. Why were they unoperative? Because they were overwhelmed by the corruption which marked the burghs in Scotland, and which now called for this measure. Corruption had long been continued; and from it those abuses, which the learned lord now meant partially to remedy, had proceeded. He hoped the learned lord would have the bill circulated among those who, like himself, were deeply interested in the measure. In conclusion, the noble lord inquired whether the bill had been submitted to the judges of Scotland, as he had understood it would be; and, also, what period the learned lord meant to give, before he moved the second reading?

The Lord Advocate replied, that no one was responsible for this measure but himself. A noble friend of his, (lord Castlereagh) had stated, that the judges would be consulted; but the bill had not been submitted to them, though the opinions of others had been requested, that it might not come in a crude shape before the house. That was the reason of the delay that had taken place, together with some peculiar circumstances that affected himself. He had said, that the measure had been long in contemplation, but he denied that he had said it had been long in contemplation, and then delayed. As to statutes in abeyance, (hear, hear, from Sir J. Newport,) he excused the hon. baronet, he could not know the law of Scotland; but the noble lord knew that there were ancient statutes in Scotland, which, by non-observance ceased to be operative. (Lord Archibald Hamilton said, he had not denied, but only regretted it.) The complaint of delay was without foundation: he had never stated that the measure would go to alter the ancient constitution of the burghs, but only to regulate their funds; he had given due notice of this; those, therefore, who complained of having been misled and delayed, might have brought forward a measure with other objects, if they had thought proper. He had never stated that the royal burghs had nothing to complain of: what he had said, he was still prepared to maintain, namely, that it was impossible to introduce any general measure to regulate the election of magistrates in those burghs, without abrogating the whole system of the laws by which they were at present affected. He thought that the bill was sufficiently wide to cure all the grievances complained of, as to the mismanagement of the funds; but it certainly was not intended, like some of the measures proposed by the noble lord, as a mere stalking-horse for parliamentary reform. As to time, he proposed that the bill should be printed, and read a second time, three weeks hence, or next session, if it suited the noble lord better: he had no wish to hurry the measure.

Sir J. Newport was astonished at the opinion expressed by the learned lord, that statutes could become of no effect from mere desuetude. He recollected that a very high authority in Ireland (Lord Kilwarden) had expressed great reprehension at such a notion being broached at the bar; he said, that the thing was quite impossible; that where a statute could be produced, it was binding on the court. It was not the courts, but the legislature alone, that could render a statute unoperative. As to the bill in question, it was inefficient, inasmuch as it left the control of the funds in the very body that had committed the abuse.

The Lord Advocate said, the hon. baronet was, no doubt, well skilled in the law of Ireland and England, and it was no reproach that he should be ignorant of that of Scotland. But it had been admitted by the legislature itself, that, in Scotland, obsolete statutes ceased to be law. As to the bill he proposed, its chief object was to give the burgesses at large the right of inspecting the accounts of the magistrates.

Mr. Finlay thought, that the bill would be of no use if it were only to compel the lodging of accounts in the Exchequer: the great object was, that the accounts should be public—that they should be circulated through the burghs to which they related, and not merely placed among the lawyers in the exchequer. He agreed, that the remedy was difficult; but the disease was dangerous, and required some attempts for its cure.

The Lord Advocate explained, that his purpose was, that the accounts should be open to the inspection of the burgesses.

Leave was then given to bring in the bill. It was immediately brought in, read a first time, and ordered to be read a second time on Friday, the 1st of May. It was in these words.

"Whereas by an act of the parliament of Scotland, made in the year 1535, intituled, 'Of the chusing officiares in burgh, and bringing of the compts of their commoun gudes zeirly in the checker,' all provosts, baillies, and aldermen of burrowes, were ordered to bring yearly to the chequer, at the day set for giving of their compts, their compt buiks of their common gudes, to be seen and considered by the lords auditores, gif the samen be spended for the common weil of the burgh, or not:

And whereas by another act of the parliament of Scotland, made in the year 1693, in the fifth year of the reign of King William and Queen Mary, intituled, 'An act anent the common good of royal burrows,' it is enacted, 'That as well for what is past as in time coming, their majesties will give commissions, one or more, to such persons as they shall be pleased to nominate, to enquire into the condition and state of the common good and revenues whatsoever, of all the royal burghs, and how the same hath been heretofore or shall be hereafter employed or misemployed, and to call the malversers and misemployers to make account, and to ordain and decern them, and every one of them, to refund and repay or otherways repair the burgh or or burghs by them lesed, as the said commissioners shall find them liable;' and every burgh royal is thereby ordered to give into exchequer a stated account of their public good and revenue, and of the whole debts and burdens and incumbrances that affected the same, betwixt and the first day of November then next; and by the said last recited act sundry regulations are made respecting the contracting debts, and granting bonds for the same by the magistrates and councils, as is therein particularly mentioned;

And whereas although the magistrates and councils of the royal burghs of Scotland may have stated and audited yearly an account of their receipts and expenditure of the common good and revenues of their respective burghs, under the direction and management of their immediate predecessors in office, yet they have not been in use of clearing such accounts yearly in exchequer, as directed by the first recited act, made in the year 1535: in respect of which, doubts have arisen, whether the provisions of the said act, so far as respects the accounting in exchequer, are now in force:

And whereas no commission, in terms of the last recited act made in the year 1693, was ever issued:

And whereas it is expedient that one and the same mode of accounting should take place, and be followed by all and each of the royal burghs of Scotland, and that regular accounts of the receipts and expenditure of the common good and revenues of all and each of those burghs, should be stated, audited, and cleared, and the respective magistrates and council discharged or acquitted of the management of those funds, as publicly as may be:

And whereas it is also expedient that there should be the means of preventing the misemployment of the common good and revenues of the said royal burghs, and of controlling the undue and lavish expenditure thereof:

Be it therefore enacted, that from and after a particular account of the annual receipt and expenditure of the common good and revenues of the several royal burghs of Scotland, under the direction and management of their respective magistrates and councils, made up to the annually, shall be stated, given in, and audited, under the direction and during the administration of their respective immediate successors in office, within calendar months after the said and that in the following manner; (to wit) That the said accounts, when prepared, shall, with the vouchers, be remitted to auditors, to be named by the magistrates and council of each of the said several burghs, one half of them to be merchants and the other half tradesmen; and that the number in Edinburgh shall be sixteen, according to the present usage in that burgh, and in all the other burghs the number shall consist of at least auditors; and with respect to such burghs who have been in use to appoint more than auditors, the usual number shall continue to be observed: Provided always, that no person who was either a member of council during the period of the account, or a member of the then present council, shall be one of the auditors aforesaid.

And be it enacted, that the said annual accounts shall remain in the custody of the respective town clerks, for the inspection of the burgesses, for previous to the meeting of the auditors, of which public notice shall be given to the burgesses by beat of drum, on a market day, at least previous to the day of such meeting; and the respective town clerks are hereby authorized and required to give such inspection to every burgess demanding the same, without fee or reward, under the penalty of   to be levied and applied in the same manner as is hereinafter directed with respect to the penalties on magistrates and councils not transmitting their accounts to the court of exchequer.

And be it enacted, that as soon as the said auditors shall have reported the state of each annual account to the magistrates and council of each burgh, and after such report shall have been approved of by the said magistrates and council respectively, a true copy of the account, audited as aforesaid, certified as such by the chief magistrate and town clerk, shall be transmitted to the king's remembrancer in the court of exchequer in Scotland, who is hereby required to receive and preserve, and to give a receipt for the same, and also to give inspection thereof to any person whatever demanding the same, upon payment of a fee of   and the said king's remembrancer shall give copies of such accounts, upon payment of the usual fees paid for copies of papers.

And be it enacted, that the barons of his majesty's court of exchequer in Scotland shall have the sole jurisdiction in bringing the magistrates and town councils of the royal burghs of Scotland to account for the due administration and management of the common good and revenues of the same; and the said barons are hereby authorized and required to judge and determine in a summary manner in any complaint which may be brought before them, at the instance of any   or more burgesses, in manner and to the effect hereinafter mentioned.

And be it enacted, that in the event of any of the magistrates or councils of the respective burghs failing and neglecting to get the accounts of their immediate predecessors stated and settled, or neglecting to transmit a copy thereof, certified as aforesaid, to the king's remembrancer in the said court of exchequer, such magistrates and councillors of each royal burgh so failing or neglecting, shall forfeit and pay for each offence, out of their own proper estate, the sum of   sterling, with costs of suit; such penalties and costs to be sued for and recovered in the said court of exchequer, in the name of his majesty's advocate for the time being.

And be it enacted, that it shall and may be lawful for any two or more burgesses of any of the respective burghs, at any time within   calendar months after any such annual account shall be presented in the court of exchequer, and they are hereby authorized, to bring a complaint or information in the said court, stating objections that articles of the common good have been omitted to be stated, or that sums taken credit for have not bonâ fide been expended, or have been improperly applied to and for the use and benefit of the then magistrates and councillors, or of their predecessors in office, or in any other corrupt and unjustifiable manner, and upon   calendar months notice or service of such complaint, the respective magistrates and councillors shall be bound to give in answers thereto, and produce therewith the voucher or vouchers of the article or articles of the account contained and objected to in such complaint or information; and the barons of exchequer are hereby authorized and required to give judgment in such complaints or informations, in a summary manner with costs of suit; and if the said court shall find and determine that the items or sums of money contained and objected to in the said accounts, have not been bonâ fide expended, or have been improperly applied, to and for the use of the then magistrates and councillors, or their predecessors in office, or in any other corrupt and unjustifiable manner, then and in every such case, the magistrate or councillor, or magistrates and councillors, therein offending, shall be adjudged to repay and make good to the respective burghs concerned in such complaint or information, out of his or their own private fortune and estate, and for which they shall be personally liable, for such loss and damage as the common good of the said burgh shall, by the judgment of the said court, be found to have sustained: Provided always, and it is hereby provided and declared, that no such complaint or information shall be brought into court or entertained, until sufficient caution shall be found in the court of exchequer by such complainers for paying costs of suit, in case they shall not make good or prevail in their complaint.

And be it further enacted, that if the persons preferring such complaint or information shall discontinue or neglect to prosecute the same with due diligence, or shall die before judgment given, then and in every such case it shall and may be lawful for any other two or more burgesses of the respective burgh against whose magistrates and council any such complaint or information shall have been brought, and they are hereby authorized, to proceed in and carry on the aforesaid complaint or information, until it shall be finally determined, in the same manner as if they had been the original complainers; provided always, that these other two or more burgesses shall previously find sufficient caution for payment of costs, in manner and to the effect before-mentioned.

And be it further enacted, That in the event of no objection being made to any of the annual accounts as aforesaid, within   calendar months after they shall have been transmitted to and lodged in exchequer, it shall not be competent thereafter to object to such accounts; and the magistrates and councils concerned shall be acquitted and discharged of their intermissions with and management of the public good and revenues of the respective years for which accounts have been audited and lodged in the exchequer in manner aforesaid, either in the case of no objection being made within the said calendar months, or in the case of their being acquitted by the said court of exchequer on a complaint when objections shall have been made.

And be it enacted, That the magistrates and councils of the aforesaid royal burghs shall not be entitled to feu or alienate property in any other manner than by public roup or auction, of which calendar months notice shall be given in of the newspapers printed at Edinburgh, and the newspapers of the other burghs respectively where the estates or subjects lie, if any such newspapers are there printed, and upon notice to the burgesses by beat of drum days previous to the roup or auction; excepting always areas for building within the said burghs, conform to plans and stated prices, which the said magistrates and council shall be entitled to sell and dispose of by private agreement: provided always, That the terms on which such sales shall be made, shall be published to the burgesses months previous to the making such sales; and provided also, that no interdict shall be served upon the magistrates and council of such burgh, at the instance of any two or more burgesses, which they are hereby authorized to apply for, to the court of session or ordinary, on the bills in time of vacation, they always finding sufficient caution for the payment of costs in the event of their application being found to be frivolous.

And be it further enacted, That in future every collector or other person employed by or under the direction or authority of any magistrate or councillor of any royal burgh of Scotland, in the collection or levying of cess stent, or any public burden whatsoever, within any royal burgh, shall separately and distinctly specify, at the time of levying, for what purpose, by what name, and on what account such sums or impositions are demanded from the burgesses and inhabitants of any royal burgh, and also shall be bound, and they are hereby required to give information, to any two or more burgesses, of the yearly amount of the sums levied for every purpose on account of which the demand is made, under the penalty of to be sued for and applied in the same way and manner as hereinbefore directed with respect to other penalties.

And be it further enacted, That so much of the aforesaid act, made in the year 1693, as enacts, 'That it shall not be lawful for hereafter to the magistrates and town council of any burgh royal to contract any debt, or give bond for the same, obliging them and their successors in office, without a previous act made in the town council, in their fullest convention, both of merchants and deacons of crafts, condescending upon the causes and uses for which the said debts are contracted, and bonds granted, certifying the aforesaid magistrates and others who shall contract debts and grant bonds, without the said previous act, or of the causes and uses condescended on in the said act, shall not be found to be just, true and real; and in any of the said cases, the said contractors and subscribers shall be personally liable, they and their heirs and successors, in their private fortunes, to relieve and disburthen the town of the said debts; and that by decreet of the lords of session at the instance of any burgesses of any of the said burghs who have borne the office of provost, baillie or dean of guild, within the same, but prejudice always to the right and security of the party creditor, as likewise but prejudice to any private person's rights, as to any of the said burghs, as accords,' is and shall be obligatory and in full force, and have effect now, and in all time coming, any thing in this or any former or other act contained the contrary notwithstanding.

And be it further enacted, That any two or more burgesses of any of the said respective burghs shall be entitled, and they are hereby authorized to carry on prosecutions and obtain decrets of the lords of session, for the purposes mentioned in the aforesaid last recited act of king William and queen Mary, made in the year 1693, in the same way and manner as is thereby provided, in favour of any burgess of any of the said burghs, who have borne the office of provost, baillie, or dean of guild: provided always, That nothing in this act contained, shall hurt or infringe the rights, powers, and privileges of the magistrates and councils of the said royal burghs, in their administration, powers and management of their respective burghs, and the common good, estate and revenues thereunto belonging, excepting the enactment hereinbefore contained, respecting the alienation of property belonging to royal burghs; and provided likewise, that nothing herein contained shall hurt or infringe the rights and privileges of the annual convention of the royal burghs of Scotland.

And be it further enacted, That it shall at all times be lawful for any five or more burgesses, qualified to hold the offices of provost, baillie, or dean of guild, of the said burghs respectively, to apply by complaint or information to the said barons of the said court of exchequer, to stop or reverse any act of administration, in regard to the common good or revenues thereof, of the magistrates and councils of the respective burghs, which shall appear to the said five or more burgesses, qualified as aforesaid, to be lavish or profuse, or to have for its object the misemployment of the said common good or revenues; provided always, that the said complaint shall be lodged within calendar months after the date of the act of administration or resolution of council complained of being entered in the public record of the said burgh; provided always, that the said five or more burgesses, qualified as aforesaid, shall, if the application shall be found by the said court of exchequer to have been made without due and sufficient grounds, be liable in costs, and in a penalty not exceeding to be applied, the one moiety to his Majesty and the other moiety to the common good of the said burgh, and for which the said court of exchequer are hereby authorized and directed to award judgment accordingly: provided always, and it is hereby provided and declared, that no such complaint or information shall be brought into court or entertained, until sufficient caution shall be found in the court of exchequer for such complainers, for paying costs of suit, as also the penalty aforesaid, in case they shall not make good or prevail in their complaint.

And be it further enacted, That if the persons preferring such complaint or informations, shall, for one term, discontinue or neglect to prosecute the same, after security has been found as aforesaid, it shall be competent for the magistrates and council of the said burghs respectively, to apply the first day of the term immediately following, to the said court of exchequer, to have the said costs and penalty awarded against the persons aforesaid.

And be it further enacted, That if the persons preferring such complaint or information shall discontinue or neglect to prosecute the same with due diligence, in manner aforesaid, or shall die before judgment given, then and in every such case it shall and may be lawful for any five burgesses, qualified as aforesaid, of the respective burgh with regard to the management of whose magistrates and council any such complaint or information shall have been brought, and they are hereby authorized to proceed in and carry on the aforesaid complaint or information, until it shall be finally determined, in the same manner as if they had been the original complainers; provided always that these five or more burgesses shall, within calendar months after the same shall have been abandoned or neglected as aforesaid, or of the death of the original complainers, and before they themselves shall be allowed to make appearance, find sufficient caution for payment of the said costs and penalty, in manner and to the effect before mentioned.

And be it further enacted, That if it shall appear to the said court of exchequer, that the said complaint or information shall have been made upon due and sufficient grounds, and that the act of administration or resolution of council ought to be reversed, and the proceeding intended to follow thereupon interdicted or prevented, then and in that case, all such transaction, agreement, or compact following upon the said act of administration or resolution, shall ipso facto be at the same time declared void and null, and the parties preferring or insisting on the said complaint or information shall be entitled to recover their costs of suit, either from the common good of the said burgh, or from the individual magistrates and councillors thereof conjunctly and severally, as the circumstances of each case may to the said court of exchequer seem to require."

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, April 13.

MARRIAGES OF THE ROYAL DUKES.] The Earl of Liverpool presented the following Message from the Prince Regent.

"George, P. R.

"The Prince Regent, acting in the name and on the behalf of his Majesty, thinks it right to inform the House of Lords, that Treaties of Marriage are in negotiation between his Royal Highness the Duke of Clarence and the Princess of Saxe Meiningen, eldest daughter of the late reigning duke of Saxe Meiningen; and also between his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge and the Princess of Hesse, youngest daughter of the Landgrave Frederick, and niece of the Elector of Hesse.

"After the afflicting calamity which the Prince Regent and the nation have sustained in the loss of his Royal Highness's beloved and only child, the Princess Charlotte, his Royal Highness is fully persuaded that the House of Commons will feel how essential it is to the best interests of the country, that his Royal Highness should be enabled to make a suitable provision for such of his Royal Highness's brothers as shall have contracted marriage with the consent of the crown: and his Royal Highness has received so many proofs of the affectionate attachment of this House to his Majesty's person and family, as leave him no room to doubt of the concurrence of assistance of this House, in enabling him to make the necessary arrangements for this important purpose. G. P. R."

The message was ordered to be taken into consideration to-morrow.

FEES OF COURTS OF JUSTICE.] The Marquis of Lansdown adverted to the conversation which had taken place on Friday last. The reports to which he then referred, had stated some irregularities in the Court of Common Pleas, in Ireland, with respect to the loss of certain recoveries. He had, however, since had a communication with a person who held the place of prothonotary of that court, who had assured him, that no loss or inconvenience had occurred with respect to any recoveries. In consequence of what had already passed on the subject, he thought it proper that their lordships should be informed of this circumstance. While he was on his legs, he should move for an account of the fees taken in cases of pardons granted by the crown. He was glad to learn that a bill on that subject was in progress in the other house of parliament, and he hoped it would soon come before their lordships. It was a serious consideration, that by far the greater number of the persons who received pardons under the Great Seal, were unable to avail themselves of the advantage to which they were entitled by the mercy extended to them by the crown, in consequence of not being able to pay the fees. But it was not the mere fees which constituted the burthen of the charge. A great part of the expense was occasioned by the stamp duties. It appeared that a pardon could not be sued out without incurring an expense of more than 40*l*. This was certainly a great hardship, especially when it was considered that the persons to whom the mercy of the crown was extended were often in great distress. It was with reference to the bill which he had stated to be in progress, that he had resolved to move for some papers which appeared to him to be necessary, to enable their lordships to understand the subject when it should come before them. He concluded by moving, that there be laid before the house an account of the fees paid on suing out a pardon granted under the Great Seal.

The Lord Chancellor said, he had no objection to the motion, but he wished the words "distinguishing the parts of the fees payable to different persons," to be added thereto.

The Marquis of Lansdowne consented to this addition, and the motion was agreed to; as was a subsequent motion of his lordship, for an Account of the Number of Pardons sued out during the last ten years.

Lord Holland noticed, as somewhat connected with the present subject, the fees required from persons who pleaded not guilty. It would, perhaps, appear incredible to their lordships, that an expense was incurred by a plea of not guilty; and that, in some cases, lawyers were in the habit of advising persons to plead guilty, in order to avoid the expense. This was an enormous abuse; and, if inquiries were to be instituted into the expenses occasioned by the proceedings of criminal courts, he hoped that this and other practices would be strictly investigated.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, April 13.

EDUCATION OF THE POOR BILL.] Mr. Brougham, in moving the second reading of this bill, observed, that it was the opinion of many for whom he had great respect, that the commissioners should be instructed to inquire into all charities in the kingdom. If the present bill should be agreed to, he hoped that, in the next session, it would be extended to all charities whatever; and then an addition might be made to the number of commissioners. At present, he wished the commencement of inquiry to be set at work. By adopting now the limited plan for charities for education, time would be given for considering its general extension. He also hoped that it would operate as a warning to all charitable institutions, of which the funds were misused, and set them upon correcting the evils.

Mr. Abercromby repeated his wish, that the measure should extend to all charities, which was an object highly desirable.—The bill was then read a second time.

SCOTCH BURGHS.] Sir Samuel Romilly presented the following petition of the Burgesses and Inhabitants of the Royal Burgh of Whithorn, in Scotland, which, he said, was signed by 120 persons, and it drew, he believed, a tolerably accurate picture of the situation of most of the burghs.—It was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed. It set forth, "that the petitioners, in common with the immense majority of the inhabitants of the other towns and cities in that part of the kingdom, being deeply impressed with a sense of the many evils resulting from the pernicious system on which the municipal government of the Scottish burghs is conducted, have resolved to apply to the house, in the full persuasion that they will be inclined to redress the grievances of which the petitioners have so much reason to complain; in order to allay all apprehension, and to do away with the possibility of misrepresentation, the petitioners distinctly declare that, in seeking for an alteration in the set or charter of the burgh of Whithorn, they are actuated by no theoretical or factious or discontented motives; they are aware of the many inestimable benefits derived from the free constitution of the British empire; with that constitution they are perfectly satisfied, and it is chiefly because the system of local government acted upon in that and the other royal burghs of Scotland is perfectly at variance with every principle consecrated in the constitution, and because it has entirely deprived them of many of its most invaluable privileges, that they now presume to address the house; the petitioners assume, as a principle universally recognized, and which will admit of no dispute, that the persons entrusted with the management of the pecuniary and other affairs of any community, ought to be elected by, and held responsible to, the individuals of which that community is composed, for their proceedings, but they affirm that this salutary principle has been totally lost sight of in the constitution of the royal burghs in Scotland; the practice of self-election is general and universal throughout that part of the kingdom, and the burgesses of the different Scottish burghs have just as much to do with the election of a president for the United States as they have to do with the election of their own magistrates and town council; in Whithorn, the magistrates and council for the time being meet each year at Michaelmas and vote out one of their number, and elect a new councillor in his stead; notwithstanding, however, that the petitioners, who comprise almost all the burgesses and the other inhabitants of the burgh, are thus completely and effectually excluded from all participation in that election, and notwithstanding they can exercise no control whatsoever over the proceedings of the members of the town council, still, in their corporate capacity, they are bound by its acts;

these self-elected councillors have full power to expend, in any manner they may themselves judge best, the entire revenue belonging to the town, they can, at their own pleasure, sell or alienate the common property of the burgh, they can contract debt, for payment of which the highest legal authorities in Scotland have declared that the private and personal funds belonging to the petitioners may be made responsible, and they alone have any power to exercise the elective franchise by voting in the return of a member to the house; as a consequence of so preposterous a state of things, the town council has always been under the direction of a particular junto; and, for these many years past, a certain noble family having obtained the ascendancy, every person who might be disposed to doubt of the propriety of seconding its views on every occasion has been carefully excluded from the council; and the petitioners intreat the house to observe, that this packing of the council with noblemen and their adherents is not only in complete contradiction to the acts of the Scottish parliament 1535, cap. 26, and 1609, cap. 8, which enact that no person shall be capable of provostry or other magistracy within any burgh, but merchants and traffickers inhabiting within the said burghs, and no other, and which acts, although they have not been repealed nor modified by any subsequent statute, are yet held, by repeated decisions of the court of session, to have fallen into desuetude; but that it is also in complete contradiction to the charter or set of the burgh of Whithorn, as it is recorded in the books of the convention of royal burghs at Edinburgh, which fixes that the provost baillies, or aldermen, and councillors, shall be chosen out of the most deserving, judicious, and best qualified persons within the said burgh; for the petitioners have to state, that at this moment only five out of the eighteen persons of whom the town council consists are resident within the burgh; and the petitioners farther state, that scarcely a single individual of the non-resident councillors have any property within the royalty, or ever visit it, except once a year, when it is necessary to act a part in the farce called election, by assisting in the voting out of one councillor and choosing another; nor is it possible for the petitioners to obtain redress of these intolerable grievances from any court of law, inasmuch as it has been repeatedly decided, that usage is sufficient to change the original set of any burgh; the petitioners do not wish to hurt the feelings of any individual, and they do not mean to insinuate any thing unfavourable to the character of the persons composing the majority of the town council, but they affirm that, with very few exceptions, they can have no direct interest in the prosperity and welfare of the burgh: they are admitted into the council merely because they are the friends of a particular family, and the advancement of its interests, and not those of the petitioners, and of the other inhabitants, is their proper and only object; such being the fact, the house will not be surprised to learn, that measures are very frequently proposed in the council, and carried into effect, in direct opposition to the declared sentiments and opinions of the inhabitants; this pernicious and absurd system of municipal government has another evil consequence, it destroys the fair and salutary influence of property, and of talent; no extent of fortune, and no excellence of character, are sufficient to procure admittance into the town council; those who have any desire to become members of that body, must recommend themselves to the ruling junto, they must insinuate themselves into the good graces of those by whom the council is packed, and the petitioners can assure the house that such councillors as discover any independence of mind, have been invariably expelled on the first opportunity; but the petitioners chiefly object to this system of burgh government, because it totally deprives them of that share in the returning of a member to the house, to which, as freemen of the burgh of Whithorn, they are entitled; if the town council was really elected by the inhabitants, the vote which its delegate gives in the election of a member to represent the Galloway district of burghs, would be the vote of the petitioners and of the other inhabitants, but as the case now stands, the vote of the delegate is simply the vote of the head of the noble family by whom the council is actually chosen; the petitioners are thus deprived of an invaluable privilege conferred on them by the constitution, and without which there can be no security for the permanent enjoyment of any other; and that wise resolution of the house, which declares that it is a high infringement upon the liberties and privileges of the commons of Great Britain and Ireland, for any lord of parliament, or any lord lieutenant of any county, to concern themselves in the election of members to serve for the commons in parliament, is defeated and set at nought; the grievances which the petitioners have detailed are not peculiar to the burgh of Whithorn, but are almost universally felt; a very great proportion of the royal burghs of Scotland are at present in a state of bankruptcy, the common property has almost in every instance been dissipated, councillors and their friends have been enriched at the public expense, and jobbing and corruption of every kind have been disseminated throughout the country; it is the decided conviction of the petitioners, that there is but one remedy for these complicated and disgraceful disorders; the restoring to the burgesses the right of electing the magistrates and council by open poll, a right which the burgesses of Scotland formerly enjoyed, and of which they were most unjustly deprived, can alone accomplish this most desirable object; this remedy would be equally simple and efficacious; it is easy of adoption, it could lead to no bad consequences, and by it only can the right to exercise the elective franchise be restored to the petitioners and the other burgesses of Scotland; the petitioners have heard with surprize and astonishment that it has been stated in the house that the Scottish burgesses would be satisfied with the present constitution of the burghs if the magistrates were obliged to submit their accounts to an audit; but the petitioners can assure the house that this assertion is entirely ill founded, the burgesses of Scotland will, they are convinced, be satisfied with no such regulation, and they firmly believe that the house will at once perceive its perfect futility; it is a control over the measures of the magistrates, by having the right to elect them vested in the burgesses, and not a power to examine into the accuracy of the accounts resulting from those measures a self-elected junto might be pleased to adopt that is wanted, and it is this alone which will give satisfaction: the petitioners have therefore, for these and other reasons, which they will not occupy the time of the house by stating, to intreat of them that they will be pleased to take such measures as to their wisdom may appear best calculated to put an end to the absurd, unconstitutional, and baneful practice of self-election in the royal burghs of Scotland; they are confident that such a measure would be regarded as a signal boon by every burgess in that part of the kingdom, while, by admitting them to a participation in all the privileges of the constitution, and by doing away all degrading distinctions, the house would cordially unite all classes in its defence; but, if the house entertains any doubts as to the propriety of a general measure applicable to all the burghs of Scotland, the petitioners trust there can be none as to the propriety of introducing a particular measure affecting the burgh of Whithorn; the evils which the petitioners suffer from the operation of the present system of burgh government are clear, tangible, and obvious, they can neither be denied nor palliated; and when such is the case, they entertain a confident expectation that the house will earnestly and in good faith set about the adoption of that measure which can alone occasion their removal; may it, therefore, please the house to take the premises into consideration, and to grant to the petitioners such relief as their superior wisdom may deem proper and expedient."

MARRIAGES OF THE ROYAL DUKES.] Lord Castlereagh presented a message from the Prince Regent respecting the marriages of the Dukes of Clarence and Cambridge, similar to that presented to the House of Lords by the Earl of Liverpool. (See page 1294.)

The message having been read from the chair,

Lord Castlereagh said, that, conformably to precedent in former cases, he should move that the message be referred to a committee of the whole house to-morrow, when he should be able to state more fully the grounds on which it was sent to the house. At present he should merely propose, that an humble address be presented to his royal highness the Prince Regent, to thank him for his most gracious communication, and to assure him, that the house would immediately proceed to take it into consideration in such a manner as should demonstrate the zeal, duty, and affectionate attachment of that house to his Majesty's person and family, and a due regard to the importance of any measure which might tend to secure the succession of the crown in his Majesty's illustrious house.

Mr. Tierney said, he had no objection to the course thus proposed; but he thought some further particulars might have been stated by the noble lord as to his intentions in the committee. He understood, that certain members of that house had been summoned to the house of a minister, (hear, hear,) where they attended to day; he believed about 50 or 60 gentlemen; and where they were informed of what the house, it appeared, was not to be informed of till to-morrow. (Hear, hear.) The noble lord seemed to think that he could not get his work through without a previous rehearsal among his friends. (Hear.)

Lord Castlereagh said, he was not aware that any thing had been done on the subject alluded to that was at all inconsistent with former practice.

Mr. Protheroe said, that he had heard reports of rather a strange nature; and he must express his opinion, that if those reports were true, it was necessary that the country should know how their representatives acted; and, if time for consideration were not given, by postponing the discussion, he should feel it his duty to make a motion for a call of the house.

Lord Castlereagh said, that in the course which he proposed to adopt, he was only following the invariable practice of parliament, which was to take a royal message into consideration on the next day after it was presented. If a call of the house should be moved, he should not oppose it.

Mr. Brougham said, that whatever the practice had been, there might be some justification now for departing from the strict line of precedent, particularly if any advantage were likely to result from it. If the house set a just value on their own character, on the peace of the country at large, and on the stability of the throne, they would take every step in their decisions to carry the voice of the people along with them. (Hear, hear.) He should be disposed, therefore, to support the motion mentioned by the hon. member, to obtain the usual security for the full attendance of members. He also suggested the propriety of having a correct statement of facts, before they legislated on this message: he meant the sums already granted to the royal dukes, and what they were now in possession of. (Hear.)

Mr. Methuen agreed with what had fallen from the hon. and learned gentleman, and said, that he should move for an account of the incomes received by the Dukes of Clarence, Kent, Cumberland, and Cambridge, arising from different appointments, civil, naval, and military. (Hear, hear.)

Lord Castlereagh said, he did not intend to oppose the motion, but it must be postponed till the present question was disposed of.

Mr. M. A. Taylor confessed that, in the present distressed state of the country, he could scarcely have brought himself to believe that such a message could have received the sanction of the confidential advisers of the crown. (Hear, hear.) He would put it to ministers, and to all members, whether such a grant of public money was not improper. For his own part, he considered it to be objectionable in the highest degree. No man was more attached than himself to the house of Brunswick. He believed the support of the throne to be essential to the happiness and security of the people at large. But, in giving the royal family every proper support, it was necessary for him to look also at the interests and feelings, and to examine what the finances of the country enabled it to pay. The state of the trade of the country, on the late discussion on the leather tax, clearly shewed the impropriety of such large grants as were to be proposed. He intended to make no kind of reflection on an illustrious personage, but he was desirous of knowing what burthens the people could bear, before he voted a shilling. (Hear.)

Mr. Curwen thought, that grants should not be voted till the Chancellor of the Exchequer had laid before the house a detailed statement of the Supplies, and Ways and Means of the year.

Mr. Brand could not see any fair reason why the noble lord should refuse to mention the amount of the grants he intended to propose. (Hear.) Information was due to the public, when a grant, reported to be so large, was intended, in the present circumstances of the country.

Lord Lascelles said, that as a conversation had arisen on this subject, he should make a few observations. At the meeting alluded to, he certainly was present. He must add, that he did not think it too much for him to say, that what transpired at the meeting did not completely satisfy him; and he believed there were others of the same opinion. He should say no more on the subject at present, as the message was to be referred to the committee to-morrow.

Mr. Bennet wished to know whether ministers had not communicated to their select committee, that they intended to propose 19,000*l.* a year in addition to the Duke of Clarence, 19,000*l.* for out-fit, and 12,000*l.* a year to the Dukes of Cumberland and Cambridge?

Lord Castlereagh declined answering the question of the hon. gentleman.

Sir Charles Monck observed, that it was a very singular proceeding for his Majesty's ministers to declare to a private meeting of their own friends, what they refused to communicate to the house. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Calcraft said, he should be very glad if any of the gentlemen who were present at the meeting alluded to, if they were not bound to keep silence on the subject, would be so kind as to state, for the information of the house, what was the amount of the sums proposed to the persons to whom they were to be granted. If any gentleman would have the kindness to furnish that information, the house would be much better prepared for the discussion to-morrow.

Lord Stanley wished to know from the noble lord, or if he did not give him the information, perhaps the chair would, whether there was any instance, in which the house, in their vote of thanks to the throne for such a communication, went further than the message itself?

Lord Castlereagh said, that the proposed address gave no countenance to any particular amount of grant, or, in fact, to any grant at all. It contained a mere expression of thanks, as usual, for the communication, and a promise, to take it into consideration.

Mr. Brougham considered, that he owed by the constitution a duty to his sovereign; but, regarding his duty to the people, and believing that those duties were closely united, and connected one with the other, there was one omission in the address, which, unless it were supplied, made it impossible that that address should meet with his concurrence. The address, after expressing the satisfaction of the house on the intended marriages, pledged them to take such measures as were consistent with a regard for the establishment of the family, and for the continuance of the succession, without saying one word about another regard which they ought to entertain, which was their principal and permanent duty—that due regard for the state of the people of the country, for the burthens under which they laboured, and for their capacity to sustain the pressure of those burthens—that regard which ought to limit the demands made for the third branch of the legislature, the royal family. The hon. and learned gentleman then moved, as an amendment to the motion of the noble lord, that after the word 'house' should be added, "and with a due regard to the present burthened state of the people of this country." (Hear, hear, from the opposition benches.)

Lord Castlereagh thought that the amendment of the hon. gentleman had a tendency to imply, that in some quarter there was not that due regard to the burthens of the people which there should be. There was nothing in the address that called in question the attention that was due to the best interests of the people.

Sir G. Heathcote thought that nothing could be more moderate than the amendment of his hon. and learned friend. When the house was called on to make large provisions, there was nothing more natural than to take into consideration the situation of the country. He did not feel all that joy which the noble lord perhaps might feel on the occasion of these marriages. They were unlike marriages in private life. No one of them ever occurred without the country being burthened. They were always accompanied with a considerable addition to the revenue of the noble personages who were the parties. At present, a man had only to walk about with his eyes open, to see that the country was in a most distressed condition. They ought to consider before they added even a single sixpence to the public burthens.

Mr. Tierney said, the noble lord should observe that the amendment did no more than was right: for though it was proper to shew attachment to the crown, yet it was equally their duty and their policy to shew that they were allied to the interests of the people. They were called upon to pay more than on any former occasion. There had been a meeting, and the house knew from one of the most respectable members amongst them, that the propositions laid before that meeting were thought by some unfit to be entertained. The house should take care, then, not to suffer his majesty's ministers to go one inch beyond what was necessary.

The gallery was then cleared for a division. While we were excluded, the debate proceeded:

Mr. Cocks rose and declared, that he should shew by his vote that he was as ready to consider the burthens of the people as any member of the house, but that he could not vote for the amendment, as he thought it would be offensive to the royal personage by whom the message had been sent to the house.

Mr Brougham said, he was confident that the amendment, if carried, would have the most salutary consequences, as well to the interests of the country, as to the stability of the government.

Mr. Legh Keck expressed his disapprobation of the measures which had been submitted to the meeting of the members held that morning, and stated, that although he wished the amendment had not been moved, still he felt that he had no choice, but must give it his support.

Mr. Plunkett said, that on the merits of the question he entirely agreed with his hon. and learned friend, and when it was brought forward, he should support him to the utmost of his power: but he wished him to withdraw the amendment, lest it should wear an appearance very foreign to his intentions, by seeming to insinuate that the crown had improperly omitted the consideration of economy.

Sir John Newport said, that the amendment referred merely to the conduct of ministers. The message was their act, and if the omission was censured by the amendment, the censure fell upon the constitutional advisers of the crown.

Lord Lascelles said, he should oppose the proposition of ministers, when it should be brought forward, but he declined supporting the amendment, or voting in the present stage.

Sir C. Monck, Mr. Tierney, and Mr. Calcraft severally supported the amendment, on the ground of Lord Castlereagh's refusal to inform the house what was intended, and the fact of several members having been privately called together, who now declared that they could not agree to what had been proposed to them.

Mr. E. Littleton declared that the tenour of his politics had shewn his disposition to support his Majesty's ministers, but that he could not approve of the proposition which had been submitted to him at the private meeting that morning.

Mr. Abercromby contended, that in point of candour and good faith, the house were bound to express their sentiments on the address, otherwise it would mislead his royal highness into an expectation of their supporting the measure proposed.

Mr. Wynn thought the amendment contrary to the usual form of proceeding, but added, that he should certainly oppose the proposition of ministers, whenever they brought it forward.

Mr. Courtenay said, that the amendment had his unqualified assent.

Sir T. Acland disapproved of the amendment, though not of its principle, which he should shew by his vote, when the measure was proposed.

Mr. Gooch said, he had been at the private meeting, and disapproved of the proposition of ministers.

Mr. Methuen and General Walpole, warmly supported the amendment.

Sir William Curtis said, that if he had been at the meeting at Lord Liverpool's, he should have opposed the proposition decidedly, and so he should when it came on; but he would not vote now for the amendment.

Sir S. Romilly begged the house, before it came to a vote, to recollect, that every one of the members to whom the private and unconstitutional disclosure had been made in the morning, and who alone knew its nature, had expressed his disapprobation of it. The original address, therefore, would only tend to mislead those who read it as to the sentiments of the house, and the reception which the proposition was likely to meet with.

The house then divided on the question, that the words "and with a due regard to the present burthened state of the people of this country," be added.

TELLERS—Methuen, Paul, and Monck, Sir C.

Mr. Methuen then moved, "That there be laid before this house a return of all incomes received by their royal highnesses the Dukes of Clarence, Kent, Cumberland, Sussex, and Cambridge, arising from Military, Naval, or Civil Appointments, Pensions, or other emoluments, as well as all Grants out of the Admiralty Droits, made to them since the year 1800."

Mr. Tierney proposed, that their incomes from any foreign states should be included.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, it was impossible to make such a return, as the means of making it were beyond the province of ministers.

Mr. J. P. Grant observed, that at least the personages who received these incomes were enabled to make the return.

Mr. Brougham thought that the house ought to be informed of the emoluments of the Duke of Cambridge in Hanover, and he could name one person who could make a return to that effect; it was the person who was making the application to the house for more money. (Hear, hear.) Their grant must be influenced by the amount of the present income, because they would grant only what was necessary for supporting the splendour belonging to the situation of the royal dukes. What was necessary for that purpose they were bound to give; but if any other means existed for contributing to that object, it was surely indispensable to know their amount, in order to enter upon the question, how much ought to be granted in addition? (Hear, hear.) Hanover had formerly been a burthen, and the source of incalculable expense to this country; it would be some compensation if she were now found to alleviate our charges. (Hear, hear.)

The Chancellor of the Exchequer observed, that on former occasions of a similar nature, Mr. Pitt and Mr. Fox had made no inquiry into the foreign receipts of any of the royal family.

Mr. Brougham replied, that if Mr. Fox had lived to see the country so burthened as at present, his conduct in that respect would have been different.

The original motion was agreed to.

Mr. Protheroe said, he conceived this to be a question of very great importance, and, therefore, he felt it proper that there should be a call of the house for Friday, the 24th instant, in order to ensure the attention of members to every stage of the inquiry. If the question were fairly and at once put to the house, he was certain it would meet with a decided negative: but as attempts might be made to accommodate and compromise matters, he thought it important to have a full attendance of members. He therefore moved, "That the house be called over on Friday, the 24th instant."

The motion was agreed to.

ORDNANCE ESTIMATES.] Mr. Brogden brought up the resolutions of the committee of supply, to which the ordnance estimates had been referred.

Mr. Bennet rose and said, that the more he inquired, the more certain he was that there never existed a case of greater hardship than that of the artillery drivers. The hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Ward) had stated, that eight troops had been disbanded, and four retained. The fact was this:—Of the twelve troops, six were disbanded in 1814, and the other six were retained till 1818. Out of the six troops, four now remained, and all that he asked for was, that the other two corps should be placed in the same situation as those that remained.

Lord Cochrane said, it would be a cruel case if those officers should be denied the advantage of receiving full pay, which was conferred on so many officers who had never rendered any services at all. He regretted much to witness the disregard that was generally shewn to the rights of individuals, and thought it as much the duty of the house to attend to claims of this nature as to the dignity and splendour of the royal family.

The Earl of Carhampton said, he felt himself in a strange place, and heard strange things. He was perfectly astonished at the enormous sums contained in those various papers which the hon. member opposite, on a former night, dragged from his pocket, or his sleeve, like a conjuror.

The sum of 5,000*l.* for repairing the harbour of Portsmouth, might, in his opinion, be safely reduced to 500*l.* The expense of the ordnance department had increased, was increasing, and ought to be diminished. He firmly believed, that in England a reduction of one half might be effected, and in Ireland of two-thirds. He had himself held the appointments of adjutant-general, and of commander-in-chief in that country. At that time, there were three engineers employed, and he then thought there was one too many; but Ireland had now no less than thirteen. (Hear, hear.) He was anxious to point out to the public where a reduction could be made; but he would leave the subject for the present, however fully he was convinced of the necessity of speaking upon it.

Mr. R. Ward said, he would not now enter upon a discussion which could be much more satisfactorily entertained when the measure should come in the shape of a regular bill before the house. The noble lord who spoke last had certainly availed himself of a fair opportunity for making his observations; but he must say, in return, that the subject had been so amply discussed, not only in that house, but by committees above stairs, that he felt it unnecessary to offer any reply. If the noble lord would suggest to him any practicable retrenchment, he should most willingly accept the suggestion. With regard to the vote of 5,000*l.* for the repair of the damage done by the late storms to Portsmouth, he admitted that, in point of regularity, notice ought to have been given of this additional item in the estimates. The report, however, on which the application to parliament was founded, represented the immediate necessity of the repairs, and it was upon this consideration that the notice had been dispensed with. If the house should be of opinion that this form of proceeding was necessary, he would withdraw the resolution for the present.

The resolutions were then agreed to.

REWARDS ON CONVICTION BILL.] Mr. Bennet moved the second reading of this bill.

The Attorney-General said, that he had no difficulty in admitting the propriety of some alteration in the law as it now stood; but the present measure went to the total abolition of all rewards for the apprehension and conviction of offenders. Those rewards had been enacted by a great variety of statutes, passed at very different periods: and the inference was, that the legislature had at each of those periods been impressed with the necessity of stimulating the assiduity and exertions of the persons employed in performing this necessary service. Now, a law passed for the more effectual punishment of offenders, must not be supposed to have been inefficacious, merely because offenders were still found to exist. It was not possible for any man to say how many had been deterred from crime by such regulations, nor, indeed, how many had been brought to justice by their means, who would otherwise have escaped. He certainly could not deny the position, that rewards might in some cases operate, for that they had so operated had been lately proved in courts of justice, to induce men to tempt others into offences for the purpose of obtaining them. Of so serious an evil the instances, he must hope, were but few, and no general law, it was well known, could ever arrive at perfection, or be at all times guarded against abuse. The question was, whether these were not cases of a peculiar nature, in which it was necessary to the interests of society, that the zeal and activity of individuals should be stimulated—cases in which it was necessary for them to leave their homes, and expose themselves to situations perhaps of considerable peril. His notion was, that it would be injurious to the interests of justice, in the apprehension of criminals, to take away the rewards for conviction in all cases; but he thought that for no apprehension ought there to be a fixed reward. His opinion was, that both the extent of the reward, the distribution of it, and whether there ought to be any reward at all, ought to be referred to the judges before whom the charge was made, and the indictment tried. The stimulus for the apprehension of criminals would thus be left, while the inducements to conspiracy would be removed. When cases came before the court, in which the prosecutor, the witnesses, or the officers, appeared to be acting from motives of interest, and not from a regard to public justice; when they appeared not meritoriously zealous for the punishment of crime, but disposed to make a trade of their services for personal benefit; then the judges should refuse the reward altogether. If the contrary were the case, they might award the whole 40*l.*, or give any part, or distribute it among those who had exerted themselves for the apprehension of the criminal, according to their merits. He opposed the second reading of the bill, therefore, not because it abolished fixed rewards, but because it allowed no rewards at all, and thus took away all inducements to exertion in the apprehension of criminals. By the bill no reward was allowed except to the family or executors of an officer who was killed in the execution of his duty. This provision of the bill he would adopt, and in another part of it too, that which referred to the prohibition of transferring Tyburn-tickets, he entirely concurred. He would agree, generally, with the hon. author of the bill, to abolish all certainty of reward, either as to amount, the terms on which it might be claimed, or the distribution of it among the different parties who lent their exertions to apprehend criminals: but he could not concur with him in abolishing rewards altogether. He thought the evils at present complained of might be removed, conspiracy prevented, and all the salutary objects in view attained, by still continuing to hold out rewards for apprehension; but referring the amount, and the question whether any thing at all should be granted, to the judges. In their discretion it might be safely rested; with them the power would not be abused, while the public would have all the benefits that might arise from stimulating the activity of officers and prosecutors in the performance of their duty. It was because the bill, as it at present stood, could not accomplish the latter object, that he opposed the second reading.

Mr. W. Smith said, he could not agree with the hon. and learned gentleman in opposing the second reading of the bill, while he concurred with him in several of his positions. It might go into the committee, and be there amended, so as to meet the views of the hon. and learned gentleman, and those who concurred generally in its principle, but differed about its detail. In much of what the hon. and learned gentleman had said towards the conclusion of his observations he cordially agreed, but he could not allow the strength of his arguments against a change, drawn from the history of the statutes connected with the present subject. The rewards, he thought, were very improperly proportioned, as regarded the different kinds of crimes. The greatest reward was given for the apprehension of the greatest criminal, and the less reward for the conviction of the least offence. The scale appeared to him to be thus improperly graduated, both because less pecuniary inducement was required for exertion to apprehend a person charged with a great crime, from the natural sentiments of mankind being more strongly excited against the criminal, and because, by holding out an increase of reward in proportion to the atrocity of crime, a motive was given for allowing offenders to proceed in their guilty course till their apprehension should become of value. The hon. and learned gentleman had spoken of the merits of persons who exerted themselves to apprehend criminals. In the sentiments he had expressed on this subject, he could not concur. Where was the merit of apprehending or prosecuting, if it were done for the purpose of obtaining 40*l.*, and not from a regard to the interests of justice? In his opinion, there was not only the want of merit, but a great demerit. If you took away the hope of reward, you confessedly took away the motive to exertion, and the merit of the prosecutor was thus to be measured by his love of gain. If the case were otherwise, if the prosecutor were sincerely actuated by motives of duty and a regard to public order or justice, the stimulus would remain the same, though the rewards on conviction were abolished. But though he could not allow merit to prosecutors who acted from a regard to personal interest, he could not agree with his hon. friend (Mr. Bennet) in abolishing all motives to exertion arising from such a cause. The reward should be proportioned to the exertion, and to the trouble incurred, and not according to the magnitude of the offence for which a conviction might be obtained; but still there ought, in his opinion, to be some kind of reward. He objected to the bill in some particulars; but he could not concur with the hon. and learned gentleman in opposing its second reading, because he thought that such a decision against it would appear to cast a slur on the motives and exertions of his hon. friend, the former of which all were as ready to acknowledge to be laudable as the latter were great, and because he thought that what was objectionable in it might be amended in the committee.

The Attorney-General said he would not oppose the second reading, if the objections which he had stated could be removed in the committee.

Mr. Bennet observed, that he found himself placed in rather an awkward situation, opposed to persons who had the same objects in view with himself, and whose characters he highly respected, and supported by others who, with him, had weighed the subject maturely, and had come to those conclusions which were embodied in the bill now before the house. Every gentleman who attended the police committee agreed in the policy of abolishing rewards on convictions. They were supported in their opinion by all the police-magistrates, and all the police-officers, whom they had examined. Their opinion rested on many grounds. In the first place, they thought the rewards ought to be abolished, from the manner in which officers were treated before a jury, under the suspicion that they were actuated by the hope of personal advantage in delivering their testimony. They never could be listened to with that confidence with which the evidence of persons speaking on oath should be received. The appellation of blood-money given to the reward, tainted the whole of their testimony, and rendered them general objects of suspicion with the courts, the juries, and the people. The opinion of the country was general as to the mischievous policy of granting these rewards. It not only excited a prejudice against the officers, even when inclined to speak the truth; but, in the second place, it biassed them in giving their testimony, and offered an inducement to give false testimony. The persons most conversant with proceedings before our criminal courts, and with the character and disposition of the officers, all concurred in stating the strength of the bias thus created, and the generality of its operation. Mr. Holdsworth, the city marshal, and Mr. Shelton, the clerk of the arraigns at the Old Bailey, said, that they had often seen officers stretching a point to give a higher character to the offence, and delivering fabricated evidence to procure the rewards consequent on conviction. This was not the only testimony on this point. The slightest inspection of the comparative number of charges and convictions, not only in the metropolis but over England, shewed the same thing. In London, the charges for highway-robbery in one year had been 105, and the convictions only 42; and in the country the proportion was nearly the same. This shewed that the indictments were laid, not according to the crimes committed, but according to the hope of the reward to be obtained. As these rewards had so pernicious an effect, they ought to be abolished; nor did he see any necessity to provide farther than the bill did for the apprehension of criminals. It proposed to indemnify prosecutors and witnesses for their expenses, and to remunerate them for the trouble they incurred. He did not think that the ends of justice required more, or that the interest of the prosecutor should be made to lie in procuring the conviction of an offender by any testimony to which he was not prompted by a sense of truth and the common feelings of our nature against crime. The inducement which was thus held out to prosecution, was as great as should be given. Fixed rewards had been long the great blot in our system of criminal procedure. As long as any thing more was offered for procuring convictions than a mere indemnity for expense, and a remuneration for time and trouble, the interest of the prosecutor would be made to consist in prosecuting falsely, and an inducement would be held out not to detect, but to make crime. The police-officers, who in this instance might be credited with the more facility, as they spoke against the system by which their own emoluments were increased, by which some of them made from 40*l.* to 50*l.* a year, all delivered their opinion against the statutary rewards on conviction. They said, they were damaged as witnesses, that they were treated with suspicion by juries, and were exposed to public odium, by the law as it stood. These rewards held out a bounty for crime and a temptation to perjury. By this means children were prosecuted for capital felonies, who, without it, would have been punished by a ducking. Two children were now in Newgate, one of them of thirteen and the other of nine years of age, who had been convicted on the testimony of a child of six years of age, and who would never have been prosecuted for capital felonies, except for this system of rewards. He trusted, therefore, that the bill, which was intended as a remedy for these monstrous evils would be allowed to be read a second time. He had often heard the wisdom of our ancestors brought forward as a plea in bar of any change of our laws; but it should not be forgotten, that the laws by which these rewards for conviction were granted, were part of those rude acts by which the life of a man was valued at five shillings. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Alderman Wood supported the second reading of the bill. He gave his decided opinion against all fixed rewards whatever. The reward of 7*l.* given by the Bank, for the apprehension of persons circulating bad money, had led to many false convictions. He himself found thirteen men in Newgate, who had been apprehended for passing counterfeits, which they received from a man whom they met on Tower-hill, and who desired them to go into a shop with them and purchase bread. They consisted of Irish, Germans, and other foreigners, who did not know the crime they were employed to commit, nor the consequences of what they were doing. He had detected one of his own officers at such practices, and had found it his duty to lay the whole of the system before Lord Sidmouth. The officer whom he had so detected, he had of course discharged, but he was aware that the same nefarious system was still very often practised. Perhaps the hon. and learned gentleman (the Attorney-general) did not know the struggle that often took place in a justice-room to get a capital conviction, when the evidence only bore upon a less offence. If, for instance, a lady's ridicule were snatched from her hand, it did not infer a capital crime; but the officers sometimes endeavoured to give the offence that character, by saying that the string of it was twisted round her arm, and as force was used in getting it away, the crime became a highway robbery. Could the House of Commons allow this system to continue? The reward for the apprehension of coiners was often divided among so many, that each received only 40*s.*; but here were so many witnesses pre-engaged by their interests to distort the truth.

Colonel Wood hoped that the bill would be allowed to go into a committee, and recommended the consideration of the report of the police committee to the attention of members. It would shew how much the country was indebted to the exertions of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennet) who was its chairman *. He saw no reason why it should be supposed that the

* The great and unremitting attention which Mr. Bennet has bestowed on our criminal code, and the essential benefits which the country has already derived from his exertions, induce the Editor, with the greatest respect and deference, to submit to his consideration a point of the utmost importance. It has often occurred to the Editor, in considering the policy of our criminal laws, and the mode in which they are administered, that great injustice is done to prisoners by withholding from them the assistance of counsel to make their defence. In no capital case whatever, except in high treason, or misprision of treason, (other than treason in counterfeiting the king's coin and seals) and parliamentary impeachments for treason, (the former by the 7 W. III. c. 3. the latter by the 20 Geo. II. c. 30.) is a prisoner allowed the benefit of counsel on his trial, unless some point of law arises proper to be debated. The injustice and inhumanity of this rule has been felt and acknowledged at different periods, by lawyers of the highest eminence. It was established, says lord Coke (3 Instit. 137.) upon "these two causes: first, for that in case of life, the evidence to convict a prisoner should be so manifest, as it could not be contradicted: secondly, the court ought to see that the indictment, trial, and other proceedings, be good and sufficient in law." But, on the trial of lord Cornwallis for murder, (30 Car. II. 1678,) lord Nottingham (then high steward) declared, that the first of these causes was "the only good reason that could abolishing of the rewards on conviction would be injurious to the interests of public justice, if the expenses of the prosecutors were paid. Both in the metropolis and in the country they be given for refusing to allow a prisoner counsel." Sir W. Blackstone observes, that this rule seems to be not at all of a piece with the rest of the humane treatment of prisoners by the English law. For, upon what face of reason can that assistance be denied to save the life of a man, which yet is allowed him in prosecutions for every petty trespass? Nor, indeed, is it strictly speaking a part of our ancient law; for the Mirror, having observed the necessity of counsel in civil suits, 'who know how to forward and defend the cause, by the rules of law and customs of the realm,' immediately afterwards subjoins, 'and more necessary are they for defence upon indictments and appeals of felony, than upon other venial causes.' And the judges themselves are so sensible of this defect, that they never scruple to allow a prisoner counsel to instruct him what questions to ask, or even to ask questions for him, with respect to matters of fact. for as to matters of law, arising on the trial, they are entitled to the assistance of counsel. (4 Comm. 355.) —At what period of our history the benefit of counsel was first denied to prisoners, does not appear. – Mr. Whitelocke informs us, that, in 1649, "There was a great peak taken against the lawyers; insomuch that the old odium against them was revived, and it was said in debate, 'That it was not fit for lawyers who were members of parliament, if any lawyers ought to be there at all, to plead or practise as lawyers during the time they sat as members of parliament;' which gave occasion to one of that profession," meaning himself, "to speak as follows." (The learned gentleman then replies to several charges brought against the profession, and concludes in these words) "Sir, the worthy gentleman was pleased to mention one thing with some weight, 'That lawyers were permitted to counsel and plead for men in matters touching their estates and liberties; but in the greatest matters of all others, concerning a man's life and posterity, lawyers were not permitted to plead for their clients.' I confess I cannot answer this objection, That, for a trespass of a sixpence value, a man may have a counsellor to plead for him, but where his life and posterity are concerned, he is not admitted this privilege and help of lawyers. What is said in defence or excuse of this custom is, 'That the judges are of counsel for the prisoners, and are to see that they have no wrong.' And are they not to take the same care of all causes that shall be tried before them? A law to reform this, I think, would be just and give right to the people."

Two laws have since been passed, viz. the 7th of W. III. c. 3. and 20th Geo. II. c. 30. (as stated above) to give the people this right in cases of treason, and no satisfactory reason can be urged why it should still be withholden from them in other cases. Those who are acquainted with human nature must be aware, how often prisoners are presumed to be guilty, from the very embarrassment which they betray in their helpless situation. The Editor has now before him a little work, written by M. Salverte, entitled "Des Rapports de la Medecine avec la Politique," which contains some observations on this point, extremely worthy of attention. After having spoken of the emotions which the aspect of a numerous assembly must infallibly create in an individual brought before a full tribunal, the author introduces, very happily, the anecdote of a noble lord, who, in the house of commons, was so agitated while recommending the bill for allowing counsel to persons accused of high treason, that he actually could not go on with his speech.—"Sir," said he, "if I, who rise only to give my opinion on the bill now depending, am so confounded, that I am unable to express the least of what I proposed to say; what must the condition of that man be, who, without any assistance, is pleading for his life, and under apprehensions of being deprived of it*?"

"Civilians," continues Mr. Salverte, "have hinted "at the perturbation of a person accused as being "the strongest presumption of his guilt; this rule "has been adopted in practice by many judges, and "an almost general prejudice has established it. But "independently of the apprehension of this error, "from which no tribunal is exempt, independently "of the agitation which a painful situation cannot "but create in the human mind; can a man who "for the first time of his life perhaps, is brought "into public view, and who would feel himself "intimidated were he to decide in the capacity of a "judge,—can he be calm and unaffected when he is "to answer as a culprit? when every surrounding object "is calculated to inspire him with inquietude and "alarm, when no comforting voice invites him to be "composed, when his only expectation rests on his "innocence, innocence so frequently misjudged by "men! Is it to be wondered at that his voice fails "him, that he falters in his speech, that he grows "pale, that he shudders, that he looks around but "without seeing, that he listens and hears without "comprehending, that, in the unsteadiness of his "discourse, he manifests a suspension of reason, of "memory, of ideas? No, certainly; and it becomes "the duty of the philosopher who studies man in "men; it belongs to the physiologist who laments "his inability to remove such fatal agitation, to "check at least our unjust precipitation, to demon-"strate in this timidity which at once clogs the "moral and physical powers, the inevitable effect "produced by the presence of an assembly; an ef-"fect which is only overcome by the most resolute "after long habit, or by exercising a command "almost miraculous over his own imagination."

Upon the whole, it appears, that this subject deserves to be most maturely considered, and the Editor ventures to hope, that it will not be overlooked by

* This was lord Ashley, afterwards earl of Shaftesbury, and author of the Characteristics. It is said, (Gen. Dict. Hist. and Crit. vol. ix. p. 179.) that his lordship had prepared a speech in behalf of the bill, which those, to whom he shewed it, thought a very proper one on the occasion. But, when he stood up to deliver it, the great audience so intimidated him, that he lost all memory, and was unable to proceed. The house, after giving him a little time to recover his confusion, called loudly upon him to go on, when he proceeded to this effect. "Sir, if I, who rise only to give my opinion on the bill now depending, am so confounded, that I am unable to express the least of what I proposed to say; what must the condition of that man be, who, without any assistance, is pleading for his life, and under apprehensions of being deprived of it?" This sudden turn, which by some was imagined to be premeditated, though it really was not, is said to have been of service in promoting the bill."

would be sufficiently inclined to prosecute without any additional reward.

Mr. Hurst gave his assent to the principle of the bill. The whole country shuddered at the abuses which it was intended to correct.

The Solicitor-general said, that his hon. and learned friend had not objected to the abolition of fixed rewards. There might, however, be cases where persons had meritoriously come forward, in which it would be very desirable that rewards should be given. He thought that the judges should have the power of determining in what cases rewards should be allowed.

Mr. Bennet said, he wished to give the judges that discretionary power, and to remove fixed rewards altogether.

After a few words from General Thornton and Sir T. Baring, who supported the bill, it was read a second time.

PRIVATELY STEALING (Ireland) BILL.] This bill was read a third time, and passed.

EDUCATION OF THE POOR BILL.] This bill was read a second time.

EMPLOYMENT OF THE POOR.] Mr. Alderman Wood moved, that the house should resolve itself into a committee on the Irish acts of the 21st, 22nd and 26th of George III. relating to partnerships.

Mr. Grenfell objected to the principle of the bill which his hon. friend wished to found on those acts: it would alter the whole commercial system of England, and establish joint stock companies, with all their inconveniences.

Mr. Alderman Wood said, that if there were any objection to the operation of the bill in England, it might be confined to Ireland, where the importance of such a measure could not be denied.

The house then resolved itself into a committee, in which Mr. Alderman Wood moved, "that a bill be brought in to repeal the Irish acts of the 21st, 22nd and 26th of the King, for the purpose of consolidating their provisions into one act, and extending the same, to promote the employment of the poor in the fisheries, trade, and manufactures of Ireland, by regulating and encouraging partnerships in that part of the United Kingdom."

The resolution was agreed to.

FRAME WORK-KNITTERS.] The following petition of the frame work-knitters in the town and county of Nottingham was presented, ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

"That the petitioners are much distressed, not only from the want of employment, but also by the low price of labour, which accumulation of misery has reduced a considerable portion of them to pauperism, and a degree of wretchedness unknown to that district, and distressing to humanity; that much of the distress complained of arises from the introduction of fraudulent manufactured goods, which not only brings discredit on the trade in distant markets, but creates a competition amongst the petitioner's employers, ruinous to the workmen by the great reduction continually made in the price of their labour; the newly introduced goods are made without narrowings, and cut with scissors instead of being narrowed and made with selvages in the frame; another description of these goods are made without narrowings in the heel and feet, and fashioned with a needle instead of being finished with selvages in the frame in a workmanlike manner, a system not only highly injurious to the petitioners, but also much discountenanced and lamented by their employers: the great sufferings which the petitioners have endured, the enormous burthens thus thrown upon parishes, and the alarming evils thereby produced, have induced them to appeal to the house for such redress and assistance as their wisdom may suggest; and whilst the petitioners do not presume to dictate to the house, they humbly submit that, if the fraudulent articles above alluded to were prohibited, it would be a considerable relief to them, and maintain the trade of the district in its former credit and celebrity, and thus ultimately restore the petitioners to a state of comfort and happiness, of which they have been long deprived; they therefore that honourable and benevolent legislator, who has constantly evinced the greatest anxiety for the happiness and safety of his fellow subjects. It is stated in all our books, that High Treason is the greatest crime that a man can commit. Why, then, if he is allowed counsel in that case, should he not have the same assistance in defending himself against a charge of murder or robbery, which are crimes of an inferior nature? Sir Robert Atkins, in his "Defence of the late lord Russel's innocency" powerfully illustrates the severity of the want of counsel. As to the saying, that "The court is of counsel for the prisoner," he observes, "For my part, I should never desire to depend upon that only: I know what this is by experience."—Now, it is worthy of attention, that the statute (7 W. III. c. 3.) which allows counsel in cases of treason, expressly declares, that "nothing is more just and reasonable." The words of the preamble are these: "Whereas nothing is more just and reasonable, than that persons prosecuted for high treason and misprision of treason, whereby the liberties, lives, honour, estates, blood and posterity of the subjects, may be lost and destroyed, should be justly and equally tried, and that persons accused as offenders therein should not be debarred of all just and equal means for defence of their innocencies in such cases."—Here, then, it is admitted by the legislature, that persons who were before tried for high treason and were deprived of the assistance of counsel, were not equally tried: and the reason is obvious, namely, that the most learned and eloquent lawyers were employed to plead against them, and none were allowed to plead for them. And does not this inequality appear in all other cases? In treason, a prisoner is allowed to have counsel: in trespasses, and other offences, which are not capital, he is allowed to have counsel: so that, in a crime of the highest magnitude, and in the lowest species of offence, counsel may be employed; but there is an intermediate state, in which they are prohibited. The absurdity and injustice of this rule must be evident to every one who considers it.

pray the house to take their case into consideration, and to afford them such relief as they may deem expedient."

SPANISH SLAVE TRADE.] The Spanish slave trade treaty bill was read a second time.

Tuesday, April 14.

MARRIAGES OF THE ROYAL DUKES.] The Earl of Liverpool rose to state, that he wished to postpone the consideration of the message from the Prince Regent on the subject of the marriages of the dukes of Clarence and Cambridge until to-morrow. He should then state to the house the nature of the measure which it might be thought advisable to recommend to the adoption of their lordships, and the grounds on which it would be proposed. In the mean time he moved, that the said order be discharged.

The Marquis of Lansdowne said, he felt it impossible not to state the singular situation in which the house were placed by the message which the noble earl had brought down, and the very extraordinary conduct which had now been adopted upon it. He had always understood that the respect which the house owed to the crown required that no delay should take place in replying to any communication which might be made from that quarter. The well-known practice of their lordships was, to return an address on the following day: and as this was the general principle in ordinary cases, how much more ought it to be observed in the case of so important a communication as a message relative to the marriage of members of the royal family. It appeared to him, that the house were now bound to take the message into consideration, and return an answer. What motive could there be for delay? It was impossible to believe that the advisers of the Prince Regent, when they recommended the message which had been brought down, were unprepared to state any measures which they could recommend to be adopted upon it. This much he had thought it his duty to state, in order that, whatever appeared to be disrespectful to the crown in the proceedings respecting this communication, might not be laid to the door of the house, but that the blame should fall on those who were the advisers of this extraordinary course, and who had brought down a message from the throne, without being prepared with any proposition upon it for the consideration of the house.

The Earl of Liverpool was ready to admit that the blame, if any could be attached to the course of proceeding which had been adopted, must fall on those by whom it was recommended, and that he, therefore, was willing to take that blame on himself. With regard to what had been said on the course of proceeding, he should only remark, that when the object of an intended address was merely to return thanks to the Prince Regent for a communication made to the house, the usual practice was, not to postpone it for a day, but to vote it immediately; but when ulterior measures were to be proposed, it was due to the house that they should not be taken by surprise. He, therefore, thought it improper to propose to move an address until their lordships were in possession of the measure which was to be recommended. He felt that he should not be doing his duty, if he called upon them to give an opinion, before they were made fully acquainted with the sentiments of the Prince Regent's government on the subject, and the requisite information was communicated. It was therefore from no disrespect to the crown that the delay was proposed, since the sole object of postponing the consideration of the message until to-morrow was, that their lordships might be better prepared to give their opinion upon the measures which his Majesty's ministers might consider it their duty to recommend.

Lord Holland thought it difficult to decide which was more extraordinary, the course which the noble earl proposed to the house to adopt, or the reasoning by which he attempted to support it. He had begun with admitting, that if the house agreed to postpone the consideration of the message, his Majesty's ministers, or rather the noble earl only, was to be charged with all the blame which might attach to such a proceeding. This was, indeed, very condescending in the noble earl; but he apprehended that, if the house discharged the order as recommended—and he defied the noble lord, versed in precedent as he was, to shew that ever such an order had been discharged—notwithstanding the generosity of the noble secretary of state, the impropriety of so acting would rest with the house. He knew that his Majesty's ministers were so much in the habit of identifying themselves with the government, that they spoke as if they and the crown were the same thing; but he trusted their lordships would not allow them also to assume the authority of that house, nor place confidence in the opinion of the noble secretary of state, that he could bear all the censure of an act, which, if adopted, must be theirs. If the noble earl could not now state the measure that was to be recommended, why did he not propose to move a simple address of thanks? This would be consistent with the usual practice, and he should give the noble earl the opportunity of agreeing to one before he sat down. The noble earl, it was evident, had thought proper to bring down a message, and was not prepared to make any proposition whatever upon it, because he now apprehended an opposition which he at first did not anticipate. It might be recollected, that the noble earl had often spoken as if he were independent of the Prince Regent; and now it appeared that he wished to be independent of parliament, by establishing a little parliament of his own. (Hear, hear.) Among the other extraordinary circumstances which the noble earl's conduct on this occasion disclosed, it was not the least that he recommended to the House of Lords to act in a disrespectful manner towards the crown, by neglecting to reply to the message: he was not able to form any opinion of his own, on the subject of that message, without consulting others. For these reasons, it appeared to him that the noble earl was bound to state more distinctly to the house, the grounds on which he expected that their lordships were to adopt his advice, and depart from all former precedents. He had no hesitation in declaring, that the course which the noble earl proposed appeared to him not only disrespectful towards the crown, but also unfair to the crown, the house and the people. It was unfair to the house, if their lordships were disposed to carry the message into effect, not to allow them an opportunity for going up immediately with the address. On the other hand, if they thought there was any thing in the circumstances of the country which required that they should not concur in the recommendation of the message, it was unfair both to the crown and the country not to say so. Why was the character of their lordships to suffer the imputation of disrespect to the throne by an unnecessary delay in performing their duty? The practice which the noble earl had adopted of consulting private committees must have a most inauspicious appearance in the eyes of the country. What was it but calling on the House of Lords to defer what they ought to do now until to-morrow, that ministers might have time to tamper with those who were to decide on the question? (Hear.) He should therefore move, by way of amendment, such an address as the character of their lordships required them to adopt. He would propose, that they should express their zeal and attachment to the house of Brunswick, and their wish to carry into effect the objects of the message, as far as that could be done in the distressed state of the country. His own opinion—and what his opinion was, he should never shrink from stating on any question—was, that if the marriages contemplated in the message were to take place, suitable provision ought to be made for the princes; but the country had already provided so well for the splendour and dignity of the crown, that the provision could be made without imposing any new burthen on the people, and in that way, he thought, that splendour and dignity would be best consulted. He concluded by moving, instead of the words "that this order be discharged," words to the following purport, to be substituted after the word "that" in the original motion: "an humble address be presented to his royal highness the Prince Regent, to return thanks to his royal highness for the information which he had been pleased to communicate respecting the intended marriage of his royal highness the Duke of Clarence with the Princess of Saxe-Meiningen, and of the Duke of Cambridge with the Princess of Hesse; to express the entire satisfaction of the house in that arrangement, and to assure his royal highness that their lordships would cheerfully concur in all measures necessary to make such suitable provision as the occasion required; and as the zeal, attachment, and loyalty, which their lordships feel towards his Majesty's family and government, and the lively sense they entertain of the advantages of preserving the succession to the throne in the family of Brunswick dictate, due regard being had to the present burthened state of the people of this country."

Lord Sidmouth said, he wished to recal to the recollection of their lordships the circumstances under which the present discussion had commenced. The noble marquis who spoke first had said, that if the consideration of the message were postponed, the discredit of that proceeding would belong to the noble earl who had moved the discharge of the order, and not to the house. His noble friend readily admitted the truth of that observation. He candidly acknowledged, that if any discredit belonged to the proceeding, it ought to fall on the advisers of the Prince Regent, and on himself in particular. It had been asserted, that no reasons were stated for the postponement; but he understood his noble friend to have intimated that he would explain the grounds of the postponement when the message should be taken into consideration to-morrow. The address to be moved was not an ordinary congratulation or vote of thanks, and his noble friend justly expected that the house would look to him for the explanation of some plan or measure as the consequence of the message, and also, that their lordships would not be disposed to come to a vote without due information on the subject. The noble baron, however, who would be the first to object to an address proposed without any information, now wished to vote one for which no ground whatever had been laid. Was it not proper that the measure which was to be proposed to-morrow should then be explained? Considering the necessity there would be for going into details, it was not candid to call on his noble friend for explanations now. Alterations might be made in the plan. Different impressions which had been produced might be removed. (Hear, hear.) He would repeat, that different impressions might be removed, and alterations suggested, which would require consideration. These were reasons for delay which ought to weigh with his Majesty's ministers on such an occasion. His noble friend would be prepared to-morrow to give their lordships the requisite information. As for the amendment proposed by the noble baron, it was of a nature totally unprecedented, and was one which he was confident their lordships would not adopt.

Lord King said, he believed this was the first time that a minister had given a decided negative to an address of thanks and congratulation proposed to the throne. It was the usual practice to move an address to the throne on the day after a message was received, and now the noble earl, without any reason, desired the house to abandon that practice. It appeared that the noble lords on the other side of the house could not make up their minds as to what ought to be done until they received hints from persons out of parliament; whereas on the side of the house on which he stood, they were ready to vote an address as usual, in return to the message, guarding their answer with the words which his noble friend had inserted at the close of his motion. He should, therefore, vote for the amendment.

The Earl of Lauderdale felt it to be a very extraordinary proposition to delay the address which ought to be returned to the Prince Regent's message. But their lordships had to consider whether it would be more proper to delay the address for a day, or to adopt that which his noble friend had proposed, which, in his opinion, would be more disrespectful to the crown than the postponement proposed by the noble earl. There was no precedent of any such address as that which his noble friend had moved having ever been voted by the house. The words with which he had terminated it would imply, that their lordships had upon former occasions been unmindful of the burthens imposed upon the people. To agree to it would be to acknowledge that their lordships had neglected their duty. He, therefore, could not vote for the amendment.

The Marquis of Lansdowne observed, that the house were placed in a novel situation. If the amendment moved by his noble friend was unprecedented, their lordships must perceive that, such as it was, it was forced upon him by the unprecedented conduct of his Majesty's ministers. Their lordships had no other alternative left but to agree to the amendment, or to adopt the extraordinary course proposed by ministers. The noble earl had assigned no reason to induce their lordships to depart from the usual course; all that they had heard was, that they would be informed to-morrow of the reasons why they were not to do their duty today. The noble viscount, however, had gone a little farther, and made an important revelation. He had said that, by the delay, certain impressions might, perhaps, be removed. (No, no, from the ministerial benches.) He had attended to the noble viscount's words, and was confident that impressions to be removed, and alterations to be made in the plan, constituted the reasons which he had assigned for delay. He would ask, how were the impressions spoken of, whatever might be their nature, to be removed? Certainly not by argument; for none had been employed. But it appeared that there was some mode by which impressions were to be removed, and alterations made, without the knowledge and concurrence of that house; and that, while that process was going on, their lordships must patiently await the result. As the mode by which this was to be accomplished was, it seemed, not fit to be stated, the house were required to adjourn until ministers came fully prepared with the result of their secret consultations. The house were therefore brought into this strange predicament—that whether they adopted the motion of the noble earl, or the amendment of his noble friend, their conduct would be liable to objection. The motion of the noble earl appeared on the face of it the most disrespectful to the crown, and the most improper for their lordships to adopt; and upon that ground, if his noble friend persisted in putting his amendment, he should vote for it. Ministers had by their conduct imposed upon the house the necessity of choosing between two difficulties.

Lord Holland said, he felt it necessary to offer a few words in reply. His noble friend (Lord Lauderdale) had regarded his amendment as more objectionable than the motion of the noble earl. Would his noble friend, then, suggest any other mode of getting rid of the difficulty in which the house were placed? His motion was a consequence of that of the noble earl; for the mode which he had adopted in moving the amendment was rendered necessary by a proposition to discharge the order of the day. His motion certainly would not be respectful, if carried after that order had been discharged. He could not help feeling that he came to this contest with the noble earl on very unequal terms. He came expecting to vote an address on the message of yesterday; but the noble earl entered the house, after having consulted with others, and these others again with others, and, perhaps, with individual members of parliament. His noble friend had said that the amendment was unprecedented. He certainly must acknowledge that it was in some measure unprecedented, because there never had before been such a motion to amend; but he would contend, that the form was not unprecedented, for there had been several instances of addresses to the crown being moved in the way he had proposed this, by adding words after the word "that" in the original motion, the remaining words of that motion being afterwards negatived. He could not comprehend the ground on which the noble earl persisted in postponing the business on which the house ought now to enter, unless it were supposed that the word "to-morrow" carried with it some extraordinary spell, some magic charm. Yesterday the address was to have been moved "to-morrow"—to-day it was "to-morrow" again. On Thursday it might still be "to-morrow," and on Friday it might be found that two days would fortunately intervene. Thus the measure might be postponed, until ministers were fully prepared to come to a vote. His noble friend had objected to certain words in the address which he had moved. The way to cure that was, to propose an amendment. He might move that the words which he disliked should be omitted. It was, however, very extraordinary that his noble friend should suppose, that the bare act of professing any virtue was a proof of the want of it. But his noble friend had not taken his opposition to the amendment on a sufficiently large scale. He seemed to have forgotten that the address also spoke of the zeal, attachment, and loyalty of the house. Nay, his noble friend had but a few days ago agreed to an address to the crown on the marriage of the Princess Elizabeth, in which these sentiments were expressed, and never intimated that that address was so framed as to throw a suspicion of disloyalty on the majority of their lordships. Did his noble friend suppose that these were not the sentiments by which their lordships were usually governed? But where was the disrespect as he had framed his motion? It would appear on the journals, that, on a certain day, a single peer had proposed that a motion for an address should be discharged. On looking at the journals the crown would find, that the house had resisted this proposition, and had voted the address. The crown, he was convinced, would graciously overlook the disloyalty of that peer, and would never seek to know his name. (A laugh.) The generous disposition of the princes of the house of Brunswick would prevent them from asking who he was. They would say, they did not wish to be informed who the disaffected person was who had refused an address to the throne on such an occasion. The sovereign would doubtless cast a veil of oblivion over the transaction; and if information were offered to be given him on the subject, he would reject it, or act as Pompey did when he destroyed the papers found in the camp of Sartorius. If, however, the noble secretary of state would, after all, promise to agree to the amendment to-morrow, he would now agree to his motion for discharging the order.

The Address was negatived.

The question was then put from the woolsack, "That the said order be discharged;" upon which their lordships divided:

Contents, 51; Not contents, 12.

The Marquis of Downshire moved for a return of the incomes of the Dukes of Clarence, Kent, Cumberland, Sussex, and Cambridge, from military, naval, or civil appointments; also of all pensions or other allowances, as well as grants from the droits, or any other sources, since 1800.

The Earl of Liverpool objected to the terms of the motion, but had no hesitation in acceding to give the substance of the information required. He particularly objected to the term "sources."

After some discussion, a new motion was proposed, worded in a different manner, when the Bishop of Peterborough objected to it, as being altogether disrespectful and indelicate.

Lord Kenyon thought the naval and military emoluments ought to be omitted.

The Earl of Liverpool again expressed his readiness to give the information required; and the motion was left to stand over till to-morrow.

Tuesday, April 14.

WATER COMPANIES.] Mr. M. A. Taylor said, he held in his hand a petition from the vestry of the parish of St. Marylebone, praying that they might be allowed to introduce a petition for a bill to establish a new water company. He was induced to take up this matter, in consequence of the interest he took in a bill which was introduced into parliament in the last session, called the metropolis paving bill. Originally, there was but one or two water companies in the metropolis; but on account of the vast increase of population, a variety of companies applied to parliament to be incorporated. Those companies had endeavoured to undersell each other, some of them offering to supply their water at 10*s.* and others as low as 5*s.* per quarter. The consequence had been, that they had been so depressed in their finances, that some of them had been obliged to stop their works, and leave the public without any water. At length the companies had carved out distinct portions of the metropolis for themselves, and by that means many of the inhabitants were not supplied with water, while the rate was fixed as high as possible. Under these circumstances, he thought that a maximum ought to be fixed to the supply, and that a reserve should be made in case of fire. It was a lamentable circumstance, that, at a fire which took place six or seven weeks ago in the Strand, no fewer than seven lives were lost; and that for the space of a whole hour water could not be obtained. He was desirous, therefore, that this petition should be referred to a committee above stairs, when the proper arrangements might be made for introducing a bill to the effect he had stated. He was happy in representing to the house, that the water companies were so sensible of the impropriety of the present monopoly, that they had readily coincided with him in thinking that it would be for the benefit of all parties to refer the matter to the consideration of a parliamentary committee.

Mr. Warre said, he understood that the Grand Junction Company had no objection whatever to the principle of a maximum, since it was one on which they acted at present.

The petition was brought up, and referred to a committee.

WOOL TRADE.] Sir C. Burrell presented the following petition of the Wool growers, on the South Downs, in the county of Sussex. "That the petitioners, being flock masters, humbly beg leave to state to the house, that the South Downs, and most other thin poor soils of the united kingdom, are stocked with short wool sheep, which are alone adapted to such high situations, that the arable lands on these soils are principally manured with the sheep, by raising a quantity of artificial feed for the support of their flocks, which enables them to manure their arable land in high situations, which could not be done in any other way that could possibly repay the expense if manure could be procured; the petitioners beg leave to state, that the wool produced from these flocks is the article to which the occupiers look for payment of a considerable portion of their rents, taxes, and other outgoings, and they humbly submit, that the effects of large importations of foreign wool, almost free of duty, press the more hardly, as from the laws prohibiting export, they cannot obtain the relief of any foreign market to take off the surplus, and are compelled to submit to any price the manufacturers may be disposed to offer, while the manufacturer is protected from foreign competition, not only in the home market, but in most of our foreign possessions, and who are not labouring under the pressure of heavy parochial taxes and tithes as the petitioners; that the petitioners are informed the wools imported are entirely short wools, which they humbly conceive have caused the low price of that article of the home growth the last seven or eight years, during which time the short or fine wools have been selling at nearly the same price as long wools, which the petitioners humbly submit to have been produced by the enormous importation of foreign wools, almost free of duty; they therefore pray, that the house will take their case under their immediate consideration, and either repeal the laws prohibiting the export of wool, or impose such duty on the import as will afford full protection to the home grower for so considerable an article of produce."

The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Walter Burrell then rose, in pursuance of notice, to move "that a select committee be appointed to inquire into the state of the laws which restrain the trade in wool, the growth of Great Britain." He observed, that whatever objections might have been formerly urged against such a measure, the time was now come when the manufacturers ought to concede the boon which the agricultural body had long looked for, namely, the right of exporting their wool. When the manufacturers were in a state of rapid improvement, he conceived that he was entitled to ask this at their hands. The long wools of Lincolnshire and Leicestershire had sunk in price, in consequence of the quantity of foreign wool imported; and it was but just that the growers should be allowed every means for the fair disposal of their property. In 1814 and 1815 no less than 30,700,000 lbs. of wool were imported. Last year there was not so large an importation, but still it was very considerable. The foreign manufacturer had a very great advantage over the wool grower of this country. In consequence of not being burthened with poor rates, he could undersell the English grower, and this accounted for the market being overstocked with foreign wool. Every other species of produce, either of our colonies or of home growth, was allowed to be exported, and he could see no good reason why the same principle should not be extended to wool.

Lord Lascelles said, that the only reason assigned for this application was, that the wool trade of this country was in such a state of depression as to call for the interference of the house: but he was prepared to deny the fact. So far from that being the case, it was known to every gentleman conversant with this subject, that since the year 1816 the price of wool had risen very considerably, so much as from 14 to 15, 19 and 20 pence per lb. Even at the present time, the price of wool was rising, and, notwithstanding the home growth, and that procured from abroad, the market was inadequately supplied. It would be a satisfaction to the house to hear, after what had been said regarding the distress of the manufacturing districts of the country, that at no period since the commencement of the manufacture of wool, had there been so flourishing a year as the last, with the exception of the year 1813, especially with regard to the quantity of broad-cloth manufactured. It was indeed true, that the quantity of narrow cloths manufactured had been of a smaller amount than in former years. With the existing demand upon this species of our manufacture, he conceived it to be much more advantageous for this country to receive the raw material from foreign markets, and export it in a manufactured state, than to impose any new duty upon such imported article. There was, however, another objection which he had to the appointment of this committee. On a question of such great interest, he conceived it to be impossible to open a committee without going into a full detail of the subject, not only as to the price of the article itself, but into all the niceties and intricacies of the question; and, unless this were done, the publication of the report, he conceived, would be of great disadvantage to the interests of those concerned in the trade. In a former committee on this subject, held in 1816, his own conduct had been much reprobated, both within and without that house. On that occasion, he was so sensible that a report, such as could have been drawn up, would be highly prejudicial to the interests of the traders, that he moved a resolution which had been acceded to, and which confined the consideration of the subject to one particular point, namely, whether the price of wool at that time demanded the interference of the legislature. The hon. gentleman who had thought proper to make this motion, was aware that the application was founded upon petitions which had been dormant in the house for a considerable time, and that not one petition besides that which had been now presented, had been laid before them, praying for an examination into the subject. It was also remarkable, that when the committee of 1816 was formed, at the time of the great distress among all classes of the community, although the whole of those interested in the question were acquainted with its appointment, yet not one single individual appeared before that committee on the part of the petitioners. Under all these considerations, therefore, at a time when the manufacturers were commencing their operations with renewed vigour, and when, in fact, with regard to the article in question, there was an insufficient supply of the raw material from abroad, he was decidedly of opinion that the interference of the house was not required.

Mr. Curwen perfectly agreed with the noble lord, that the appointment of this committee was wholly unnecessary. The wool-growers and farmers, it seemed, would never be contented: no seasons, no weather, no price could please them. Although, in 1816, a sheep of 60 lbs. produced only 34*s.* 6*d.* it was now selling for 56*s.* Wool itself had risen enormously in price, and he would ask any gentleman, conversant with the trade, whether it was not likely to bear a still higher price. With respect to the question of exportation, his opinion decidedly was, that although it might be generally true, that free exportation and importation were advantageous to trade, yet, with respect to the staple of wool, it was directly the reverse. Corn could be exported without any injury to the labouring classes, but wool could not be exported without taking the bread from thousands who were employed in the manufacture of it. He gave the hon. gentleman who moved for a committee, full credit for his intentions to promote the interests of agriculture, but it should be remembered, that its prosperity depended on the flourishing state of our trade and manufactures.

Mr. D. Gilbert said, he thought it would be a great hardship if the house refused to institute an inquiry into this subject: he should, therefore, vote for the motion, without pledging himself to support any future measure.

Mr. Shiffner also supported the motion for a committee.

Mr. H. Davis said, he saw no reason whatever for going into a committee. He had obtained, during the present year, as an agriculturalist, 30 per cent. more for his wool than what he had been accustomed to receive. He believed, that, at present, the market was inadequately supplied.

Mr. Holme Sumner observed, that in the committee of 1816, to which the noble lord had alluded, the proceedings were hurried forward in the most summary manner. A number of individuals had complained to him that in consequence of the hasty manner in which the business was conducted, they had not had an opportunity of expressing their sentiments. He trusted, therefore, that the subject would be fairly investigated.

Mr. Alderman Atkins was of opinion, that if an inquiry were instituted, it would check the importation of wool from abroad. This would narrow the amount of manufactures—a circumstance which he considered extremely dangerous at the present moment.

Sir James Graham said, that the price of wool had considerably increased since this time last year. Only one petition had been brought up on the subject, and he could not consent that a system which had existed for near 200 years, and which had been so advantageous to our manufactures, should be disturbed.

Mr. F. Lewis said, that having been placed in the chair of the committee of 1816, he felt it his duty to express his sentiments upon the present occasion. If there were no stronger argument in favour of the appointment of this committee, than that the committee which sat two years ago to investigate the same subject, which it was now proposed to consider, had made no inquiry into the question, he should vote for the present motion. It could not be denied, that the present period offered a very favourable opportunity for the investigation; and he conceived that the house was imperiously called upon to appoint the committee. He would venture to say, that there never was a question which had been attempted to be disposed of by arguments so irrelevant and futile. Was it to be maintained, that the appointment or non-appointment of the committee, was to depend upon the price of wool—whether it was higher or lower at the present time than in former years? The committee would have other objects for its consideration. It would have to ascertain what degree of increase of price the agricultural interest had been deprived of by the system which had been adopted. The policy of the mercantile system had been to have a free export and import of all commodities; and even a free export of corn, one of the first necessaries of life, had been allowed. Why, then, was the exportation of wool prohibited in all times, and under all circumstances? In some trades there was but a single monopoly against them, but in the wool trade there was a double monopoly. The wool-growers were compelled to sell to none but the home manufacturers of wool, and to buy of none but those same manufacturers. Instead, therefore, of having the privilege of selling to as wide a market as possible, they were confined within the narrowest limits. Was it fair, to put one class of individuals in so advantageous, and the other in so disadvantageous, a situation? If the house would allow the committee to be appointed, he would himself undertake to prove, that all the grounds upon which this policy of prohibition was founded in 1660, when the prohibition was complete, were wholly untenable. Not one of those arguments then brought forward in favour of the measure could now be maintained; for they amounted to nothing short of this—that Europe could not manufacture cloth without the assistance of English wool. He would also prove to the committee, that a very large revenue would be raised upon the exportation of wool, and that was a point to which the house ought peculiarly to attend. As large a sum might be raised by this means as would enable ministers to repeal the additional duties on leather. This was one of the benefits which would arise, and he might enumerate others, but he would not now detain the house. He conceived that he had stated ample grounds for the appointment of the committee, and he should sit down, therefore, with declaring, that he should give his vote in favour of the motion.

The house then divided.

Ayes, 80; Noes, 85.

MARRIAGES OF THE ROYAL DUKES.] Mr. Wilberforce rose and asked, whether the noble lord intended to proceed immediately to move for a committee on the Prince Regent's message; as in that case he would postpone a notice of his, which stood for that evening.

Lord Castlereagh said, it was his intention to move the order of the day for a committee to consider the message, with a view of postponing it till to-morrow.

The order of the day was then read, and Lord Castlereagh moved, that the committee be deferred till to-morrow.

Mr. Brougham said, that he had last night taken the liberty of moving a temperate and moderate amendment, which was met by observations from gentlemen on the opposite side, and even from a learned friend on the bench below him, (Mr. Plunkett,) stating, that they were friends to economy, and anxious for it, but that the amendment was contrary to the usual practice of the house in considering messages from the crown. Precedents were cited as decisive against his amendment by those who really agreed with him in its spirit and substance. But now the noble lord opposite was endeavouring himself to deviate from all precedents, to which he was so much attached last night, and was going quite contrary even to the precedent of yesterday. The forms respecting the consideration of royal messages were adopted from a respect to the crown; but they frequently sacrificed the fit opportunities for discussion. From a feeling of loyalty and decorum to the crown, the house had been often called upon, in cases of much difficulty, to pledge themselves as to their conduct by voting addresses to the throne. The plain English of the matter was too obvious to be misunderstood. A noble lord, a member of the other house, had assembled a certain number of gentlemen, members of the house of commons, in a room in his own private house (hear), and had to them stated the intentions of government. The gentlemen assembled, he understood, were most of them respectable country members, many of whom, of course, entertained honest and liberal opinions. Perhaps, some of the assembly were not of the description of independent country members. He had understood, that some were of the learned profession to which he himself belonged. Many members, however, were excluded from this assembly. In fact, there was a body of members called together, who were feared by ministers, and to them the noble lord had made communications which were refused to the house of commons, assembled in its lawful and constitutional capacity. If the house of commons allowed such proceedings, a debate in parliament on the most important subjects would become a mere mockery. Questions might be put from the chair, and spoken and voted upon, and the result declared by the speaker: but there would be no real discussion. That would be previously settled elsewhere, the votes would be managed by private influence, and by practising upon the feelings and interests of members—a practice which he had a right, in such a case, constitutionally to suspect ministers of making use of. If by such means the sense of the house was to be made to coincide with these private deliberations, debating a question within those walls would be useless; except as in the case of yesterday, when, fortunately, as it turned out, some unhappy mistake was committed. He had not previously a fit opportunity to make his protest against such an unconstitutional practice, but he could not now let it pass without reprobation. (Hear.) It had turned out that Lord Liverpool, at whose house the gentlemen met, had mistaken their silence, on his making his statement, for their assent. But, as soon as they came from this private assembly to the open house of commons, in their proper characters as representatives, they declared, one after another, to the confusion of ministers, that the propositions submitted to them were too extravagant to obtain their concurrence. (Hear, hear.) He felt that he had a right to assume, that the object of postponement till to-morrow was to give time, not to feel more pulses, but to try new arts to influence the honesty and the votes of members. The noble lord asked for further time, on a question which he knew that he dared not then, though upon his own notice, bring before the house and the country. (Hear, hear.) If the virtue and honour of the house should negative the noble lord's proposition, as he hoped would be the case, he intended to submit a resolution, so constitutional in its spirit, yet so moderate and respectful, that he was inclined to believe that the house would agree to it.

Lord Castlereagh observed, that the meeting complained of was only a practice which often had been used before. He apprehended, that if members were prohibited from meeting together out of the doors of that house, under the pretence of their purity being corrupted by coming into contact with his majesty's ministers, no beneficial result would be found. He hoped, therefore, the house would allow him to make a counter protest against the new constitutional doctrine of the hon. and learned gentleman, which was not practicable, and could produce no advantage whatever. If ministers had a particular measure to bring forward, they might fairly consult with others as to its expediency. He must say, that ministers had possessed the confidence of parliament and the country, which confidence, while they were in office, they would try to merit and retain. (Hear.) The observations of the learned gentleman were in fact only part of a system to vilify and run down the administration of the government. He should enter into no particulars at that time, but reserve himself as to statements and reasons till to-morrow; when he should endeavour to satisfy the house that ministers had done what they conceived to be their duty, not only to the crown, but to the country.

Mr. Tierney said, that if the object of his hon. and learned friend had been, to attack and run down the government of the country, the attempt was perfectly unnecessary, for surely no ministry had ever so much vilified themselves, (Hear, hear,) and that, too, in the course of forty-eight hours. No administration he had ever known, or heard of, had put themselves into a more contemptible situation. (Hear.) He used these words because he knew of none other in the English language by which to express his opinion fairly. As to the question of the meeting being constitutional, or unconstitutional, he could only say, that there might be cases in which such a practice would be very allowable. For instance, if there were a question coming on concerning any particular branch of trade, commerce, or manufactures, there could be no impropriety in calling together particular persons concerned in such branches, and consulting with them on account of their more extensive knowledge of the matter. But the present was quite a different case, and affected at once the monarch, the house, and the people. When this meeting was held yesterday, he must presume that all had been settled by ministers, as to their objects, and that they had deliberately advised their royal master about the proposal of the grants, as a thing fitting to be done. This, he supposed, must have been the case previous to the meeting at Lord Liverpool's. They got together what they thought a faithful few. But ministers had now found out, that what they had advised the prince regent to recommend, the house of commons were not very likely to sanction. (Hear.) They wanted, therefore, to consult a faithful few, for a reconsideration of the measure; or they might perhaps say they were only acting under his royal highness's orders. At this sort of parliament assembled at Lord Liverpool's, his lordship, he thought, should have had a gallery for the accommodation of those who were not members, so that this precious debate might be heard. (Hear.) But, in fact, he understood, there was no debate, and that it was like a sort of quakers' meeting. (A laugh.) No notice, he was told, was taken by the members, of Lord Liverpool's speech to them; but when the gentlemen came out of Fife House, they broke out into a mutiny, (a laugh) and objected to the propositions of his lordship. For his own part, whether gentlemen held whig or tory principles, he respected and esteemed them alike, when they acted on conscience, and said, they would not vote for a measure which they did not think was right, and, therefore, ought not to be sanctioned by parliament. What was stated to the meeting was refused to parliament, who were to wait twenty-four hours for it. Now, he had waited for it, like others, for twenty-four hours, and he was then told, he and they must wait forty-eight hours before the desired information would be given. (Hear, hear.) The noble lord declined to tell why he postponed his communication; for, perhaps, he wished to avoid the degradation of saying, that he must wait to take further orders. (Hear, hear.) From what he had heard, he believed he might affirm something as to what was proposed by lord Liverpool. First, he understood that the minister proposed to make the income of the Duke of Clarence 40,000*l.* a-year, with an out-fit of 20,000*l.*: also that 12,000*l.* a-year additional should be given to the Duke of Kent, to make up his income 30,000*l.* a-year, with an out-fit of 12,000*l.* Further, that the Duke of Cumberland was to have an increase of 12,000*l.* a-year, and an out-fit of 12,000*l.*, and so to make up his 30,000*l.* a-year (hear, hear); and the Duke of Cambridge was to have, in the same way, 12,000*l.* a-year, to make the 30,000*l.* a-year, with his 12,000*l.* out-fit. If this scheme were sanctioned, the expense of it for this year would amount in the whole to 116,000*l.* (Hear.) In common candour he must believe that the ministers had deliberately and fully considered the whole measure, and that they thought the royal personages could not enter upon the marriage state, without these great additions of income; and also that, according to their general professions, they considered this as the most economical arrangement they could form. (Hear.) But why now change the mode of their proceedings? Why delay the consideration? Why did the noble lord, after having given his advice on the subject to his royal master, and produced his royal master's message to the house, now desert his royal master, and look about him to his friends in that house? Gentlemen who desired every practicable retrenchment, were now called upon to support a set of ministers who studied economy in the public affairs! (Hear.) The conduct of ministers in this transaction involved them in degradation upon degradation. They advised their royal master—they consulted their friends—they gave notice to the house, and then they postponed it. The noble lord had talked of running down the system of administration. When system was talked of, let gentlemen look at the bench opposite, and see whether any thing like system could proceed from such a strange, heterogeneous, and discordant body as that bench presented. (Hear, and a laugh.) Their only system was this—"try one thing, and if that won't do, try another." He must say that he felt for the situation of the noble lord; he had much commiseration for one who, in the eyes of foreign ministers, had assumed a character of importance and responsibility, resembling that of a sovereign rather than a minister. What sort of a figure must he make in the eyes of the various foreign ministers now in this country, appearing not to know what to do? (Hear, hear.) He believed sincerely, that nothing less than the noble lord's total abandonment of the whole proposition would be satisfactory to the country at large. (Hear, hear.)

Lord Folkestone observed that a great deal had been said last night respecting the forms of proceeding in that house, but it now appeared, that all order and precedents were to be violated. There was no precedent to be found in which an order for taking into consideration a message from the crown was discharged, without any reason being alleged.

The message was ordered to be taken into consideration to-morrow.

PRIVATELY STEALING BILL.] Sir Samuel Romilly moved that this bill be read a third time.

The Attorney-General said, he did not intend to oppose the provisions of the bill, but he wished the terms of the preamble to be changed. The preamble set forth, that this bill was founded on the principle that extreme severity was calculated to obtain impunity for crimes. To this principle he did not object, but he objected to the consequences of such a declaration of it. It might mislead men into a supposition that punishment ought to be proportioned to the precise degree of moral turpitude. He contended, that severity ought to regard not only the moral turpitude of the offender, but the pernicious consequences of his offence. There were crimes which might be committed with a degree of moral depravity, far short of that which prompted offences of a venial character, but which, on account of the consequences, merited, next to murder, the greatest of all crimes, the severest punishment. The second proposition on which he founded his opposition to the preamble was, that by declaring the change in the value of money to be a reason for altering the law, it pledged the house to alter every other act that was connected with such a variable commodity. The amendment which he now proposed went, therefore, not to affect the bill itself, but to restore it to its original and limited intention. It was, that for the words which stated that the extreme severity of punishment, by increasing the difficulty of conviction, afforded impunity to crimes, and which made the change in the value of money a reason for altering the law, should be substituted, simply, an expression of the expediency of repealing the law as at present constituted. (Hear, hear.)

Sir Samuel Romilly thought the objections not worthy of much consideration, but that the approbation which some members on the other side had expressed, might render it proper to offer some reply. He could not accede to the amendment, because it would expunge the very principle which made the bill both necessary and proper. His hon. and learned friend had spoken of the preamble as containing abstract propositions. What he had objected to as abstract propositions were only the result of observations founded on long experience. There was an indolence of legislation in modern times which suffered acts to be passed founded on no distinct principle at all. It had not been so formerly, and he was anxious to follow the example of better times, and to conform to a more reasonable standard, by stating in his preamble, the precise character of the bill. The principle now objected to was the very foundation of the bill. "extreme severity"—he begged that the house would attend to the expression—"extreme severity, by rendering conviction more difficult, afforded impunity to crime." This was a truth of universal notoriety. It was well known, that the fear of the punishment of death following conviction, had often prevented prosecutions for privately stealing, and thus afforded entire impunity to the crime. Instances were so numerous, and had been so frequently stated, that it was unnecessary to trouble the house with any reference to them. But, in the courts of justice, cases had lately occurred, which he would mention, merely for the sake of exemplification. He trusted, of course, to the authority of the newspapers for those cases. At the last assizes in the county of Southampton, a man was convicted of a burglary. A servant had broken into his master's house, and taken property to a considerable amount. On account of the disproportionate severity of the punishment, applications were made to the secretary of state for a mitigation of the sentence. But all those applications were unsuccessful, and the criminal was executed. In the newspapers the reason assigned for the failure of these applications was, that the judges had come to a resolution, that all servants convicted of stealing from their masters should suffer death. Whether the judges had come to such a resolution he knew not, nor did he pretend to censure them if they had: but if it was their resolution, it ought to be declared by a legislative enactment, and not to rest on a private agreement; for then servants would clearly see their situation, and be perhaps deterred from the crime. (Hear, hear.) But his object was to point out the effect of such proceedings on the minds of juries. In the last Old Bailey sessions, a person of the name of Milwood was tried for having stolen property to the amount of several hundred pounds from his master. The evidence was conclusive, and the jury convicted him, but they found him guilty of stealing to the value of 39 shillings. Could any man doubt that the jury, in this case, returned such a verdict in consequence of the statement in the newspapers, of the resolution of the judges that death should follow upon a verdict of guilty of stealing to the value of 40*s.*? He did not mean to blame the jury, although he could not adopt the language of judge Blackstone, who called such verdicts, "pious perjuries." The jury were driven to the dreadful alternative of acting in opposition to the awful oath they had taken, or of handing over a fellow-being to the last punishment, for a crime which had not been regularly connected with such punishment. With those facts in their faces, could they pretend to say, that the principle was not both manifest in itself, and an imperative reason for altering the law? As to the second ground of objection, could any one pretend that 5*s.* was now the same sum in value as in the reign of King William? Was it not now equal to 20*s.*, or, at least, to 10*s.*? If so, the punishment of death for 5*s.* now was necessarily more severe than the act contemplated, since it was applied to a sum not one-half the value of the sum to which the act had limited it. This was undeniably the standard assumed in the act: that standard being changed by the depreciation of money, a change in the act was necessary. His hon. and learned friend had said, that if the house acted on this principle now, it would pledge them to similar conduct on all similar occasions. He had never heard it urged as a reason why the house should agree to any measure, that they had sanctioned the principle on which it was founded in the preamble of another measure. But if they were so pledged, what was the injury? If there was any one other act on this principle; if in any one other case extreme severity arose from the same changes, why not make a similar alteration, and why should not the house be pledged to it? On these grounds he would press the preamble as it now stood. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Wilberforce said, that if his hon. and learned friend who had just sat down was not of the highest service to his country, it was not for want of zeal and perseverance in endeavouring to render our laws less bloody. (Hear, hear.) Upon a revision of our penal laws, and of the history of their application, it was quite manifest that the great preventive of crime was due attention to the reformation of criminals in the early stages of vice. Upon general reasoning, upon the principles of human nature, from the illustrations of experience added to the dictates of reason, it was as clear as any experiment on human nature could be, that attention to the early stages of criminality was the only sure mode of preventing and diminishing crimes. When he considered, that so much zeal, industry, judgment, and perseverance were exerted with this view, even by female characters, he indulged sanguine hopes of the happiest effects. But, to attempt the reformation of persons who had acquired a daring spirit of speculation in crimes, was generally fruitless. If there was any one evil to be deprecated and guarded against more than another, it was the introduction of a gambling principle in penal legislation. It extinguished all sobriety of consideration and seriousness of mind, and nursed that hardness and daring which qualified for any crime. It was on this account that he thought the connexion between crime and punishment ought to be obvious, and the principle on which punishment was inflicted to be plainly and unequivocally stated, although he was sorry on this point to differ from his learned friend on the other side (the Attorney-general). Indolence in legislation had been imputed by his learned friend near him. The charge was not without foundation; and indolence in penal legislation ought particularly to be avoided. Criminals did not sit down and accurately calculate the consequence of crime, yet the inseparable association of punishment with crime might often deter them from acts which they would otherwise attempt. But, for the sake of juries, who had the painful duty to perform of deciding the fate of a fellow-being, the law ought to be precise and invariable. If one principle was more sacred than another on this subject, it ought to be the certainty of punishment according to the nature of the crime. (Hear).

The amendment was then put and negatived; after which the bill was passed.

Wednesday, April 15.

MARRIAGES OF THE ROYAL DUKES.] The Earl of Liverpool having moved the order of the day, the prince regent's message was read by the clerk. The noble earl then rose to propose an answer to the communication which their lordships had just heard. The noble lord who yesterday moved an amendment on the motion, that the order be discharged, in stating his objections to that motion, intimated, that if the address to be moved were such a one as he proposed, namely, containing merely an assurance that their lordships would concur in making a suitable arrangement for the intended marriages, it would meet with no objection from him. (Hear, hear.) He had so understood the noble baron. The address which he intended to move would, therefore, be one on which no difference of opinion could be expected. It would not pledge their lordships to any opinion, either as to the whole, or as to any part of the arrangement. Its purport would be merely to thank his royal highness the prince regent for the communication he had been pleased to make, and to express the disposition of this house to concur in making a suitable provision for the events contemplated in the message. Though this was a motion which he might be warranted in making, without any prefatory explanation whatever, yet he was confident that there were no recent instances of such an address being proposed in which it had not been expected of ministers to state what were the views they entertained on the subject. Some questions would likely be asked, and it was to be expected that ministers would be called upon to state what they intended ultimately to propose. Their lordships were aware, however, that, according to the practice of the constitution, no arrangement which might be made on the present occasion could be proposed for the immediate consideration of that house. It must originate elsewhere, and it was impossible for the executive government to see what might be the fate of any proposition which might be made in that place. It might undergo modifications, or it might be rejected entirely. But their lordships' security was, that it must come before them in the shape of a bill, on which they would have the opportunity of finally giving their decision. He might, therefore, fairly consider himself precluded from the necessity of any explanation; but the usual practice proved, that their lordships did consider that the ministers of the crown ought to state the nature of the measure which it was intended to submit in the other house. Such had been the course he had followed some years ago, and in the year 1815, when he thought it necessary to give a full explanation of the intended measure. If, however, there were any occasion in which he could be more anxious than another to give an explanation to their lordships of the views entertained by his majesty's ministers on a measure to be submitted to them, the present was that occasion. Whatever difference of opinion might arise—whatever might be the result of the proposition, he should feel that he was not acting a candid and manly part, if he did not come forward and state, not only the arrangement his majesty's ministers thought it their duty to advise, but the whole of the grounds on which it had been resolved to propose that arrangement. In considering the question which would hereafter arise, their lordships would have to look at the nature of the case to be provided for. They all recollected the great and deep calamity which occurred in November last, in the death of her Royal Highness the Princess Charlotte. After the first ebullition of feeling, occasioned by that calamity—which could never be mentioned without sensations of pain and regret—had subsided, the great and general question which every one asked himself, and asked his neighbour, was, how will this event operate on the succession to the crown? This was a question which naturally arose from the state of the royal family. His majesty, they all knew, had been blessed with a numerous issue; but it was singular that, of the twelve living descendants of his majesty, seven princes and five princesses, the youngest prince was now 44 years of age, and there was not one of the princesses under 41. When he stated this circumstance, and that there was at present no descendant from any of the married branches of the family, he thought their lordships would not think it unadviseable to take measures to guard against any unfortunate contingency which might arise with regard to the succession. The situation in which the royal family stood with respect to issue, must surely be regarded as an object to which it was the duty of the executive government to pay attention. Their lordships might recollect that, in the speech from the throne, at the commencement of the session, a direct reference had been made to this subject. Parliament was then informed, that the subject was under the consideration of the executive government; and in the addresses of both houses, thanks were expressed for the communication, and satisfaction expressed that attention was to be paid to so important an object. Under these circumstances the present measure must be considered as of no common stamp, but as one of great political expediency and urgency. Their lordships had heard from the message, the state in which the business now remained. It announced that two marriages were in the course of negotiation; at the same time it was to be understood, that other cases might arise to which it would appear fair that the same principle which governed the arrangement for these two marriages ought to be applied. He thought it much better to look at the case in a general point of view, and to consider what ought to be done on the whole, than to discuss each separate case. (Hear, hear.) He did not mean to say that parliament were not to consider the cases separately, as they arose; but certainly each separate case would come more conveniently under the view of the house, after some general principle applicable to the whole had been adopted. It was possible that, for the convenience of the executive government, another course might have been preferable; but this, to which he had recommended the laying down a general principle, was certainly the most candid both towards parliament and the country. Having troubled their lordships with this general view of the subject, he should now state the particular measures which it had been thought right to advise. It had been proposed to grant to the first of the princes named in the message, his royal highness the duke of Clarence, the annual sum of 19,500*l.*, which would make up his present income 40,000*l.* a year. To the duke of Cambridge it was proposed to grant 12,000*l.* which would raise his income to 30,000*l.* The grant proposed to be made to the duke of Kent, under the like contingency, was similar. In making this proposition, and bringing the subject before their lordships, he felt it would be his duty to recommend that a corresponding provision should be made for the duke of Cumberland. What he had stated would put their lordships in possession of the whole of the measure which he had thought it his duty to recommend, and he had now to state the grounds upon which it had been thought proper to propose a difference in the sums to be granted. It appeared to him, and he doubted not would so appear to their lordships, that the case of the duke of Clarence would come before them under circumstances which must materially distinguish it from the cases of his royal brothers. He did not indeed stand in the situation of heir-apparent to the throne; but he was the next heir after the Prince Regent and the Duke of York; and looking at the contingencies which might arise, the executive government did not think that it could be regarded as unreasonable to follow the precedent of 1792, when the Duke of York was married. At that period the Duke of York was not nearer to the crown than the Duke of Clarence is now. The proposition, however, which was then submitted to parliament by Mr. Pitt, was, that the income of the Duke of York, including what he derived from his regiment of guards, should be raised to 40,000*l.* At the distance of 25 years, with the difference which has since arisen in the value of money, he never could think that a proposition to grant the same income, under similar circumstances, to the Duke of Clarence, was unreasonable. It appeared to him, that ministers were fully justified in making that precedent the foundation of the measure they intended to propose to parliament. He was old enough to remember the proceeding which took place in parliament on the marriage of the Duke of York. The proposition then made by government did not, it was true, pass altogether without objection, but it experienced no material opposition. It was supported not only by the great minister whose name he had mentioned, but by another great statesman, the individual who was then at the head of the opposition—he meant the late Mr. Fox. The only question that produced any discussion in the house of commons was, how far it was proper that information should be given respecting the revenues which his royal highness derived from the bishoprick of Osnaburgh. The call for that information was most powerfully opposed by Mr. Pitt, and still more strongly combated by Mr. Fox, who stated broadly that the house had no right to inquire into what income the Duke of York derived from foreign sources. All that they had to consider was, what was fit to be given by a British parliament to a British prince, under the circumstances of the case. The measure then passed with the general concurrence of all parties. On that occasion he recollected a remarkable proposition was stated by Mr. Fox relative to the outfit, and which had been acted upon in a measure adopted a few years ago. Mr. Fox urged the necessity of granting a sum by way of outfit; and observed, that if it was not given, it would be impossible for the illustrious prince, considering the extraordinary expenses he must incur, to avoid embarrassments. This proposition was approved 25 years ago; and if it was reasonable that the Duke of York should be then allowed a sum for outfit, he could not think it unreasonable to apply the same principle to the case of the Duke of Clarence. Their lordships recollected the joy which had been manifested on the marriage of the Princess Charlotte. The sum then proposed was 60,000*l.*, and no proposition ever experienced greater approbation. He did not mean to say that the circumstances were precisely the same. There certainly was a very evident distinction; but was not the difference sufficiently allowed for in the difference of the sum which had been proposed? There had been another case of royal marriage, which could not be cited as a precedent, as no application had been made to parliament in consequence of it—he meant the marriage of the Duke of Glocester and the Princess Mary. No one could feel more respect than he did for the motives which induced those illustrious persons to abstain from making any application to parliament on their union. But in recollecting that no augmentation was proposed to be made to the income of the Duke of Glocester on that occasion, it was to be considered that the government, in acceding to the views of that illustrious individual, would naturally consider the state of the income which he would enjoy by a grant of parliament, though not made on the occasion of the marriage. Had it not been for that consideration, he should not have thought that he had performed his duty if he had failed to advise the illustrious Duke to consent to an application to parliament for an increase of income. If personal feelings were to influence his conduct, there certainly was no member of the royal family whose interests he would have been more desirous of promoting; but it was his wish to do justice to all by acting on a general principle, and that, he apprehended, was the course which their lordships would be inclined to approve. It was known to their lordships that 8,000*l.* a year was received by the illustrious persons out of the consolidated fund; so that, including the income of the Princess and his own, the Duke of Glocester had 28,000*l.* a year. This certainly was not more than was requisite to support the rank and dignity of the illustrious Duke and his royal consort. The income of the Duke of Glocester, with his emoluments, approximated to that which had been proposed for the junior dukes of the royal family; and he did not think that the proposition to give the Duke of Clarence 40,000*l.*, and the others 30,000*l.*, could be regarded as an unreasonable proportion. There was another case to which he had to call the attention of their lordships—he meant that of the Duke of Cumberland. When that case was under consideration, some years ago, their lordships had agreed to an address, approving the measure recommended in the message. After the other house had concurred in voting a similar address, a bill was introduced, which was, however, lost in its progress, and had never come before their lordships. Since that period it had not been thought expedient or proper to bring this case again under the consideration of parliament. But when the cases of the other princes were brought under view, there could be no ground for withholding that of the Duke of Cumberland. What reason could be assigned for casting so marked a stigma on that illustrious person? There had been nothing in his conduct which could justify such a neglect; and certainly nothing had appeared in the conduct of the illustrious princess his consort, since she had been in this country, which could influence such a proceeding, or account for the decision which had been come to by the other house of parliament. It was therefore considered that a proposition for increasing his, the Duke of Cumberland's, income, in the same proportion as that of the other princes, should be submitted to parliament. But it was worthy of their lordships' consideration, that the sum proposed to be voted would not long continue a burden. Their lordships were aware that a sum had been voted for the payment of the debts of the Prince Regent, and which had been regularly applied to that purpose. The whole of these debts would be liquidated in the course of a year and a half, or two years at most. In consequence of the liquidation, 50,000*l.* a year would be saved, which, with the 10,000*l.* that had already fallen in by the death of the Princess Charlotte, would more than cover the whole of the additional allowances which it had been proposed to grant. This statement, he hoped, would prove satisfactory to those who had intimated an opinion that the money required should be derived from funds now appropriated to the use of the royal family. Various circumstances had induced him to explain thus far what had been the intention of his Majesty's government; but he was aware that impressions and feelings had been entertained on the subject which he had not expected, and which he thought ought not to have been entertained. He did not mean, however, to shrink from the avowal of the part he had taken in the question. He had done what he considered his duty as a member of the Prince Regent's government. Whatever responsibility might be attached to the measure, he was ready to acknowledge that all the onus of that responsibility ought to fall upon him. He had, however, now stated what were the feelings of the illustrious persons who were the objects of the measure. It was not their wish, in the present situation of the country, that any proposition should be urged beyond what might be considered fair and just, both in and out of parliament. He knew not in what state the measure might come from the other house; but if the whole proposition should not be approved of—if any modifications did take place, he hoped the measure would not be reduced to such a state as to induce the illustrious personages to relinquish their intended union, or to encounter considerable difficulty or embarrassment, if they persisted in carrying it into effect. After having given the most anxious consideration to the subject, he was authorized to state, that the illustrious person first named in the message would be satisfied with about one half of the sum which had originally been proposed to be given him by the executive government. The sums proposed for the other princes would, in the case of an arrangement founded on this principle being adopted, be reduced in the same proportion. But the measure would come before their lordships in the shape of bills, when the details could be more conveniently discussed. The noble earl concluded with moving an address in the terms stated in the commencement of his speech.

Lord King was persuaded that the whole nation would concur in that part of the address which expressed the good wishes of the house for the royal family: the unanimity with which the throne had been approached on the marriage of the Princess Elizabeth was sufficient evidence of the satisfaction parliament felt at the establishment of any of the members of the illustrious house of Brunswick. His lordship's approbation extended to all parts of the address, but that in which reference was made to the sums to be supplied; and here, he thought, there was a material omission, which he should endeavour to supply. If there was one sentiment more general than another at the present moment, it was a reluctance to add to the already enormous burdens of the people; and on this account it had been regretted by the great majority of the community, that this proposition had ever been brought forward. Distressed as were now nearly all classes, he thought that the house would compromise its duty, if it consented to add any weight to the load already sustained. The noble earl had referred to the case of the marriage of the Duke of York in 1792, and had cited it as a precedent in favour of what was now suggested; but surely he had forgotten what fell from Mr. Pitt upon that occasion, when he said that it was not intended that that proceeding should be considered a warrant for a similar step at any future time: he had distinctly guarded it from being drawn into a precedent; and he added, that that union was attended with a peculiar circumstance not existing in other cases, namely, the importance of an alliance with Prussia which would thereby be effected, and he had actually moved that the treaty with that monarchy should be referred to the committee. (Hear, hear.) The noble earl had also said, that the original intention was to have proposed to parliament a provision in amount double what had been now suggested; but that, even reduced as it had been, the royal personages whose interests were especially concerned did not wish for more than parliament held it consistent with its duty to give. Surely this was not the rule by which the amount ought to be measured—the proper criterion was not the amount the royal dukes were willing to receive, but the sum the people could afford, or were willing to give. (Cheers.) In a question of this kind it was the duty of ministers to consult the wishes of the people, and nothing should be done that did not meet with the general consent of the nation at large. If the object were to augment the love and reverence with which these illustrious individuals should be regarded, would not that love and that respect be diminished by a disregard of the distresses of the people, while attention was only paid to the demands of the princes? (Hear, hear.) The delay which had taken place had certainly been productive of an advantageous alteration of the proposition: still, however, it was open to objection, and the impression produced abroad by the inconsiderate statement in the first instance, would not be removed by the change that had been made. His lordship therefore proposed, that, at the end of the address as moved, the following sentence should be inserted: "But this house must at the same time express its confident hope that such provisions as are necessary may be made without creating the necessity of any additional burdens upon the people."

The Marquis of Buckingham said, he could not come to the consideration of this question without considerable pain, not arising from the duty which he had to perform, but from the manner in which the house had been called upon to take this subject under its view. The difficulty arose from the mode in which the matter had been brought forward. He should, perhaps, have felt no objection to the terms of the address, but for circumstances which had now become perfectly notorious: he might otherwise have felt that degree of confidence in ministers as to believe that they would not add, without imperious necessity, to the burdens of the people. The facts, however, to which he referred, and which had been referred to by the noble earl at the head of the treasury, rendered it impossible that the house should shut its eyes to the real object of this proposition. It had now become matter of public notoriety and discussion what the original suggestion was intended to have been, and the noble earl had stated the reasons why the sum intended to have been required had been diminished. If no new burdens were to be laid upon the people under this re-considered arrangement, those burdens would have been necessary had the proposal been made in its original form, and it was the duty of the house to take care that even the more moderate demand was not enforced from those who were unable to comply. If, therefore, so large, so unreasonable a sum was to have been claimed in the first instance, until it was thought adviseable, from the general repugnance to the proposition, to reduce it, it unavoidably induced some jealousy lest even the smaller amount should not really be necessary for the purposes for which it was required. His lordship was as ready as any man to allow that the splendour of the crown ought to be maintained; it ought to be supported by every means compatible with the resources of the country; and all he hoped was (expressing that hope by his vote in favour of the amendment) that that splendour would not require that any new weight should be added to that which the nation already endured. The splendour of the crown was intimately connected with the welfare of its subjects; and for this very reason, if for no other, the feelings of the crown ought to be in unison with the feelings of those over whom it presided: the moment they ceased to be so, nothing could remain to the people but submission to power and despair of redress. At the present moment, when the load of taxes was so onerous, it surely was not too much for parliament to express its hope, that the splendour of the crown would be maintained without a further diminution of the few remaining comforts of the people. In voting for the amendment, therefore, his lordship felt that he was acting in a manner consonant with the duty he owed to the crown, and the duty he owed to its subjects. The most glorious splendour of the crown was derived from the love and approbation of the people. Regretting, therefore, that ministers had not been more advised in their original and extravagant suggestion, and convinced that it was unnecessary to resort to the nation at large for any new supplies to make good these demands for the younger branches of the royal family, he should vote for the amendment.

The Marquis of Lansdowne said, he could not allow the question to go to a vote without offering a few remarks upon the address itself, and upon the particular moment at which parliament was called upon to vote in its favour. To the address, in its present amended shape—amended, as the noble earl confessed, in consequence of the imperious call of public opinion that the demand should at least be reduced—he did not feel prepared to object. He admitted that the alliances of the various branches of the royal family were essentially connected with the prosperity of the country; and he was willing, therefore, to acquiesce in a provision to a reasonable extent; for it was the duty of parliament to provide the means for carrying those alliances into effect. In doing so, however, it was idle to say that reference should only be had to the splendour of the crown, without regard to the feelings or to the opinions of the people, because, upon those feelings and opinions, the royal family were more dependent than upon any revenues it might at present enjoy: a disregard of those feelings and opinions had, in former times, put to hazard the stability of the throne itself, and an attention to them had hitherto cemented the union between the house of Brunswick and those over whom it was appointed to govern; the attachment of the people was at once the highest splendour and the greatest security of the crown, and there was no man who would not devoutly join in the prayer that that attachment might long continue by being long deserved. (Hear, hear.) His lordship did not now wish to trouble the house at any length after what he had said upon a former night; but he could not help lamenting the hasty and unadvised course which ministers had pursued on a question of such importance. Many objections that might have been urged had been obviated by the mode of statement adopted by the noble earl (Liverpool); but it was still remarkable, that now, for the first time in our history, two royal marriages were announced in the same message. It would certainly have been more regular and more convenient if they had been separately communicated to parliament, that the advantages or disadvantages of each might be distinctly weighed before the house arrived at any conclusion. The noble earl had however intimated, that each case would stand on its own merits, and that they could be separately discussed in separate bills, and it was therefore unnecessary now to enter into minute particulars. He was prepared however to say, that provision to the extent now required, ought to be made; but at the time he made this declaration, it was fit that the people, who had cheerfully endured so many distresses, should be assured that it would not be necessary for them to sustain any new privations, and that means existed of supplying the needful sums without resorting to new and oppressive taxes. When noble lords recollected the enormous amount of the civil-list, and the number of existing offices; above all, when they recollected the unfortunate calamity which some years ago had led to the establishment of the regency, with all its expenses, (to which he had at that time offered no opposition), they would be extremely unwilling to grant more than was necessary, or to create new funds out of the pockets of the people. When the Prince of Wales was appointed Regent, two courts were necessarily established; and what passed upon that event was now matter of historical record. The distinguished individual at that time at the head of the government, Mr. Perceval, in proposing a committee to inquire into the charges to be incurred, had stated the necessity of maintaining a court not only in London, but at Windsor—the latter in the hope which all indulged, and which at that period it would have been unnatural and unfeeling to have abandoned, that the King's recovery might be speedy and complete—that when his Majesty returned to the enjoyment of his faculties, he should be surrounded with those comforts, and a considerable portion of that state and splendour, to which he had been so long accustomed. This event the prime minister of that day stated as probable; or, supposing the health of his Majesty not to be so completely restored as to enable him to return to the functions of his high office, still it was fit that he should not be stripped of all the consolations and all the comforts of which he was susceptible. All men concurred in this proposition in the expectation of a speedy recovery; and if any such hope could now be indulged, he would be the last to suggest a diminution of the vain splendour (for it was now vain) by which the exalted personage to whom he referred was environed: all expectation of the re-establishment of the King's health must, however, now be at an end, and there was, consequently, nothing to justify the continuance of an expense which added greatly to the burthens of the people. With perfect respect, therefore, to the occupant of the throne, and with every regard to its dignity and splendour in this monarchical government, he hoped and believed that at least something might be obtained from this source to meet the new charges of which the house had recently obtained intelligence. If adequate provision could not thence be procured, some useful retrenchments might, no doubt, be made in other departments; and if at the present moment, in consideration of the privations of the nation at large, a bill was in progress (as he understood the fact to be) to deprive the widows of officers even of their pensions, if elsewhere they could obtain a pittance for their support, it was not too much to expect that every means would be resorted to, to raise the money now required, before any resort were had to new and oppressive taxation. He did not refer to this measure for the purpose of invidious distinction or comparison, but merely to shew the measures of extreme severity to which ministers, in this instance, had had recourse. He was persuaded that such an arrangement could be made as, while it gave satisfaction to the illustrious persons to be benefited by it, would rejoice the people, who would not be injured by it. The marriage of any member of the royal family ought always to be a subject of joy and congratulation with the whole nation; but it would cease to be so, if upon all occasions such an event was to be attended with new and grievous impositions. On these grounds he should vote for the amendment, though generally concurring in the terms of the address, and more especially in those parts which expressed the satisfaction of the house at these alliances, and the attachment it should ever maintain towards the royal family.

Lord Erskine said, that although he concurred in much that had fallen from the noble marquis who had just taken his seat, he did not think that the present, if at all, was the proper time for making the proposed amendment. The noble marquis had admitted the fitness of supporting the dignity and splendour of the throne, and yet, with some degree of inconsistency, had recommended that its illustrious and venerable occupant should be stripped of the last relics of royalty, and of the last comforts of age and infirmity. While the house was employed in voting sums for the support of the younger branches of the family, the noble marquis proposed that the aged stock, the reverend parent, and the illustrious head of a royal house, should be abandoned under his numerous afflictions, and deprived of the few attendants which his calamity rendered even more necessary. (Hear, hear.) He regretted that he was under the necessity of differing from the friends with whom he usually acted, but his own sense of duty was too strong to allow him to vote in favour of the amendment. The terms of the address did not import that new burthens would be imposed upon the people, and probably, arrangements might be made, not inconsistent either with the dignity and splendour of the crown, or with the happiness and comfort of the subject. At all events, in the present stage it was unnecessary to point out any particular fund from which the needful supplies should be drawn.—His lordship voted for the address, because it pledged the house to no particular measures; and against the amendment, because he thought it was wholly uncalled for by the terms of the address.

The Duke of Atholl maintained, that to vote for the amendment would be to imply that the address was an imposition upon the house; his principal objection to it, however, was, that it was premature, the mode in which the money was to be raised being more properly to be considered in a future stage of the proceeding. One point of great importance had not been adverted to, namely, the resource to be afforded on the payment of the debts of the Prince Regent; and if the inhabitants of the island were polled from one end to the other, he was convinced they would be much more willing to sustain new privations than to allow that the comforts and conveniences of their decayed and beloved monarch should be diminished.

Lord Rolle hoped that the provision for the royal dukes could be made without any addition to the taxes, and he saw every prospect of doing so, recollecting that a considerable sum had become disposable by the lamented death of the Princess Charlotte. The noble marquis had recommended the reduction of the establishment of the King at Windsor: to this he could not assent, for, as his Majesty had been ever gracious to him in prosperity, he would never desert him in adversity.

Lord De Dunstanville felt called upon to vote for the amendment; but in doing so, he begged to be understood as by no means objecting to any reasonable allowance to the members of the royal family.

Lord Holland, after observing that his noble friend (Lord Erskine) objected only to the time at which the amendment was introduced, contended, that his objection to it was the same as that of the noble lords at the head of the treasury. They said, there was nothing in the address that any reasonable man could object to: the noble lords, on the opposite side, contended, that there was nothing in the amendment that could be objected to, or which was in any way inconsistent with the address proposed. The noble earl who spoke at the beginning of the debate had taunted him, that he would have had no objection to the address if the intention with which it was brought forward had not been expressed. It was true he should not have objected to the address if no intentions had been stated; but after those intentions had been expressed, he thought they ought to be coupled with an exposition of the principles on which the house meant to act. To such an address as that proposed no one could agree, unless it had been accompanied by the statement of the noble earl; but even when accompanied with that statement, no person could properly assent to it without explaining at the same time the principle on which he modified his assent. It was not to the address that he objected, or the principle on which it was proposed, but he thought it necessary to state in what manner that assent was to be taken; and he put it to their lordships, whether it would not be a more fair and candid way of proceeding, at once to define and limit the mode in which they granted their assent, than to agree generally to the address when it was first proposed, and then, when any specific plan was brought forward, to say that they could not accede to it, as they never intended, by giving their assent, to add to the burdens of the country. The noble lord who commenced the debate had divided the subject brought forward into three heads:—In the first, he stated the usual course of proceeding on these occasions; in the second, he told their lordships what his own intentions had originally been; and in the third, what he now meant to propose to their lordships, without any alteration of opinion as to the propriety of his first intention. The second of these statements ought to weigh much with their lordships, because it appeared that the ghost of the noble lord's original intention was still hovering over the whole of this transaction, and that his whole speech was nothing more than a defence of that intention. (Hear, hear.) If, then, any noble lord should yet induce their lordships to recur to the original intention of ministers, which, for aught that appeared, was not yet totally abandoned, would it not be much more open and manly to express the ground on which that address was voted, namely, that if even the sum of 40,000*l.* per annum was to be voted, it could only be in some mode that would not add to the burdens of the people? When, therefore, he concurred with the address that had been proposed, it was not on the ground relied on by the noble earl. He concurred with the address only as it was limited and explained by the amendment; he concurred in all the sentiments expressed in the original address; but he wished to shew, at the same time, on what reasons his concurrence was grounded. It was unnecessary to say, that, in attachment to the throne, in attachment to the house of Brunswick, which was endeared to the country by public and private virtues—endeared, above all, by the title it had to the affections of the people, the title of their own choice, and not by any exploded notions that seemed to be again springing up in neighbouring countries, under the name of "legitimate right," it was unnecessary for him to state that he most fully concurred in every attachment that could be felt for that illustrious house. To the people of this country, who had so long enjoyed prosperity under that family, any alliances that it thought proper to make, ought to afford matter of congratulation. But were those alliances to be made, not with foreign princesses, but with honourable ladies, natives of this land, he should consider the alliance equally a subject of congratulation: and he spoke this with reference to an act of parliament, commonly called the Royal Marriage Act; an act which he considered an extraordinary and unwarrantable innovation on the constitution of the country, and which he heartily wished to see repealed*. The noble earl himself, in speaking of the late lamented Princess Charlotte, had pointed out one of the evil effects of that act. To return, however, to the question before the house. He acknowledged, that the marriages of any branch of the royal family afforded a proper ground of congratulation both to the throne and the people, and it was undoubtedly proper that an adequate provision should be made for the royal progeny that might arise. He was therefore happy to hear, that the noble earl was guided by general principles on this subject, and not by applications made to any particular instance; that upon such an occasion he was actuated by no party-feeling whatever, and he hoped, that the noble

* The Royal Marriage Act was occasioned by the displeasure which the king felt at the marriage of his brothers, the dukes of Cumberland and Gloucester. In 1771, the duke of Cumberland privately married Mrs. Horton, widow of Christopher Horton, esq. of Catton Hall, in the county of Derby, and daughter of lord Irnham. When the marriage was publicly announced, his majesty forbade them the court. In the ensuing spring, however, the duke of Gloucester avowed as his consort, the countess dowager of Waldegrave, whom he had espoused in 1766. On the 20th Feb. 1772, the king sent down the following message to both houses. "His Majesty being desirous, from paternal affection to his own family, and anxious concern for the future welfare of his people, and the honour and dignity of his crown, that the right of approving all marriages in the royal family (which ever has belonged to the kings of this realm as a matter of public concern) may be made effectual, recommends to both houses of parliament to take into their serious consideration, whether it may not be wise and expedient to supply the defect of the laws now in being; and, by some new provision, more effectually to guard the descendants of his late majesty king George II. (other than the issue of princesses who have married, or may hereafter marry into foreign families) from marrying without the approbation of his majesty, his heirs or successors, first had and obtained." In consequence of this message, a bill was brought in and passed, "for the better regulating the future marriages of the royal family." The act contains three clauses. I. That no descendant of his late majesty King George II. (other than the issue of princesses married into foreign families) shall be capable of contracting matrimony, without the previous consent of his Majesty, his heirs or successors, signified under the great seal. II. That in case any such descendant, being above the age of 25 years, shall persist in his or her resolution to contract a marriage, disapproved of, or dissented from, by the king, his heirs or successors, then such descendant, upon giving notice to the privy council, may at any time, from the expiration of twelve months after, contract such marriage; and his or her marriage, with the person before proposed and rejected, may be duly solemnized, and shall be good, unless both Houses of Parliament shall, before the expiration of twelve months, expressly declare their disapprobation of it. III. That every person, who shall knowingly, or wilfully, presume to solemnize, or to assist, or be present at, the celebration of any marriage with any such descendant, without such consent as aforesaid, except in the cases above-mentioned, shall incur the penalties of a præmunire. (The penalties of a præmunire consist in a total forfeiture of all goods and estates, imprisonment at the will of the king, and not to be relieved, even if starving.) When the Commons went into a committee, on the 20th of March, the Speaker (Sir F. Norton) said, that so severe a law, which was originally framed for depressing the civil power of the pope in this country, should not be extended to crimes of a very small nature, as in this bill. The ministers replied, that the penalty of præmunire had at different periods been applied to less crimes, as to an Act against Usury, &c. and lately to the Regency bill; that it was only in terrorem, and if it prevented the marriage complained of, it did not signify how severe it was, as it probably would not be put in execution.) The bill was opposed with extraordinary vigour in both houses, and particularly in the commons. Mr. Burke spoke for it, and Mr. Fox against it. On the 23d of March, Mr. Rose Fuller moved to insert a clause, that it should continue in force during the reign of his present majesty, and for three years after his demise, and no longer. After a short debate, the question was put that this clause be made a part of the bill, when the house dividing, there appeared Ayes 132, Noes 150; so that the clause was rejected by only a majority of 18. As soon as the division was over, several of the minority came in, being locked out at the time of the division, which was the means of losing the clause.—The numbers in the lords, on the question that the bill do pass, were, Contents 69, Proxies 21—90. Not Contents 25, Proxy 1—26. The numbers in the commons, on the same question, were, Ayes 168, Noes 115. A protest of great length was signed by fourteen peers, and a shorter protest by six peers. In the latter it was stated, among other objections, "And because the bill is essentially wanting to its avowed purpose, in having provided no guard against the greater evil, the improper marriages of the princes on the throne."

Previously to the second reading in the commons, Mr. Dowdeswell moved the following resolution:—"That it does not appear that the proposition affirmed in his Majesty's message to this house, viz. 'That the right of approving all marriages in the royal family has ever belonged to the kings of this realm as a matter of public concern,' is founded in law, or warranted by the opinions of the judges of England." This motion was disposed of, after a violent and long debate, by reading the other orders of the day. In the course of his speech, Mr. Dowdeswell observed, that, "One and twenty was the legal age of marriage for ordinary mortals. Why, then, should a different rule hold with respect to the royal family? Did their understandings ripen more slowly, or were they men later? In the succession to the crown we had adopted a different rule. We supposed them at eighteen equal to the arduous task of swaying the earl thought that that side of the house would be guided by the same general principle, and would equally abstain from the indulgence of any party-feeling. He was satisfied that the subject ought to be considered only with a view to general principles, and with no distinction of any particular individual. No branch of the royal family had ever been disaffected towards the country; and all were in their respective degrees equally entitled to the regard of the people. It was on that ground, he thought, that if any of the burdens of the people were extended for the marriage of any of the royal family, the provision made should include all the branches, and each to the same amount. As to the allusion that had been made by the noble earl to the marriage provision made for the Duke of York, independently of any income he derived from a bishopric in Germany, on that head he entirely agreed with the noble earl, and thought that any income or advantage which the royal family possessed from sources not in Great Britain, ought not to be considered in grants or settlements which this country thought proper to make on any foreign alliance. It was not for Great Britain to portion its princes according to any scale of advantage they might derive from a petty principality in Germany. But here he had done with his admissions, and could concede no farther to the noble earl. Indeed, he had afterwards considered, that through the whole of the noble earl's speech it appeared, that when the question was not concerning debts to be paid, but allowances to be granted, two things were always to be considered—what it was fit the party accepting should take, and what the party offering was able to give. In the allowance made on the marriage of the Duke of York, the nation was guided both by the comparative prosperity of the country at that time, and the greatness and importance of the alliance that was about to be entered into. The alliance was great, and the country was flourishing, with all the blessings of peace. Let us look at the present alliances contemplated, and we should find them of much less importance than that of 1792. Let us look also at the situation of the country, and see what that situation is after all our glorious wars! See the people tied up in their means by exorbitant taxation, and trampled on by arbitrary and oppressive statutes, suspending their rights and silencing their complaints. Even in the third year of the peace, see the checks on industry and prosperity, and the distress occasioned by an extravagant system of government; and then grant on the same principle and to the same amount as in 1792, if you can. (Hear.) A noble lord near him had said, that it was useless to argue on the principle of the amendment; for whether it were adopted or not, the effect of the address would be the same: but the general objection to the address without the amendment was, that it did not express that their lordships all concurred in wishing to add nothing to the burdens of the country. His noble friend would therefore observe, that the amendment did not necessarily pledge the house to take any thing from the Windsor establishment, but to prevent the additional burthen in any manner they could. Now, though he was as inclined to be liberal to the royal family as any noble lord on the opposite side could be, yet, when reference was had, not only to the general situation of the country, but to the general sacrifices made by the people to their government, it would be found that, after dismissing from our consideration all that was paid on account of the public debt, all the expenses of our naval and military establishments, all the expenses of embassies, and matters connected with them, there remained for the support of the splendour of the crown, the enormous sum of one million of money. (Hear, hear.) Their lordships would recollect, that when the French assembly voted a sum of one million for the expenses of the sovereign, they had done it under a mistaken idea of our civil list, which, at that time, did not amount to such a sum: various items were then liable to be deducted from it, but it did now amount to the enormous sum of one million! As to the expenses of the Windsor establishment, a noble lord on the cross-bench (lord Rolle) had said, that he should be shocked to assent to any thing that would in the slightest degree take away from the comforts of our sceptre, and at one and twenty they might be regents. Why, then, establish such opposite and contradictory maxims? Men, who were, by law, allowed at one and twenty to be fit for governing the realm, might well be supposed capable of chusing and governing a wife."—Upon this part of the hon. member's speech, the following lines appeared in a daily paper:

> Quoth Dick to Tom,—This Act appears
> Absurd as I'm alive;
> To take the Crown at eighteen years,
> The Wife at twenty-five.
> The myst'ry how shall we explain?
> For, sure, as Dowdeswell said,
> Thus early if they're fit to reign,
> They must be fit to wed!
> Quoth Tom to Dick,—Thou art a fool,
> And little know'st of life;
> Alas! 'tis easier far to rule
> A kingdom than a wife.

It is before observed, that this act does not restrain the marriage of the princes on the throne. The first king of England, since the conquest, who married a subject, was Edward IV. He espoused Elizabeth Widville, daughter of Sir Richard Widville, and widow of Sir John Grey, of Groby. The princess Elizabeth was the fruit of this marriage, who married Henry VII. and thus united the houses of York and Lancaster.—Henry VIII. married Anna Boleyn, daughter of Sir Thomas Boleyn, and afterwards married Jane Seymour. By the latter, he had Edward VI. and by the former, Elizabeth.—James II. while duke of York, married Anne Hyde, daughter of the earl of Clarendon, by whom he had two daughters, Mary and Anne, who were successively queens of England.—George I. was the son of Ernest Augustus, elector of Hanover, by Sophia, daughter of Frederic, elector Palatine, and the grand-daughter of James I. of England.

afflicted monarch: that he had participated in his prosperity, and would not desert him in his adversity. Let it not be thought that noble lords on his side of the house had any wish to diminish his comforts in the slightest particular, or that they felt any hesitation to accede to any thing which could in reality contribute to those comforts. But his comforts could not consist in expense, or be added to by extravagance; indeed, such a course was, in their opinion, an addition of mockery to affliction. They might be wrong, but let it not be imputed to them that they recommended any measure that had a tendency to diminish the comforts of the royal sufferer. But it might be said, that the fund he alluded to would not suffice for the purposes in view. It should be recollected, however, that, at the time of the regency, 60,000*l.* a year constituted the privy purse: this was left untouched, and parliament granted an additional 60,000*l.* to the Prince Regent. Now, there had been no demand on the original 60,000*l.* for the last five years, except for the charges of physicians, and, therefore, it was probably free. With respect to the saving that the country would soon have, in the cessation of the 50,000*l.* a-year that was now allowed for the payment of the Prince Regent's debts, of all the arguments that had been advanced, none was more extraordinary or untenable, than that because such an expenditure had been so long borne, it would be no additional burden to support it for a perpetuity, when it was originally granted to serve a purpose that would be accomplished in a limited number of years. If 200,000*l.* a-year were granted for the building of churches during a limited period, it would, on this principle, be no burden or hardship on the people to continue the grant for ever, though the churches were all finished within the specified time. (Hear, hear.) He was persuaded that the royal family itself would never have proposed that such request should be made on the liquidation of the debts in question. It was rather surprising, that the noble earl had spent so little time in detailing or explaining the motives of his newly-adopted measure. Their lordships had, no doubt, heard that it had formerly been said, that there was something behind the throne greater than the throne itself. So it had been said there was something behind the Speaker's chair greater than the Speaker himself; and thus it appeared that there was some authority on which the noble earl acted, that weighed with him more than the authority of parliament; for the noble earl maintained, that his original opinion was proper, and yet he abandoned it on some authority that he did not think proper to name. If the house meant to act with any sincerity, it was necessary for them to adopt the amendment that had been proposed, and the noble earl at the head of the treasury must himself agree to it. But the noble earl, it seemed, had not played his part on this occasion with his usual ability: he had once already been taken by surprise, and was now risking another surprise in another quarter; for surprise there must be, if after an address containing general and unqualified assurances, objections should hereafter be taken, as it seemed they would be, to proposals that fell within the general language of the address. With regard, indeed, to the propriety of making some provision in the event of a royal marriage, he entirely concurred; but as to the amount of that provision, he was not disposed to come to any hasty decision. If their lordships took into consideration the state of the country, after a long and expensive war, the exhausted state of our finances, the sacrifices of the people, and the difficulty of making up the yearly supplies, they would see that the ministers of the crown, while advising the house to add to the comforts of the royal family, were bound to accompany that advice with the expression of their desire and intention, that those comforts should be provided for without adding to the burdens of the people. When they talked of the splendour of the crown, there was no doubt that it would be an addition to that splendour to see the various branches of the family happily settled and advantageously married. But he had notions concerning the splendour of the crown which, he feared, were a little uncommon in that house; he conceived, that that splendour was not increased by pageantry and expense, and that it would appear to much greater advantage, if many of its showy appendages were entirely struck off. The Lord Chamberlain's office, and all the expense arising from it, he thought highly unsuitable to the times; and that it might be in great part done away, without any diminution of the real dignity or honour of the reigning family. But those who thought in that manner, who thought that if the house ought to add to the splendour of the crown in one way, they might do so without taking from it in any other; such persons could not vote for the address, unexplained by any qualifying proposition. On this ground he voted for the amendment proposed by his noble friend. Their lordships well knew, that if any bill came from the commons on this subject, the slightest alteration in that house would be fatal to it. In fairness, then, to the house, in fairness to the country, in fairness to themselves, they were bound to lay down the principles on which they intended to act. Those principles were partly contained in the amendment that had now been proposed, and it only remained for their lordships to say whether or no they would express the principles on which they intended to act. This was the question before the house; it was a question of high importance, and he thought it impossible for any reasonable man to doubt as to the course it was proper to pursue.

The Earl of Lauderdale was sorry he could not support the amendment, and wished to state the reasons why he found it his duty not to vote in its favour. It had been given as a ground for supporting it, that the house could not answer that the noble lord opposite would not revert to those propositions, the intention of laying which before parliament he had at present abandoned. If there was any man who fancied that the noble lord would revert to those propositions, he would say that he did perfectly right in voting for the amendment; but, for his part, he could not understand how a revenue was to be voted without adding to the burdens of the people. The noble lord near him stated, that the sum of money at present voted for the sovereign might be applied to the purposes for which money was required; but it was true, that if that sum was applied to such a service, after that application, it would surely be added to the burdens of the people. If there was any expense laid on the country, it was certainly the duty of his noble friends so to exert themselves, that the country might be lightened of their burdens; but why was that so urged at this precise period? Why had he not heard of motions for the discontinuance of such expenses? If it was necessary that they should be discontinued, they should have heard of some proposition to that effect before that time. There would of necessity be burdens upon the people. It was impossible that parliament could vote a revenue without additional burdens on the country. It was the wish of some noble lords, that part of the money that was voted for the sovereign should be applied to the purposes of the grant to the princes; but he desired his noble friend, who had particularly mentioned that, to answer him one question,—would that appropriation be preserving the people from burdens? If the plan of those noble lords were to be pursued, the people would be as much taxed to pay allowances to the princes, as they would if taxes were laid on. Till he could understand that that was not the case, he could not vote for the amendment. Without that were so, it would be impossible for the amendment to meet his concurrence. It was impossible to vote a sum of money, without laying a burden on the people to that extent. It was the duty of every member of parliament to do every thing in his power to save the people unnecessary expense. In laying on further charges, it might be said, that it was necessary to rouse parliament to peculiar attention on the subject that had been introduced. He did not think there was any need at all for their being so roused. If a new charge was submitted, they would be equally raising money from the people to bear that charge. For the reasons he had stated, he could not vote with the amendment.

Earl Grosvenor was rather surprised at the manner in which the noble earl had stated his reasons for not voting with the amendment. He had heard it remarked, that there were persons who found a difficulty in perceiving that two and two made four. He could not help supposing that the noble lord had been labouring under some such difficulty, in stating that, when it was proposed to add a considerable sum to the burdens of the country, that would not be an additional burden. The noble earl might see, that in the reduction of the civil list by 50,000*l.* or 60,000*l.*, the country would be relieved to the amount of that sum. He had risen to make one remark on the amendment proposed by the noble lord. He was of opinion, that the rejection of that amendment might produce a bad impression on the minds of the people. It pledged them to attend to the distresses of the people. If, then, they should reject it, they who were anxious that the house should conciliate the affections of the country, and were also anxious that the crown should preserve the regard and good opinion of the people, were they not afraid it would be looked on in no favourable light? While it was their duty to maintain the proper splendour of the crown, they ought to be anxious to relieve the distresses of the country. Under all circumstances, he should give his hearty assent to the amendment.

The amendment was then negatived without a division, and the original motion for the address agreed to.

Wednesday, April 15.

COPYRIGHT BILL.] The Lord Advocate of Scotland presented a petition from the Curators of the Library of the Faculty of Advocates at Edinburgh, setting forth, "That a bill is at present depending in the house, to amend an act passed in the 54th year of his present Majesty, intituled 'An Act to amend the several Acts for the Encouragement of Learning, by securing the Copies and Copyright of printed Books to the Authors of such Books, or their Assigns;' that the said bill, if passed into a law, will materially injure the rights which the Faculty of Advocates have, through the wisdom of parliament, and to the great benefit of the public, enjoyed for above a century; that the use of the Library of the Faculty, has never been confined exclusively to the members of the Faculty, but all their books and manuscripts have been at all times accessible to every person engaged in literary or scientific pursuits; it would have been wholly impossible for the Faculty with their limited funds to have acquired a collection of books which would have been publicly useful, without the aid which the Copyright Acts have afforded, and their acquisitions would have been consequently confined in a greater degree to the books required for themselves professionally; that the petitioners humbly submit that the object of the Copyright Acts, the encouragement of learning, has been essentially promoted by the establishment under the care of the petitioners, and the public are certainly indebted to it for many important works, whose authors could not have elsewhere procured the requisite materials and information; the petitioners cannot imagine that the house will overlook the fallacy of ascribing as a loss to the publisher the value of the copies of works deliverable to the public libraries; the petitioners hold it to be clear that the publisher always computes that loss in calculating the propriety of publishing, and that unless he can impose such a price upon the work as will not only indemnify him amply, but benefit him, he will never publish; the petitioners need hardly remind the house of the difference between the sale price of a book and its cost to the publisher, a difference which makes the burthen of copies to the public libraries imposed upon the latter in general a mere trifle; the petitioners, therefore, humbly pray, that the said bill may not pass into a law, and that they may be heard, by themselves, their counsel, or agents, against the same."

Ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

MARRIAGE OF THE PRINCESS ELIZABETH.] Lord George Beresford appeared at the bar, and informed the house, that he was commanded by his Royal Highness the Prince Regent to acquaint the house, that his Royal Highness had received the address of congratulation upon the marriage of her Royal Highness the Princess Elizabeth with the Prince of Hesse Hombourg, to which address his Royal Highness had been graciously pleased to return the following answer:—

"I thank you for this dutiful and loyal address. Your congratulations on the nuptials of the Princess Elizabeth my sister with the hereditary Prince of Hesse Hombourg, have afforded me the highest satisfaction, and I receive them as a fresh proof of your attachment to his Majesty's person and family."

ST. PANCRAS POOR BILL.] Mr. Mellish moved the second reading of the St. Pancras poor bill. He observed, that the principle of the bill by no means met his approbation; but, circumstanced as he was, he felt it his duty to make the motion.

The Solicitor-General opposed the bill. Its object was to introduce annual elections of officers serving in the parish, and to give the parishioners a power of electing their own beadles. He considered the interference of parliament upon this occasion to be wholly unnecessary; and if the bill were allowed to pass into a law, the result would be nothing but tumultuous meetings throughout the whole parish. He therefore moved as an amendment, that it be read a second time this day six months.

Sir Egerton Brydges denied that the effect of the bill would be to give countenance to tumultuous meetings. It was absolutely necessary, he conceived, that this bill should pass, because it was not to be endured that the accounts should be subject to no control by the parish. The bill of 1805 had appointed two agents, over whom the magistrates had no power. The opposers of this measure had endeavoured to stigmatize it with the appellation of a democratic bill, introduced solely for the purpose of establishing universal suffrage; but this was not the fact; its only object was, to give the parishioners greater power over their officers, and to prevent irregularity in the accounts. In the last year, such was the distress existing, that no less than 900 summonses were issued in the parish against those who were not able to pay the assessments. He therefore hoped that the house would permit the bill to be read a second time.

Mr. Peter Moore supported the amendment. After many struggles, the parish had been restored to tranquillity by a bill passed in 1805. The effect of the present bill was to set aside that beneficial measure. The concerns of the parish could not be in the hands of more upright and honourable persons than those now in office.

Mr. Byng supported the amendment. The bill, he observed, would revive those disorders which were constantly taking place before the passing of the act which now regulated the parish.

Sir James Graham said, he would also vote for the amendment. The provisions of the St. Pancras poor act were the same as those by which the parish of St. Marylebone had been governed for a great number of years, and it was impossible for any parish to be managed in a better manner than the latter. If the present bill were suffered to pass, the parish would be in as bad a state as it was in before the act of 1805, when, during the annual and other elections for parish officers, no respectable person could venture to pass along the road. He hoped the gentlemen of the parish, so far from lessening the powers of the present directors, would put all the parochial concerns in the same hands that had already saved them several thousand pounds.

The amendment was carried without a division, by which the bill was thrown out.

MARRIAGES OF THE ROYAL DUKES.] Lord Castlereagh moved the order of the day for the house going into a committee of the whole house on the Prince Regent's message.

Mr. Speaker having left the chair, the house formed itself into a committee, and the message was read.

Lord Castlereagh then rose and said, that he felt it his duty to call the attention of the house to this subject, which was of the greatest importance to the country. He was sure they would feel, after what had already been shewn on a former debate, that it was a painful duty to the servants of the crown, to call on the house to make arrangements for a special provision for the different branches of the royal family: because, whatever might be the attachment of the house to the family on the throne, and however much they might feel their own honour and security connected with the honour and security of that family, yet there was, he admitted, a principle at work in all free constitutions, and particularly in a constitution such as our own, of jealousy with respect to any thing that appeared to have a tendency to increase the power and influence of the crown, whether that jealousy might be well or ill-founded. This imposed on those who had to propose additional burdens on the public an arduous duty, though the proposition might be in favour of the most valuable interests of the nation. This duty had become more necessary from the great change which had been effected in the constitution of the country, by which all the independent sources of revenue which the crown possessed, had been surrendered into the hands of that house, to be administered for the public benefit,—a change which obliged the crown to come to parliament for any provisions that were wanted. On that ground, he thought, gentlemen would see, that parliament should discharge its duty faithfully towards the crown, on a subject of such great importance as the present. He trusted that the house would agree with his opinion, that, in voting on such a measure, they were not, while they considered the public interests, to be deterred by any sort of public clamour from doing justice to the dignity and splendour of the crown. In other views of the subject, he hoped to be excused for taking up the time of the house a little longer. He could not consider, that any thing that had already occurred had yet so far foreclosed the subject with any member, as to make him feel himself pledged against the consideration of the proposal which he had to offer on a matter so important. (Hear.) When the present posture of the country was considered, the jealousy already shewn must lead the committee to feel, that ministers would have to state various reasons for their propositions, and to point the attention of the house to different considerations more minutely than in other circumstances they would have felt it necessary to have done. Though in many particulars he differed politically with gentlemen opposite, yet he readily admitted, that economy should be regarded as a sacred principle in the public affairs. But, while the interests of the public were always to be consulted, the situations of the illustrious persons who were members of the royal family were also to be considered, as they were combined with the state of the country under all its circumstances. It was for the interests of the public to see that the state of the monarchy was well provided for, as it at present existed; but it was also necessary to see that a proper provision was made for a line of princes in succession, and who were born and lived in the country. He believed that the committee would feel, that, at the meeting of parliament, after the calamity that befel us by the lamented death of the Princess Charlotte, no feeling was more strongly engraven on the minds of the house and the public, or more combined with that melancholy event, than the wish for a continuance of the line of the illustrious family who had long worn the crown. Of the loyalty and attachment of the people to the house of Brunswick there could be no doubt. At the present time there were many illustrious individuals living, who were in due line of succession; but with their decease the scene would close. Out of twelve sons and daughters of the King, being seven princes and five princesses, not one had a child to present a hope of direct succession to the throne. He might observe, that the ages of all the children of his Majesty were so far advanced as to render it fitting not to occasion any unnecessary delay in the case of their desiring to marry. It could not be maintained, under all the circumstances, that it was not right to excite the members of the royal family to a disposition to marriage, if it was not contrary to their own views of comfort and happiness; but then it was necessary that the state of marriage should be rendered comfortable to them. A single marriage might not afford satisfactory expectations. His royal highness the Prince Regent had shewn no preference to any of his royal brothers, but had affectionately expressed his wish that they should feel what was due to the interest of the crown and of the country. It was hoped that this might be done consistently with a due regard to the object of public economy, and he would now state what had been the intentions of ministers, after due consideration, as to the means of carrying the proposed royal marriages into effect. They had looked back to what had been done on the occasion of royal marriages for a number of years. But that which might have been a suitable provision twenty years ago, would be found so inadequate to the expenses of a royal establishment now, that such a comparison was likely rather to mislead than properly to guide the judgment of the house. Gentlemen might look at the provision made for the Princess Charlotte on her marriage with Prince Leopold, though perhaps that might not be taken as a standard. Her royal highness was considered by the house and the country as the natural successor to the crown, and there was an universal feeling to recognize her rank and prospects, and to do what would promote her regard for the country in which she was born, and over which she most probably would reign. A large settlement was accordingly agreed to. There was the case of the marriage of the Duke of York with the Princess of Prussia, in 1792; but he scarcely felt it necessary to observe, that the provision made at that time was not a standard for a provision now. The Duke of York was at that time highly distinguished by his propinquity to the crown; but his royal highness did not then stand so near to the throne as an illustrious individual who had entered into a marriage contract did at present. At the time of the Duke of York's marriage, the Prince of Wales was unmarried, but he was under thirty years of age. Yet, the provision for the Duke of York, including 3000*l.* arising from military emoluments, was 40,000*l.* a year. Now, the Duke of York having no descendants, and the Prince Regent having lost the only child with which Providence had blessed him, the Duke of Clarence, according to all the calculations of probabilities, was at present nearer to the succession to the throne, than the Duke of York was in 1792. He trusted that the house, taking this into consideration, would see that ministers, in proposing that the Duke of Clarence should receive what parliament had given to the Duke of York twenty-six years ago, when the value of money was much greater than at present, had treated the question as one purely British, and had been actuated by no motive that they need hesitate to avow. With respect to the junior branches of the royal family, a greater difficulty existed, for ministers had no precise guide to go by, as they had in the case of the Duke of Clarence. They had, however, thought it would be right to add 12,000*l.* to the existing income of such of their royal highnesses as should marry with the royal consent, by which their income would be raised from 18,000*l.* to 30,000*l.* per annum. Out of the 12,000*l.* it was intended that, as in the case of the Duchess of York, 4000*l.* should be settled as pin money on the royal brides. He would then appeal to the house, whether an addition of 8000*l.* or 9000*l.* to the incomes of the royal dukes were not necessary, on their marriage, to enable them to live in a manner corresponding with that exalted rank to which it had been the will of Providence that they should be born. He would fairly put the point to all, in and out of the house, notwithstanding the prejudices that he knew were excited against this measure. (Hear.) Every one seemed disposed to look at the case of the Duke and Duchess of Gloucester, as furnishing a certain criterion, by which the judgment of the house might be guided; but no question had been decided in the abstract by that house which came exactly home to the case of these illustrious individuals. The Duke of Glocester being nephew of the King was not in the same situation as the King's sons, and the Princess Mary had an income of her own. On the Princess Charlotte parliament settled 60,000*l.* a-year. The Duke of York had 37,000*l.* a-year, besides his military employments. The Duke and Duchess of Glocester had together 28,000*l.* a-year, besides the Duke's emoluments. It did not therefore appear to ministers consistent with their duty to the crown, to put the King's own sons in a situation subordinate to his highness the Duke of Glocester. Prince Leopold, after the lamented decease of the Princess Charlotte, had 50,000*l.* a-year. Ought the junior princes to be placed in a situation of inferiority? The house, he trusted, would feel the grounds upon which this measure had hitherto proceeded. They would feel, that if it was thought desirable for the sons of the King to marry, they should be placed in a becoming situation—not exactly like the Duke of York—but with incomes of 30,000*l.* a-year, to preserve their rank above the King's nephew. Ministers had flattered themselves that this proposition would be adopted by the house, as it would have been provided for without throwing new burthens on the country. And, in providing for all the married sons of his Majesty, they had thought it would not be just or proper to make an exception in the case of the Duke of Cumberland. On the marriage of his royal highness, a proposal for a grant had been submitted to parliament, and had been at first carried, but when embodied in a bill it was negatived. Ministers did not, however, think that the opinion of parliament, on that occasion, was so recorded as to form an obstacle to placing his royal highness on the same footing as his brothers. There were feelings on the proposition at that time which presented serious obstacles to the grant. At that time, the marriage was considered more of a private than of a public nature; but, from events which had since taken place, it had assumed a public character; and ministers would have failed in their duty, had they not resolved to bring the subject again before the house. It appeared but just that the same provision should be made for his royal highness, (who had received the full consent of the crown to his nuptials,) as for the junior branches of the royal family. The whole expense of the proposed arrangement, supposing the Duke of Kent should marry, would amount to 55,000*l.* per annum. It was proposed to grant out of this, 19,500*l.* for the Duke of Clarence, on account of his relative situation to the crown, to make up his income 40,000*l.*, and to give to the Dukes of Cumberland, Kent, and Cambridge an additional 12,000*l.* per annum, to make their incomes 30,000*l.* An outfit to a corresponding amount was also to be proposed. No part of the arrangement of 1792 had been more disapproved, and no part of that of 1815 more approved, than that which related to the outfit; as it was only by means of a liberal outfit, that any chance was afforded to the royal pair, of being enabled to avoid getting in debt. In consequence of the outfit and the allowance, the charge created in the present year would have been 110,000*l.* The permanent annual charge would have been 55,500*l.* It appeared to his Majesty's ministers, that these allowances would not require the imposition of any new burdens upon the country, but would be covered by resources which had either lately fallen into the consolidated fund, or would shortly fall into it. The first resource to which he alluded was 10,000*l.* of the balance that remained of the 60,000*l.* allowed for the expenditure of the late Princess Charlotte on her marriage, after deducting the 50,000*l.* still continued to the Prince of Cobourg. The second was, the annual sum of 50,000*l.* allowed to his royal highness the Prince Regent for paying off his debts. This fund would be relieved in the course of two years, and could be made applicable for the purpose of the proposed establishments, or for the general service of the country. Looking at these grounds, considering the necessity of supporting the branches of the royal family in proper splendour in the event of their marriages, and having a view to the possibility of granting them suitable allowances, without imposing new burdens upon the country, he remained deliberately convinced that ministers had acted rightly in advising his royal highness as they had done. But although he was convinced of the propriety of what they had proposed, he would not pertinaciously adhere to it; and as parliament had manifested an indisposition to concur in the amount, he would not press his intended proposal upon them. (Hear.) He did not surrender, however, the opinion on which he acted, nor did he think there was any thing in the extent of the proposed provision which compromised the public principle on which the administration rested the justification of their conduct. (Hear.) He hoped before he sat down to be able to bring the feelings of the house, their regard to the state of the country, and their attachment to the interests of the crown, to concur in a common purpose. Before he proceeded farther he wished to protect himself from the influence of some views of the question of additional provisions for the branches of the royal family, which arose out of the peculiar situation in which some of those illustrious persons were placed. They had all of them some other sources of income, beside the provision made by parliamentary grants; and it might be thought that these additional revenues should be taken into consideration, and deducted from the sum to be supplied by the liberality of parliament. This appeared to him to be both an illiberal and unwise view of the subject. He submitted that, in making arrangements for the marriages of the royal dukes, and for their support in this new situation, their income, arising from civil or military employments, conferred upon them by the crown, should not be brought in diminution of the provision to be made for them by parliament, independent of their own exertions. There should be a distinction between the members of the royal family in the married and unmarried state, in consideration of the additional expenses which they would find it necessary to incur in the former; and if they were precluded from enjoying any additional advantage, from engaging in active duties, by seeing that income deducted from their parliamentary allowance, they would be deprived of all motives for the exertion of their talents, or for their zeal in promoting the public service. Parliament therefore should not sanction a principle which would have the tendency to produce an aversion to the active duties of life, or the useful direction of their abilities. These distinguished persons, though placed by their birth in an elevated rank of society, and precluded from some employments which to others are the road to fame and fortune, should still be allowed to better their condition by their own exertions. Though placed at once beyond the necessity of active efforts, and debarred by reasons of state from many employments to which others could resort, there were still duties which they might perform to the public, without any danger of their influence, and to these they ought to be encouraged by the common hopes of reaping the rewards of their activity. They were a privileged class, but their very privileged situation exposed them to many restraints in the exertion of their talents and the application of their industry, from which others were exempted, and barred to them that line of activity which to others was the road to fortune; others could increase their livings by many ways on which they could not enter; and, therefore, though they could accept of many lucrative employments, they should not be precluded altogether from the hopes of bettering their incomes by engaging in the performance of such public services as they could execute consistently with their title and elevated rank. Parliament could not with propriety graduate the scale of provision from any considerations of a personal nature, because it might be invidious to examine minutely into personal qualities, but merit should not be repressed by being deprived of the hopes of reaping its reward in emoluments independent of parliamentary liberality. If any of the royal family therefore exercised employments at home or abroad, from which they derived an income which might be properly considered as the fruits of their activity, or the rewards of their talent, they should not be treated less liberally by the house. He stated these considerations, because he saw a disposition in some members to consider the emoluments derived from office as a deduction of parliamentary provision. The case of the Duke of Cambridge had been particularly alluded to, and an hon. member had wished for an account of his income from foreign employments. The house could not properly inquire into this subject, or demand the production of the accounts; but as much misrepresentation had gone abroad, he did not regret that an opportunity was given him of making an explanation which would shew the unfounded nature of those rumours, and demonstrate, that neither the tenure on which the royal duke held his situation, nor the magnitude of the emoluments which he derived from it, laid him open to the least imputation, or tended to disturb the scale of provision which ministers proposed to parliament for the royal family. In the first place, the situation of civil and military governor of Hanover was of a temporary nature; and, without pledging the royal duke as to any plans that he might have in view for the future course of his life, he might say, that he seemed to have no intention of making it permanent. His royal highness undertook the office at the request of his brother, the Prince Regent, and he might return to this country in a short time. With a view to his return he had refrained from altering any of his domestic arrangements in England, and still retained his house in this country ready for his reception. In the second place, the situation was not only temporary, but its emoluments were very inconsiderable when compared with the misrepresentations of it which had gone abroad. His income, as civil and military governor, did not exceed five thousand pounds a-year; and the whole extent of his emoluments, from all contingencies, amounted only to about six thousand pounds. An employment of this kind, temporary in its nature, and not extravagant in its gains, he submitted to the house, should not deprive his royal highness, either in his married or unmarried state, from being placed on that scale of provision which the other members of the royal family were to enjoy. His royal highness the Duke of Clarence was still less provided for by his employments. He had only 1,100*l.* a-year arising from half-pay. The Duke of Kent enjoyed the emoluments of governor of Gibraltar, and had likewise a regiment; but his revenue from these sources did not exceed 6,000*l.* a-year. He submitted, therefore, that these sources of income should not be taken into consideration, as a deduction from the intended provision. If the house did so, they took away all motives to exertion. The Duke of Kent received his provision later in life by three years than some of his brothers, and six years later than others. The house should not say to him, or the rest of the royal family, we will grant you no provision, because, by the bounty of the crown, you are already provided for, and whatever you earn by the exertion of your own talents shall be deducted from the liberality of parliament. So far from adopting that principle, the reverse of it ought to be acted upon. The natural motives to exertion which animated men in the other walks of society, should be held out to the members of the royal family, and their merits, which rendered them fit for employment, should not render them unworthy of liberal treatment. He would leave out of view, then, the independent incomes of the Dukes of Cambridge and Kent, and would proceed to the detail of the proposed provision. By the feelings manifested in the house when the Prince Regent's message was submitted to it, ministers had been induced to examine the matter more minutely, to see if any deduction could be made. (Hear.) They had gone into the minutest calculations and the strictest inquiries. They had not depended on themselves, but entered into a painful investigation of the details with those from whom they could expect the best information, and the most important opinion. The scale of a private family was not one that could apply to that of the illustrious persons. With respect to the provision necessary for the Duke of Clarence in particular, they went into the most strict and deliberate inquiry, with a feeling that nothing ought to stand in the way of an examination; that nothing ought to be withheld that was becoming, and nothing given that was extravagant. The result of this examination was, that unless 10,000*l.* a-year of additional allowance was granted, the proposed establishment could not be conducted. Any grant to a less amount would render it impossible to support his rank in the married state. Allowing this sum for his royal highness the Duke of Clarence, from a regard to the closer proximity of his issue to the succession, it was proposed that the provision for the junior branches of the family should be less. He would propose a resolution for 6000*l.* to the Duke of Kent, 6000*l.* to the Duke of Cumberland, and 6000*l.* to the Duke of Cambridge. (Hear.) With respect to pin-money to the royal duchesses, with whom these royal persons had or might contract marriage alliances, that was a consideration to be settled between husband and wife. The Duchess of York, on her marriage, had received 4000*l.* a-year as an allowance for pin-money. Allowing that the other royal duchesses were to receive an allowance of 3000*l.*; for this purpose, then, the additional income of the Duke of Clarence, for his family establishment, would amount only to 7000*l.*, that of the Duke of Kent to 3000*l.*, that of the Duke of Cumberland to 3000*l.* and that of the Duke of Cambridge to 3000*l.* annually. He had gone into the examination of what should be settled as the minimum with painful feelings; and, he thought, if any thing less than what he had mentioned were to be granted, it would not answer the purpose. If any addition at all were to be allowed, less could not be stated. If the house wished the marriages to take place, they should not expose the branches of the royal family to the necessity of contracting debts, or the royal succession to discredit among foreign nations. He had now opened every thing that he had in view; he had explained and attempted to justify the first intentions of ministers, and submitted to parliament the lowest scale on which they could, in the execution of their duty to the crown and the country, rest the proposed establishments. He had disguised no fact, and he shrunk from no responsibility. Ministers had been anxious to place the direct branches of the royal family in no worse situation than the king's nephew, while they had equally consulted the state of the country. They only proposed to do what parliament had done in 1767, when the Duke of Gloucester, the king's brother, received an allowance of 24,000*l.* If the Duke of Gloucester, then, had 24,000*l.* and the present duke 28,000*l.*, it was not too much to ask 24,000*l.* for the junior branches of the royal family, and 28,000*l.* for the Duke of Clarence. He had proposed this low estimate with painful feelings, because he knew that he was running a risk of proposing a provision that might be found inadequate to the object, and which might not exempt their royal highnesses from the necessity of involving themselves in debt. He would now leave the question to the judgment of the committee, without trespassing further upon its patience. The jointure proposed for the Duchess of Clarence, in the event of the death of the duke, was 7000*l.* a-year, and that of the other royal duchesses, 6000*l.* He hoped the propositions which he had submitted to the house, combining as they did, in his opinion, the honour of the crown with the most scrupulous regard to public economy, would meet its approbation. The sums that had fallen in, or that would soon fall in, to the consolidated fund, amounted to 60,000*l*.

The additional allowance for the Duke of Clarence being	10,000
That for the Duke of Kent . . .	6,000
For the Duke of Cumberland . .	6,000
For the Duke of Cambridge . .	6,000
Would make in all . .	28,000.
In the event of the Duke of Kent's not marrying, the sum would be only	22,000.

The noble lord concluded by moving the following resolution: "That his Majesty be enabled to grant an additional yearly sum of money out of the consolidated fund of the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, not exceeding the sum of 10,000*l*. to make a suitable provision for his royal highness the Duke of Clarence, upon his marriage."

Mr. Barclay said, that before the committee proceeded to make the proposed grants, the state of the country ought to be taken into consideration. This was not a time to propose any new expenditure, when it was stated that, in a year of peace, a loan of eleven millions must be raised for the public service. Let the committee consider the burthened state of the country; let them consider that the distress was last year so great as to induce his royal highness the Prince Regent to sacrifice 50,000*l*. of his income for its relief; and then say, whether this was a proper time to bring forward such a motion as that which was now before them. When the allowance was made to the Duke of York, our finances were in a flourishing condition: now they were in a state of the greatest pressure. With regard to the Duke of Cumberland, he saw no reason for granting him now what was refused him in 1815. The Duke of Clarence did not, in his opinion, stand in a situation that entitled him to a greater allowance than the junior branches of the royal family. Supposing that, after receiving this provision, and entering into the marriage state, he had no issue, there would be the same reasons for augmenting the revenue of his next junior brother. Was not his present income sufficient, if freed from incumbrances; and, with those incumbrances, would it not be swallowed up or diverted from its purpose? If there was one of the junior branches of the royal family to whom he would more willingly than another grant an additional allowance, it would be to the Duke of Kent; but if they all took the same method as he had adopted for bringing their expenditure within their income, no additional provision would be necessary. He would have no objection to grant provision to the widows of the royal dukes. But, before any additional allowance could, with propriety, be voted, the state of our finances and the resources of the country ought to be clearly ascertained. The noble lord had not put the question, as to the sources from which these additional grants were to come, in its proper light. It was true, that no additional burthen might be placed on the country in consequence of the grants; but it was also true, that the money proposed to be so applied, would be a saving to the country of so much. He did not mean to propose any direct negative upon the motion before the committee, but he felt it his duty to call upon gentlemen to pause before they agreed to that motion, and, with this view, he moved, that the farther consideration of the motion should be postponed till that day week.

Mr. Brogden (the chairman) suggested, that if the hon. member intended to move an amendment, the regular mode was, to move, that he leave the chair.

Mr. Barclay said, he should then move that he leave the chair.

It was remarked by another member, that the regular amendment should be, that the chairman report progress and ask leave to sit again, and the question was so put accordingly.

Mr. Parnell said, he was altogether averse to profusion at this crisis, yet, in justice to these royal personages, and the scale of expenditure consequent to their exalted situation, under the circumstances of a marriage, he felt it his duty to support the resolution.

Mr. Protheroe congratulated the house on the effect of the virtuous opposition which had been made to this measure, in reducing the original sum proposed to be called for. To the just causes of grief for the death of the Princess Charlotte of Cobourg, many persons had added apprehensions of the failure of the royal line of Brunswick. But a cause of grief was now forced upon the public mind which had not been anticipated. Pensions and grants to foreigners were called for, in consequence of that unfortunate event. To foreign alliances he had no objection, but he hoped they were entered into without mercenary views, and that they would be productive of happiness without burthening the nation. In loyalty he would yield to no man; but he held it to be not only consistent with loyalty, but essential to its stability, to speak the language of truth. Did ministers speak the language of truth to their royal master when this measure was first thought of? Did they tell him, that this was not the time to increase the burthens of the people? He had presented many petitions for a radical reform of that house. He had told the petitioners, that the consequence of granting their prayer would be a revolution: but, the consequence of increasing our burthens beyond the possibility of supporting them, would be equally revolutionary. The faithlessness of its supporters was not less fatal to the crown than the madness of the people. He congratulated the house on the opportunity they now had of giving the lie to the charge so often brought against them, that the interests of the people had less weight with them than the influence of the crown. We had been for three years in peace with all the world, yet our expenses were beyond our resources; and, in the face of this, we still went on increasing our burthens. Some of the burthens now proposed were, besides, such as would not at any time be borne with satisfaction. If ever there was a vote of that house in perfect unison with public feeling, it was the vote which had rejected the application for an additional allowance to the Duke of Cumberland. (Hear hear.) He should therefore vote against the proposed resolution.

Mr. Gurney said, that the present application must be ascribed to the effects of the royal marriage act. By it all the descendants of George II. other than the issue of princesses married into foreign families, were precluded from intermarriage with the great families of England. The only reason for such an enactment was, the prevention of disputed claims to the succession, and of consequent civil wars. It was true, that this country had long been afflicted with the worst calamities, by the civil wars of York and Lancaster. But such wars could not be apprehended in the present state of society. The civil wars of York and Lancaster were the wars of a barbarous age, when the nobility possessed whole provinces, and the commons were almost powerless*. From this marriage act proceeded all the evils which now excited animadversion and opposition. The illustrious branches of the royal family, precluded from any alliance with the great dukes, earls, and barons of England, were forced into alliances with weak and poor German families. The consequence of such alliances was, a constant application to parliament for provision to support a family in the highest rank, without any independent resources. On the whole, he approved of the motion of the hon. member for Southwark, as it at least gave time for the receipt of those accounts which would be necessary to guide the house in any decision they might ultimately come to.

Mr. Holme Sumner said, he should first advert to what had been said of the previous meeting on this subject. It was a meeting of gentlemen who, from their character and station in the country, from their personal observation, and from the information derived from their constituents, were best acquainted with the sense of the nation, and who, therefore, were the fittest to be consulted on any subject to be proposed to parliament. An hon. and learned gentleman had characterised such meetings as clicks. To that set of men he had the honour to belong. They were calculated to form the basis of responsibility for the public; and although they were not equal to the hon. and learned gentleman in ingenuity, in dexterity, and in a certain parliamentary accomplishment, which, to use a word found in the same respectable volume from which the learned gentleman had taken the word click, he meant the Slang Dictionary, he would call the "gift of the gab;" (much laughter and confusion); they were as just in their principles, and as independent in their conduct, as any set of men that ever graced this country. He did but justice to the general sense of the people when he said so. The object of such meetings was to obtain their sentiments previously to the proposal of a measure, as they were the men most conversant with the country at large. As to the resolution moved by his noble friend, he could not agree to bring the duke of Clarence into a situation which did not belong to him, that of presumptive heir to the crown. (Hear.) The duke of York, it was true, had been married for a considerable time; but a certain calamity might befall him, and then he might marry again, when it would be proposed to make the same provision for him as had lately been made for the prince of Saxe-Cobourg. It was impossible to concur in the advance of allowance to such an amount to the duke of Clarence. He would not object to an advance of 6000*l.* a year upon his marriage, if information were previously given to prove that this sum could be applied to the object of supporting the splendour of the crown. He must acquit his noble friend of blinking or misrepresenting the subject, when he had said, that his royal highness had 18,000*l.* a year as a parliamentary grant, 2500*l.* from treasury warrants, and 1100*l.* as admiral of the fleet. In addition to these items, he was ranger of Bushy-park, and had a charming residence, equal to not less than 3000*l.* per annum. As the object of the resolution was to bestow upon a younger brother a greater degree of splendour than was necessary, he would oppose it, till it should be proved that the proposed addition would be available to any such object. (Hear.) He understood that 4000*l.* would not pay the interest of the debts of the duke of Clarence, and that demands existed against him for 50,000*l.* or 60,000*l.*: so far, at least, public report went. Of what use, then, could the proposed grant be to the splendour of the crown? (Hear.) Instead of elevating it would only degrade. It would be actually throwing away the public money. A royal duke (Kent) had, much to his honour, divested himself of his splendour for the purpose of paying his debts. If in this purpose he were successful, he should have no objection to a grant of 6000*l.* to him upon his marriage. Proper emoluments ought not to be withheld from any branch of the royal family, and 30,000*l.* was not more than ought, in different circumstances, to be allowed; but while the oppression of the country by taxes deprived other gentlemen of enjoyments, which belonged to their station, why should not the princes of the royal family also bear some diminution of what might otherwise be properly claimed for them? He, therefore, objected to the granting of 30,000*l.* but he would agree to 24,000*l.* The duke of Cambridge had acquitted himself well from the earliest period of his life; he had, greatly to his credit, avoided all debts; he had continued to sustain the character given of him in his younger years by his illustrious father. The king, using the language of Eton school, had said, "Cambridge has not made his first fault yet." When the grant to the duke of Cumberland was formerly stated to a meeting assembled for the purpose, the numbers decreased rapidly from 37 to 30, 20, 18, &c. At last, gentlemen came up from all parts of the country to oppose the grant. In that case the marriage had indeed been accomplished, but there had been no message from the crown. The house had not been fairly treated then, when in those circumstances the subject was brought before them; and the house was not fairly treated now, in hooking him in among the other princes. (Loud and long continued cheering). He could not at present make any motion on the subject; but, if the amendment of the hon. member for Southwark should be negatived, he should feel it his duty to call for an account of the income and debts of the duke of Clarence.

* As an historical fact, it may just be added, that the disputes of the houses of York and Lancaster did not exist till the regular succession was by force interrupted, and, in consequence, fictitious titles to the crown set up.

Lord Castlereagh explained. As to Bushy-park, it was rather a burden than otherwise. Another topic alluded to he could not enter upon; the house would perceive the delicate situation in which he was placed. But he could assure the house that the representation given of the duke of Clarence's debts was by no means his true situation. If the resolution were agreed to, the duke of Clarence, after relieving himself from pressing demands, and making a provision for the ultimate extinction of his debts, would have 25,000*l.* a-year unincumbered.

Mr. Coke declared, that under the present distresses and burdens of the country, he could not reconcile it to his sense of duty, to consent to the arrangements proposed by the noble lord. If at any future period, a stronger case should present itself, or the circumstances of the country wear a more favourable aspect, his objections might be removed. With regard to the offence taken at the application of the word "click," by his hon. and learned friend (Mr. Brougham), he entertained a very sincere respect for many hon. members on the other side of the house; but he must at the same time observe, that he considered the general principles and conduct of his hon. and learned friend fully entitled to his support. He said this with a wish to act and speak in consistency with those Whig sentiments which he had supported for the last forty years of his life.

Sir W. Curtis said, that some additional provision was necessary when any of the royal family married. In this view, he thought that the modified arrangement submitted by the minister ought to be adopted.

Mr. R. Ellison observed, that he had always thought very favourably of the measures of the present government, and he regretted that, on this occasion, there should be an exception to that general opinion. He could not help thinking, however, that, with regard to the merits of the question now under consideration, they were entirely in the wrong. He had supported the present ministers, and the system of policy they pursued, ever since he had known how to think or to act. (A laugh.) He had never had any communication with the opposition, nor did he mean ever to hold any. (A laugh.) He feared not what others might think or say of him; he had an opinion of his own, and that opinion he was resolved to express. He loved liberty as much as any hon. member opposite; but he knew his duty too well to convert that zeal into a pretext or a means for humbugging the people. (A laugh.) Humble as he was, he had a duty to perform, and must be allowed to follow his own opinion. No man honoured the king, or loved the constitution, better than himself. It appeared to him that ministers had carried the country safe through its greatest dangers, and brought it into quiet seas. That tranquillity, he thought, would remain undisturbed under the care and wisdom of administration; but he must frankly declare, that the demand of such sums, in the present condition of the country, was itself a measure calculated to prove injurious to royalty. It seemed to him one of the most injudicious propositions that ever was submitted to parliament. He was perfectly disposed to vote some provision to the duke of Clarence, on the ground of his intended marriage, but to the rest of the proposed plan he must give his decided negative.

Sir T. Acland said, there were so many points involved in this question, from which different views might be taken, that he was desirous of stating very shortly the principles by which his vote on the subject would be governed. He thought it the duty of the house, in the first place, to lay altogether out of consideration every question, except that of the allowance which it was fitting for parliament to grant to the royal personages, with a view to the marriages in contemplation. With the subject of individual character, he conceived, the house had nothing to do; nor ought they, in his opinion, to direct their proceedings by any reference to emoluments which might be derived from private sources, or might be the reward of public and honourable service. (Hear, hear, hear.) The only question which they had to entertain was, what was the proper provision to be made, in the circumstances of the country, for such members of the royal family as were about to enter on the married state. Looking at this simple question in all the views in which it could be regarded, he was sorry that he could not concur in the proposed resolution. He trusted that he was acting in the strict discharge of his duty, and wholly uninfluenced by what might pass out of doors, in this declaration of his sentiments. It was certainly difficult, in discussing a question of amount in a case of this nature, to determine on the precise number of thousands which it might be advisable to grant. He could not, however, agree with the hon. member for Southwark in the expediency of adjourning the consideration of this question in its details. Such discussions were necessarily painful, and it was of importance to bring them to a speedy termination. (Hear, hear.) If it were not unparliamentary, he should be disposed to say, that there was an impropriety in prying too closely into the private affairs of the royal family. But, as respected the amount, he could not dismiss from his recollection, that it was only four years ago, when, whether wisely or unwisely it was not for him to inquire, ministers themselves had laid down the measure of establishment requisite on the marriage of a member of the royal family. He alluded to the sum proposed, in consequence of the royal message, announcing the marriage of the duke of Cumberland. It did not appear to him that the situation of the duke of Clarence, with reference to the succession to the throne, ought to constitute any exception to the rule, or distinguish him from the rest of the younger brothers. He certainly thought that an immediate heir to the throne was in a situation which required the means of supporting a greater degree of dignity and splendour, but he could not extend this principle to the case of the duke of Clarence. With respect to the duke of Cambridge, he should feel no aversion to vote an additional allowance to him, in consideration of his approaching marriage. It was necessary, however, that their feelings should not carry them too far; and, in adverting to the case of the duke of Cumberland, he conceived that the house of commons had long since come to a deliberate resolution. It was not for them to interfere with the exercise of the royal prerogative, or to attempt any direct control over the marriages of the royal family; but they had one means of expressing their sense with respect to their propriety. This, he believed, had been accurately done on a former occasion; and he called on the house not to throw away their only resource on such occasions, by retracting their declared opinion. It must necessarily derogate from their authority, if they should now entirely forget what had been their former proceeding upon this painful subject. (Hear, hear.)

Lord John Russell opposed the resolution. He was desirous that every grant which was necessary to the dignity of the royal family should be agreed to; but he thought, that some attention should be paid to the means which the country had of making good those grants.

Lord Lascelles wished to say a very few words on the motion immediately before the house. With regard to the amendment, he did not perceive the expediency of any delay in coming to a decision. On the contrary, he thought it just and fair to the royal family, that the house should come to a vote that night. It was not necessary to go minutely into circumstances; the only question was, whether, as certain members of the royal family were about to marry, parliament would sanction the necessary arrangements. He troubled the house with his opinion in consequence of what had fallen from him on a former night, and because he thought the question involved the credit of the house, as well as of the royal family. It had never been in his contemplation to refuse an adequate provision, although, in the actual state of the country, it had appeared to him, that a smaller sum would answer the purpose. To the reduced allowances now proposed he felt no sort of objection.

Mr. Forbes disapproved of the distinction made in favour of the duke of Clarence, and could not consent to grant him more than the sum voted to the other younger brothers of the royal family, in the event of their marriage. He believed that the allowance of 6000*l.* a-year to the duke of Cumberland would have been carried, if the same activity had been employed to support, which had been exercised to defeat it.

Lord Compton said, he had been averse to the original proposition, not because he thought it disproportionate to the situation of the illustrious persons for whom it provided, but to the present circumstances of the country. He could not allow, however, that there was no ground for the distinction taken between the duke of Clarence and the other younger members of the royal family. The duke had, indeed, two elder brothers, but they were both married and without offspring. He wished the house to recollect, that an excess of parsimony might have the effect of defeating the proposed marriages altogether. He saw no reason for revoking the opinion already expressed by the house in the case of the duke of Cumberland, and would remind them, that there was another branch of the royal family not now before them, who would in that case be equally entitled to some provision in the event of his forming an alliance of this nature.

Mr. S. Thornton said, that he came down yesterday to oppose the grants that were then the subject of general conversation, but the reduced scale appeared to him unobjectionable. He entreated his friend, the hon. member for Southwark, to withdraw his amendment, as it was extremely undesirable to keep a question of so delicate a nature hanging over the house: and as an explanation of the circumstances of the individual illustrious branches of the royal family had been given, there could be no occasion for delay.—The hon. member called the grateful attention of the house to the highly respectable conduct of the duke and duchess of Glocester, who in their domestic establishment were not less the subjects of general admiration in their neighbourhood, than the lamented family at Claremont. This branch of the royal family, it should ever be remembered, had forborne to call on parliament for any augmentation of income, arising from their sense of the pressure of the times on the people of England.

Earl Gower observed, that it was undeniable that the married state required some additional provision. He rose, however, chiefly for the purpose of calling the recollection of the house to the fact, that the duchess of Cumberland had now resided three years in this country, during which time she had acquired the esteem and affection of all who knew her, and he felt confident that this esteem would continue to increase. For the whole of the period that she had become a British princess, she had been indebted for her support to the generosity of the King of Prussia, and he put it to the house, whether this was worthy of the pride of England.

Mr. Barclay signified his readiness to withdraw his amendment; but there being some cries in the negative, the chairman decided that a division must take place.

The question was then loudly called for, and strangers were ordered to withdraw. The house, however, did not divide. During our absence,

Mr. Sumner moved, that the grant be reduced from 10,000*l.* to 6000*l.*

Mr. Lambton complained of the dilemma in which he was placed. He observed, that he was against any grant; and that, if he voted against the 6000*l.*, he might occasion a majority in favour of the 10,000*l.*, to which he was still more averse.

Sir Gilbert Heathcote thought that the present incomes of the junior branches of the royal family were ample. He, as an individual, was obliged to attend to his domestic concerns, and he thought they ought to do the same.

Mr. Calvert observed, that the difficulty arose from the embarrassed circumstances of the country. He thought that the utmost economy ought to be observed in the intended grants.

Mr. Brougham adverted to the difficulty complained of by Mr. Lambton, and recommended him to vote in the first instance for the smaller sum, which merely pledged the committee to a grant not exceeding 6000*l.*, after which he might, in a subsequent stage, vote for reducing that sum to an amount merely nominal.

Mr. Tierney understood that the noble lord meant to propose something by way of dower, to which he had no objection, and therefore would not concur in any vote that might break up the committee.

Mr. Canning commented on the point of order, and stated, that if the house were against voting any grant at all, they might stop the proceedings of the committee altogether, or vote a nominal sum, which would answer the same purpose. But he rose for the purpose of expressing his approbation of the larger sum proposed. When he compared the proceedings of this night with the feeling that prevailed on the opening of the session, he was at a loss to conceive by what process the whole feeling then expressed had been so completely evaporated. If proper reasons were assigned why the junior branches of the royal family should contract alliances, it was in the power of the house of commons to give or withhold their support, and he trusted that necessity would be considered under present circumstances. (Here we were re-admitted.) If it were expedient to provide for the succession to the throne, it was an unfair and an imperfect view of the question then before them, to consider the circumstances of each specific marriage. With respect to his royal highness the Duke of Clarence, he could assure the house, that his royal highness would not have thought of contracting this marriage, it never would have entered into his contemplation to engage in this alliance, if it had not been pressed upon him as an act of public duty. (Loud laughter.) His wishes were limited to such means as might enable him to support his situation in the country with becoming dignity. As a contractor of debt he did not stand before the house: his noble friend had told them that his royal highness had voluntarily, and by arrangements of his own, set apart a portion of his income for the payment of interest, and he believed, also for the insurance of his life, and the gradual liquidation of the principal. Without this alliance he wanted not the aid of parliament, and he contracted this alliance, not for his own private gratification, (loud laughter,) but because he had been advised to do so for the politic purpose of providing for the succession to the throne. (A laugh.) If there were any thing ridiculous in this proposition, it was brought about by their own laws. The laws of the country prevented the royal family from entering into engagements of marriage at home: they insisted that the branches of their royal family should look abroad for wives; and when they came to do this, as in the present case, not from liking or affection, for that could not be supposed possible when the persons had not even seen each other; if there were any absurdity in such an arrangement, it was referable to the laws themselves, and not to the individuals who were bound by those laws. He thought the house could not refuse this grant of 10,000*l.* to the person who might produce the heir to the crown, without exposing him to embarrassment, and bringing exorbitant expense on his establishment. Ministers were convinced that no less a sum would be sufficient; for if it did not render the marriage impracticable, it would at least endanger its peace and happiness. In voting that sum, the house would only grant one half of what was originally proposed, and for less than that ministers would not be responsible.

Mr. Wodehouse supported the amendment of the hon. member for Surrey.

Mr. W. Smith thought that a sufficient sum might be taken from the Windsor establishment to answer all the purposes wanted.

Sir W. Guise spoke to the same effect.

Lord Castlereagh said, that no establishment could be conducted with so much economy as the Windsor establishment: there could be no reduction, except, perhaps, in the department of the great officers of state. The whole of the salaries, from those officers down to the meanest servant, amounted to 33,000*l.* Of this sum 10,000*l.* only was applicable to offices of that description, that could admit of being reduced. If they took away from this sum the allowance to those officers who were indispensably necessary, the whole sum, with respect to which there could be any question as to reduction, came within 6000*l.* The Windsor arrangements had been adopted by parliament after the fullest discussion, and he trusted, that before they proceeded to reduce any part of the establishment, the subject would be discussed in a manner not less satisfactory.

Mr. Tierney insisted that the Windsor establishment was far greater than was necessary for the purposes of use or splendour to the venerable monarch, or the branch of the family resident with him. There was 60,000*l.* for the privy purse, out of which no expense was paid except of the medical attendants: he would estimate that, at the utmost, at 50*l.* a day. This would amount to no more than 18,250*l.* out of the 60,000*l.*: but then, in addition to this sum, there was 10,000*l.* a-year from the duchy of Lancaster.—Her Majesty's establishment amounted to 100,000*l.* a-year; but, besides this, her Majesty was allowed for the Windsor establishment 58,000*l.* and an additional sum of 1900*l.* for what was called travelling expenses; and the income of the two resident princesses was 26,000*l.* more, making the total of the Windsor establishment amount to no less a sum than 264,000*l.* per annum. (Hear, hear, hear.) Now, what was done with all this money? Was it spent, or nearly spent? And if not, for what purpose was it accumulated; and why might it not be applied to such uses as outfitting the different branches of the family on the occasion of their marriages? A reduction should be made of all superfluous expenses.

Lord Castlereagh replied, that the estimate of the right hon. gentleman was not fairly taken. The medical attendance last year came to 38,000*l.*: and it was well known, that great part of the privy purse was devoted to benevolent purposes. It was not fair to reckon in the income of the princesses; and still less was it fair to count the income of the Queen, who, by act of parliament, was entitled to the full sum of 100,000*l.* as her jointure. To this sum she would be entitled wherever she lived, and it could not therefore be said to form any part of the Windsor establishment. If the right hon. gentleman deducted these sums, there remained, for all the expenses of the Windsor establishment, only 58,000*l.* and he would recollect, that, whether the Queen lived at Windsor or not, the Windsor establishment must be kept up. The 100,000*l.* was applicable to the Queen's own establishment. It was a great error to suppose that the Windsor establishment furnished any part of the Queen's household.

Mr. Sumner said, he had stated, on rumour, that the debts of the Duke of Clarence amounted to 50,000 or 60,000*l.* It was now said, that the whole claims might be liquidated for 5000*l.* a-year. The question was not whether they would grant such a sum as might be necessary to the duke of Clarence, but whether, having granted him such a sum, they would grant him another 5000*l.* a year for that part of it, the fee of which he had already consumed.

Mr. Lambton said, that his objection to any grant had not been obviated by any thing that had fallen from the other side, and he therefore felt himself called on to record that objection, by moving that the chairman do now leave the chair. No man could entertain a higher respect than himself for the illustrious House of Brunswick: bred up as he had been in the principles which placed that family on the throne, he must be anxious for its happiness and honour; but, in the present burthened state of the country, when he saw the poor languishing in want, when he recollected that this evil had increased to a degree no longer to be borne, when he saw distress in every part of the country, he could not consent to burthen the people with one shilling more. If circumstances had occurred to render a great part of the Windsor establishment useless or unnecessary, let it be done away. But that had nothing to do with the present question. The question was, should they burthen the country with 6000*l.* a-year because the duke of Clarence wished to marry? Because he had extravagantly thrown away that which parliament had already granted him, were they to make good the effects of that extravagance? The house would ill discharge their duty to their constituents, whom they must shortly meet again, if they did not resist so unconstitutional a measure in the beginning. They would forfeit every claim to the respect of the country. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Wynn said, that if the original proposition had been adopted, it would have gone farther to shake the attachment of the country to the royal family, and the confidence of the people in parliament, than any proposition ever submitted to that house. He would shortly state the reasons why he was still disposed to agree with the amendment of the hon. member for Surrey. He could not accede to the opinion that the junior members of the royal family, having already received a settlement in their unmarried state, were entitled to call upon the public for an additional grant on their marriage. He thought that the argument on which the larger grant to the duke of Clarence was founded, namely, his relative situation in the royal family, was, in fact, destructive of the proposition that the younger branches should also be amply provided for with additional funds. For what was the analogy of private life? Was it usual, when the eldest son was settled in marriage with a large fortune, and a corresponding establishment, to increase also the incomes and establishments of the younger branches in the same proportion? Was not the very contrary the customary mode of proceeding? He should give his vote in favour of the 6000*l.* which, in a former instance, was considered a sufficient income. In the event of an increase of family, it would be for parliament to consider the circumstances of the case, and to grant an increase if they thought proper. On the occasion of the marriage of the duke of York, 40,000*l.* had been voted; but then it was to be considered that the marriage was peculiarly desirable, on account of the alliance with Prussia, (the treaty of which was referred to the committee): and, besides, the duchess of York brought with her a large dowry, he believed 160,000 crowns. With respect to the Windsor establishment, it appeared to be a question amply worthy of the consideration of parliament, but not that night. Whatever reduction could be made in that establishment, the house were equally bound to make, although the present question had never come before them. Upon the whole, he was decidedly of opinion, that the minor sum was for the present sufficient.

The question was then put on Mr. Lambton's amendment, which went to refuse any grant to the duke of Clarence, and decided in the negative, without a division.

The committee then divided on the amendment of Mr. Sumner, for reducing the grant from 10,000*l.* to 6000*l.*

This result was received with loud shouts of approbation; amidst which, Lord Castlereagh rose, and observed, that since the house had thought proper to refuse the larger sum to the duke of Clarence, he believed he might say, that the negotiation for the marriage might be considered at an end.

The house then resumed; the resolution was ordered to be reported, and the committee to sit again to-morrow.

Thursday, April 16.

MARRIAGES OF THE ROYAL DUKES.] The Duke of Montrose reported, that his royal highness the Prince Regent had been waited on with the address voted in reply to the message respecting the royal marriages, and had graciously received the same.

The Marquis of Cholmondeley reported, in answer to the address on the income of the princes, that his royal highness the Prince Regent would order an account to be laid before the house.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, April 16.

WINDOW TAX (IRELAND).] Mr. Grattan presented a petition of Householders of St. Peter, Dublin; also, of the Corporation of Carpenters, Millers, and others of Dublin, against the Window Tax.—Ordered to lie on the table.

COTTON FACTORIES BILL.] Mr. W. Peel presented the followed petition of Parents and Relatives of Children employed in the cotton factories of Manchester. "That the petitioners are the parents and relatives of children employed in cotton factories, and are not engaged in that employment themselves; that, although precluded by this circumstance from subscribing the petitions of the working spinners to the house, they have felt the most lively interest in those petitions, are deeply affected by their contents, and anxious to support the prayer of them by an humble and respectful address to the house; that the petitioners, not presuming to trouble the house with a recapitulation of what has been so fully submitted to it, as to the extremities of labour and heat endured by their children and relatives in the occupation above-mentioned, as to polluted air, the hurried repast, and unseasonable hours, and brief repose, which form the sad distinctions of the factory system; they would, more especially, and with all humanity, represent the habitual sorrows which are hence derived to themselves through the medium of their tender and afflicted charge; that it is on such grounds, and with such feelings, that the petitioners supplicate the mercy of the house in behalf of themselves as the parents and relatives of children employed in the cotton factories; and they beg leave, in their own vindication, to allege, that in subjecting their children to an employment so manifestly ruinous to their health and comfort, they are impelled by that necessity which hath no law, and by a poverty which leaves them no election; in the midst, therefore, of this great and painful extremity, so trying to their parental feelings, so peculiar to their lot, the petitioners look up for commiseration and relief to the known humanity of the house, and to the measures now under its consideration for restricting the time of actual labour in cotton factories, which they earnestly pray may be reduced to ten hours and a half each day, and that it may seem good to the house to pass a law for that purpose, and for such other relief to their children and relatives in the situation beforementioned, as to the house may seem most expedient."

Mr. Hornby said, that if a bill on this subject should pass into a law, the difficulties of the labouring people would be greatly augmented. They all knew how difficult it was for the lower orders of the people to subsist at present, particularly in the manufacturing districts; and this bill would go to diminish still more their means of subsistence. This was the opinion which he had come to, after an impartial examination of the condition of the manufactories in that town (Preston), which he had the honour to represent.

The petition was then ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

MARRIAGE OF THE PRINCESS ELIZABETH.] Lord John Thynne, at the bar, reported the answer of her Majesty, to the message of congratulation on the marriage of the Princess Elizabeth, as follows:

"Gentlemen—I receive with satisfaction the congratulations of the House of Commons on the marriage of my daughter with the hereditary Prince of Hesse Hombourg. This fresh proof of their attachment is highly grateful to my feelings."

The answer of the Princess Elizabeth and the Hereditary Prince of Hesse Hombourg was reported as follows:

"Gentlemen—We are much gratified by this proof of the attention and regard of the House of Commons; and we return them many thanks for their congratulations."

MARRIAGES OF THE ROYAL DUKES.] Lord Castlereagh rose to move the order of the day for a committee of the whole house on the farther consideration of the Prince Regent's message. He said, that, before the house went into a committee, it might perhaps be convenient to state the course which was meant to be adopted. In consequence of the opinions expressed by the committee last night, he felt that he should not have performed his duty, if he had not informed his royal highness the duke of Clarence of what had passed. (Hear.) His royal highness in receiving the communication, and in the observations which he made upon the subject, seemed to be impressed with sentiments of the highest respect for the decision of the house. But, as his acceptance of any provision which might be voted for him would necessarily imply an obligation to maintain an establishment such as would be required by his situation in this country after his marriage, and as his royal highness was thoroughly convinced that he could not undertake to maintain such an establishment with the sum proposed, without the certainty of incurring embarrassments from which he would have no means of extricating himself, his royal highness deemed it incumbent upon him, in this stage of the proceedings, to authorize him (Lord Castlereagh) to declare, with the utmost deference to the opinion of the committee of the whole house, that he felt himself compelled to decline availing himself of the provision intended for him. (Hear.) His Majesty's ministers felt warranted in saying, that the sum which they had proposed was the least which, under the circumstances, could be offered; and they, therefore, after due consideration, thought that the reason for the non-acceptance of the grant on the part of his royal highness was well founded.—The noble lord concluded by moving the order of the day for the house resolving itself into a committee.

The house went into the committee, and Mr. Brogden, the chairman, read the Royal Message.

Lord Castlereagh said, that the part of the message to which he wished to call the attention of the committee, was that which related to the marriage of his royal highness the duke of Cambridge. After the discussion of the former evening, he did not think it necessary for him to open the view which he took of a provision for this illustrious member of the royal family, and therefore he should merely reserve to himself the right of giving any explanation or statement in reply. He now moved, "that it is the opinion of this committee, that his majesty be enabled to grant an additional yearly sum of money out of the consolidated fund of the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, not exceeding the sum of 6000*l.* to make a suitable provision for his royal highness the duke of Cambridge upon his marriage."

Mr. Brougham rose, and observed, that the subject in the last debate had been almost entirely confined to the consideration of the proposed grant to the duke of Clarence. It would now appear, from the conduct of the noble lord, that, because the house had thought fit to reduce the proposed grant to that royal personage to 6000*l.* a-year, therefore, the 6000*l.* a-year to the other members of the royal family was to pass as a matter of course. But for his own part he would say, that, even if he stood alone, he should feel it to be his bounden duty, both as a representative of the people and a guardian of the public interests, to make his protest against this principle. It was to be remarked, that these proposed grants were not brought forward, one by one, on the particular merits of each case; but in a mass, in a kind of lumping way, as if all the princes of the royal house were, of course, to have, on entering into the matrimonial state, splendid additions to their revenues. No person in or out of that house could lament more than he did the afflicting calamity of the death of the princess Charlotte, an interruption in the line of the direct succession, which, he might say, was an irreparable loss to the country. Her death was a public calamity which, the longer it was thought of, would sink deeper and deeper into the public mind. If any thing were wanting to shew what a great loss had been sustained by the public, it would be found in these wholesale proposals of provisions for other branches of the royal family. It would certainly be a most irksome and disagreeable task to make any observations on the character or conduct of particular members of the royal house, whose situation and character were so eminently connected with the security and the happiness of the monarchy. He should, therefore, pass over that subject swiftly; but he could not avoid to add, that the propositions of the grants to their royal highnesses the dukes of Clarence and Cumberland, must tend to impress more on their minds the lamented decease of the princess Charlotte, and to strengthen their feelings and recollections of the evils of her loss. He was ready to admit, that a facility should be afforded to the royal family, if it were shewn to be necessary, in order to their contracting marriages, and for the object of continuing the succession to the throne. If it could be proved to him, that none of the princes could enter into marriage by reason of the want of income, and that it was absolutely necessary to add to their revenue, he would agree to a proposition for increase, yet keeping in view that the addition should be the smallest sum possible, under the present circumstances of the country. If it was expedient, which he believed it was, that a succession to the throne should be found from some of those branches of the royal family who had been born and educated in England; and if the noble lord could shew, that the income of the duke of Cambridge was so circumstanced, as to render it indispensably necessary to vote his royal highness an annual addition, then he should withdraw his objections. But, if the principle was applicable to all the princes, why pass on to the youngest, and leave out one royal duke, whose character stood so eminent, whose public conduct was so excellent, and who had so particularly distinguished himself by the measures he had taken for relieving himself from those incumbrances, which, he believed, could not be considered as imputable to himself? (hear). The duke of Kent had already been mentioned. His private character was unimpeached, and his public conduct had entitled him to the just esteem of all who knew him. The recent measures which that royal duke had adopted, and to which he should not have alluded, but that they had been already mentioned, and which promised to liberate his income in a short time from the difficulties in which by accidental circumstances it had been involved, rendered him still more worthy of regard. The duke of Clarence had informed the house, in terms of great respect, that he could not accept the proffered allowance. A right hon. gentleman (Mr. Canning) had told them, that in the proposed marriage, his Royal Highness would have made great sacrifices of private feeling—that he only felt what was required from him by his duty to the monarchy, of which he formed so distinguished a part, and that he had overcome all objections of a private nature. That repugnance was now no longer to be got over; the insufficiency, in his Royal Highness's opinion, of the parliamentary allowance, added to his former objections, left no hope of his marriage. But why, all at once, did the noble lord proceed to the youngest of the sons of the royal family, except for the purpose of establishing the principle, that an addition of 6000*l.* a-year should be granted to each of those who chose to enter into the married state? In behalf of the duke of Cumberland, it would, of course, be contended, that it would be unjust to make an exception, and to refuse to the elder what was granted to the younger brother. If the principle was to apply generally, why make any exceptions? The duke of Sussex's character was unimpeachable, and in his meritorious conduct he had gone farther than the duke of Kent, having given up nearly all his income to liquidate embarrassments, while he had not the advantages possessed by the other royal dukes. The duke of Kent was governor of Gibraltar, and had a regiment worth 1500*l.* a-year. The duke of Clarence, he believed, had 2500*l.* a-year, under a warrant of the privy seal. The duke of Sussex had no allowance from any of these sources-

—he had only his parliamentary income, at one time of 12,000, and afterwards of 18,000*l.* a-year, and this allowance he had a year later than the duke of Cambridge, though he was a year older. The duke of Cambridge, in addition to this, previously to his marriage, had a table kept for him in the palace, and was thus prevented from coming to his allowance with a heavy arrear of debt, as his royal brother was obliged to do. Much had been said of the private affairs of the duke of Cambridge, and viewing, as he did, economy, not only as meritorious, but as a virtue (and if not a virtue, the most rigid moralist would allow it to be the parent of many virtues) he should offer to his Royal Highness the tribute of his admiration. But his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge had practised it in circumstances which made that virtue comparatively easy. He had his allowance earlier than his royal brother (the duke of Sussex), and had not come to it with that unavoidable arrear of debt. He had a large military income, and in Hanover he had an income which had been stated at 6000*l.* a-year, besides a town and country-house, a shooting seat, with the use of the king's stables and servants. Whether or no he had a table kept up besides his income of 6000*l.* a-year, or whether that expense was included in it, he was uncertain. Thus, over and above his personal and household expenses, and his military income, he had 18,000*l.* a-year from this country, which might be allowed to accumulate, and he believed that, in fact, it did so accumulate, and that large sums were vested by his Royal Highness in the funds of the country. He, therefore, was justified in saying, that while the house would not hesitate to vote some allowance to those members of the royal family whom it was desirable to see married, and who would not be enabled otherwise to contract marriages, so they were bound by their duty to their constituents to refuse grants to those to whom they were unnecessary. They were bound in consistency to refuse them. In consistency, he said, because, having refused to give 10,000*l.* to the duke of Clarence, on the ground that it was not absolutely necessary, why should they grant 6000*l.* a-year to the duke of Cambridge, which was admitted not to be necessary? In voting, therefore, a sum to that illustrious person, they were only squandering the money of the public to pay an idle, but not on that account a less expensive compliment. If the noble lord, therefore, could not assert, that without this allowance, his royal highness's private and public income would not enable him to marry, he should give the motion his negative altogether. Funds had been adverted to (the Windsor establishment), from which these allowances might with propriety be supplied. But there were other funds; he meant the private funds of the heads of that illustrious house. On the malady of the king, commissioners were appointed to manage the private fortune of his Majesty, and it was once proposed, that salaries of 1000*l.* a-year should be paid to them from that source. This assumed that those funds were ample. Her Majesty, too, it was reported, had very considerable property; and he hoped it would not be deemed indelicate, or betray a desire to pry into private affairs, if he suggested that means might be found to furnish a part of this expense from those sources. He was sure he only spoke the sense of the house and the country when he suggested, that the course of proceeding which he recommended would shew, that the highest individuals in the country had that fellow-feeling in the public distress, in which they could only partake by sympathy. They were wisely exempted from all share in the public burdens, and as that storm was blown over, which they, as well as the people, were interested in escaping, they might now take an opportunity to relieve the burdens of the nation, by dispensing to the less fortunate branches of their family that abundance which was enjoyed by those who were more favoured, or even more provident. (hear!) He confessed, it was not the amount which chiefly arrested his attention. He considered the principle more important still. It was not so much whether 6000*l.* more should be voted, as whether any thing should be voted which was not necessary. Then respect and delicacy would be misplaced, and he would say childish, not only if 6000*l.* but if sixpence more than was necessary should be voted. It was highly deserving of reprobation that the people should be incumbered with the payment of any thing not indispensably required—that people so well known for their patience, for all their burdens cheerfully borne, and for an indisposition to grumble at those burdens as long as they were not to be avoided. Let not that people be told that they were clamorous, if they objected to pay what was then demanded, after they had paid millions without a murmur, when they felt it to be necessary. There was no greater enemy to the people, no falser friend to the royal family, than he who, abandoning his duty to his constituents, would persuade parliament to put a negative upon, or not voluntarily to comply with, the express sense of the people. The cry of economy had gone forth from one end of the kingdom to the other; and if one kind was more loudly called for than another, it was that connected with the princes of the royal house. He spoke not invidiously with regard to the character of any man; he made no comparisons as to personal considerations; where the subject before the house was a grant of money, he made comparisons as to the amount of means, but none as to persons. And if the house should unnecessarily make the grant that had been moved, he did not see how it could refuse to afford a similar provision to the duke of Cumberland. Why were they to make such a difference between the two? The duke of Cumberland was in want, the duke of Cambridge was in affluent circumstances; thus far the distinction was in his favour. And what was there in public conduct, or in private character, that was to make any difference between those princes in securing the succession of the house of Brunswick upon the throne? He knew nothing of the duke of Cumberland, but he saw no reason why he should not have a grant similar to that of the duke of Cambridge. That was his opinion, and, unpopular as it might be, he took that opportunity of stating it. He knew nothing of the duke of Cumberland, except in public life; and, as far as his public conduct went, he differed with him; for he was connected with a party which had been upheld by gross and unconstitutional political intrigue, that met with his reprobation as a political individual; but when called on to say, whether a prince of the house of Brunswick should have a certain sum for an important purpose, could he upon constitutional principles oppose that? Could he take that line of public conduct upon grounds of which he knew nothing? Let no man imagine that he was voting for the consolidation of the monarchy, in supporting a proposal for a sum of the necessity for which he was not absolutely convinced. Let no man be supposed, if he voted against that grant, to be doing any thing detrimental to the interests of the family. In the present state of the country, and in the universal temper of men's minds, that grant ought to be well considered. That temper was not one suddenly produced, not a thought taken up yesterday, but a disposition which had been gaining ground more and more every day, which had been growing in the hearts of the people the more their burdens were pressed upon them. There was a deep-struck, immovable, determination taken by the country, that they would have economy in the public purse, and if there was one part in which extravagance or carelessness in the administration of that purse was more offensive than in another, in which it was more felt by any man as a personal affront, it was an improvident and useless grant to one of the princes of the royal family. He was willing that the succession should be preserved by all necessary means. He did not oppose their having that which the splendour of their high station demanded. But let the house remember the saying of an illustrious man, whom they were apt to look on rather as a great poet than as a famous political writer, that he "preferred a republic to a monarchy, because the trappings of a monarchy would suffice to set up a republic." That was one of the views in which that great man was mistaken; there he took too narrow a ground for a right decision of the question. He would say for himself, that he preferred a monarchy to a republic, with all its trappings and all its expenses, be they what they might, provided that those trappings and those expenses were cut down to the lowest necessary farthing. He who voted for keeping monarchy higher than it ought to be, supported the delusion under which the people laboured, and compelled them to throw away their veneration for the fabric of monarchy, merely because other forms of government were cheaper. That member would do his duty best, first to the people, because they were materially concerned, and next to the family on the throne, who voted all that was absolutely necessary to preserve the succession, but not one farthing more.

Lord Castlereagh said, that he felt himself called upon to make one or two observations on the speech of the hon. and learned gentleman. The hon. and learned gentleman had set out by remarking, that the subject was one of great delicacy; but he had hardly proceeded a sentence in his argument, before he broadly insinuated that one of his objections to the proposal was, that it obliged him to pronounce on the character of two members of the royal family, whom he named. When the hon. and learned gentleman stated, that he was a friend to the royal family, he was bound to believe him; but if he had intended to excite disgust in the minds of the people towards the royal family, he could not have taken a better course. Such reflections operated in concert with the poison so industriously disseminated out of doors. There was no proceeding better adapted to such purposes than throwing out reflections, without assigning any ground, public or private, on which they were founded; than casting insinuations on persons who were known not to be within the walls of that house, and who consequently were unable to defend themselves. The hon. and learned gentleman had said, that the house were required to give a lumping or general vote on this subject. Now, the fact was, that the grants had been proposed upon their individual merits. Every question was a subject of special motion, and every single proposition was open to the decision of the house, like other motions. With respect to another part of the hon. and learned gentleman's speech, he trusted that the house would never sanction that principle—that noble personages should be called on, whenever they wanted an addition to their establishment for such a purpose, to come forward with a statement of their affairs, and plead in formâ pauperis. He could not conceive any thing so painful to the house as that they should be compelled to make solicitations for provisions upon those grounds. The proceeding that seemed to be thought best by the hon. and learned gentleman was, that the house should cast their eyes over the royal family, and see which prince could be induced to marry on the lowest terms—which prince should bring the least burden on the country, which alliance would bring upon the people the smallest portion of charge. According to this principle, any member of the family, however low or remote, provided he were lineally or collaterally in the line of descent, if willing to marry with a less provision than another member of the family nearer in point of succession, ought to be preferred. The people no doubt were desirous of economy, but he acquitted them of harbouring any principle so mercenary and contracted as that which the hon. and learned gentleman had attributed to them. The hon. and learned gentleman by attributing that principle, had passed a libel upon the people of England—a favour which he might have spared. He had then implied that some injury had been done to the duke of Kent, by giving precedence to the grant to the duke of Cambridge. Nothing could be more unfounded than this: there was no indisposition whatever on the part of the Prince Regent to the marriage of the duke of Kent, but the marriage was not at present intended.—With respect to the revenue derived by the duke of Cambridge from his appointment in Hanover, he expressed his hope and confidence that the house would take a very different view of it from that which the hon. and learned gentleman was so anxious to recommend. To argue, indeed, that any such revenue, or any casual revenue, should form a ground for diminishing the allowance proper to be granted to a member of our royal family, would be quite inconsiderate and unjust. Would the house countenance the idea that no member of the royal family should have his due reward for any appointment which he accepted at home or abroad? Would it be argued, for instance, that if any son of the King were appointed commander in chief of an army upon the continent, his royal highness should be precluded from the usual emoluments of the station, or that his acceptance of such emoluments should deprive him of any part of his proper revenue in this country? Surely, parliament would never allow such homage to the talent or character of one of our princes, as so high an appointment would imply, to be used as an argument to abridge his proper allowance as a member of our royal family. This, indeed, he could not think possible, for it never could be the inclination of a British parliament to extinguish all exertion and emulation among those very persons whose merits it was the peculiar interest of the country to encourage and illustrate. The situation of chief governor or viceroy of Hanover, he could assert, was reluctantly accepted by the duke of Cambridge, and was only to be deemed a temporary appointment.—On these grounds he felt himself bound to press the present motion, taking as a rule the sum which the house had thought proper to vote for the duke of Clarence, and he must express his hope, that the house would not allow its decision to be influenced by the hon. and learned gentleman's partial views of economy.

Mr. Brougham observed, that nothing but the situation in which the noble lord's mind was placed by what had passed yesterday and the day before, could account for the remarks which he had thought proper to make with regard to what had fallen from him. A very ill-natured thing might be said in the coolest manner, but the noble lord was in rather an unusual and unpleasant condition, and the temper to which it gave birth could alone extenuate, for nothing could justify, such observations as he had applied to his sentiments. The noble lord had directly imputed to him an endeavour to run down and vilify the royal family. That the noble lord thought so, he was bound to believe, or he would not have said so. But he would appeal to the house, or to any one who had heard him in a proper temper, whether his language could be so characterised with any degree of justice? He thought it would be admitted that his language had no such tendency, and sure he was that he entertained no such intention as was imputed to him by the noble lord. No man could have expressed himself more temperately or guardedly than he had done. He had been surprised and astonished as to what part of his speech bore the construction given to it by the noble lord; but, after consulting with several of his friends, he concluded that that part of his speech to which the noble lord referred was, where he noticed the melancholy death of the Princess Charlotte; but he did not upon that occasion enter into any invidious comparison with any other member of the royal family, and for this he appealed to the recollection of the house. He had, indeed, no disposition whatever to speak disrespectfully of the royal family. On the contrary, he did not enter into the consideration of the private character of any of the princes alluded to in the opinions which he had expressed on the vote which he meant to deliver upon this subject. The only question which, in his view, the house had to decide was, whether it was necessary and proper to grant the sums required, and upon this question his decision was in the negative. Nothing but what had passed on Monday and last night could have prevented any man of ordinary capacity from conceiving what was his meaning.

Lord Castlereagh observed, that the hon. and learned gentleman was quite mistaken in attributing any disturbed temper to him, as he was in perfect good humour when he heard and remarked upon the speech of the hon. and learned gentleman. His interpretation of the hon. and learned gentleman's language was not at all attributable to temper, for that interpretation was the same as many others around him had made. Therefore, he must conclude, that if the hon. and learned gentleman meant to speak respectfully of the royal family, he had very unhappily executed his purpose; and he hoped the hon. and learned gentleman would be rather more explicit in that strain in future. He could not help repeating his conception, that the hon. and learned gentleman had spoken disrespectfully of two of the royal dukes.

Mr. Brougham denied that he had so spoken, and observed, that the noble lord must have been dreaming when he formed the conception which he had mentioned.

Mr. F. Douglas, in allusion to the charges against those who opposed the grants demanded, of having shewn disrespect to the royal family, contended, that more indignity was thrown upon the royal family by the pernicious advice of the noble lord, than they had suffered for centuries before. (Hear, hear.) It was easy to discriminate who were the real friends of the royal family—those who would not allow the character of royalty itself to suffer in the country by flattering individuals, or those who would diminish the public affection for royalty, by pressing for an unnecessary augmentation of the public burdens, under the specious pretence of maintaining the splendour of the royal family. Those who opposed the noble lord's propositions were accused of being lukewarm to the succession to the throne, because they endeavoured to diminish and pare down extravagant sums required from resources already exhausted. The best mode, however, of perpetuating the succession to the throne was by preserving the affections of the people, and by anxiously endeavouring to abstain from imposing unnecessary burdens and unnecessary duties. It was the promise of such a disposition that had created so strong an affection for the late Princess Charlotte, an affection which manifested itself unequivocally in the universal lamentation for her death. (Hear, hear, hear.) But the language of ministers with respect to the proposed marriages of the royal dukes, was as unbecoming as their conduct in pressing for an unnecessary increase of the public expenditure. The noble lord and his colleague (Mr. Canning) had, indeed, talked of those marriages as if they were mere Dutch contracts. (Hear, hear, hear.) What had occurred upon this occasion through the independence of several of the respectable members of that house, had, he was glad to see, operated very much to attach the people to their representatives; but ministers deserved universal execration (he could use no other word) for making the succession to the crown a grievance to the people.

Mr. Curwen said, that the burdens of the country were so great, that nothing short of the utmost necessity could justify any addition to them. It was painful to find it necessary to exercise economy at the expense of the royal family, but such was the state of the country, that a single shilling could not be spared. This was humiliating and distressing; but the displeasure of the house, of the country, and of the royal family, ought to fall upon the authors of this evil,—upon those who, by their wars, their waste, and their extravagance, had ruined the resources of the nation. After full experience of the embarrassments of the country, economy was not practised. Up to this moment economy had never been acted upon. The house had in one instance shewn itself alive to the situation of the country, and he hoped they would continue to shew that they were in earnest. He could not see any necessity for giving a sum of 6000*l.* to the duke of Cambridge, while he remained in possession of so large an income from Hanover. But although he felt it his duty to oppose the present motion, he should still, in the event of the marriage, vote for a grant to the royal consort of a dower of 6000*l.* a-year.

Mr. Wilberforce said, that if it were admitted, and it could scarcely be denied, that some additional expense must be incurred in the establishment of any individual upon his marriage, he could not but think the present as moderate a sum as could be required on the marriage of the illustrious person alluded to. As to the revenue of the duke of Cambridge in Hanover, he knew nothing of that revenue, and he thought that the house had nothing to do with Hanover. It was never, indeed, the habit of parliament to meddle in the concerns of Hanover, and he believed that we should rather lose than gain by any connection with the affairs of that country. He did not wish to enter further into this question, and, therefore, excluding it from his consideration, he thought that an addition of 6000*l.* ought to be given to the royal duke upon his marriage. With regard to the comments which had been made upon the terms in which the proposed marriages had been spoken of by his noble friend and others, those terms were the natural effect of the act of George III., which restricted the marriages of the royal family. That act he did not think wise or salutary. He could not conceive why a British prince could be rendered more politically efficient by being less morally free, or that compelling him to marry a foreign princess, whom perhaps he never saw, was more wise than leaving him to select a wife in his native country according to his own inclinations. He should rejoice to see our princes married to English women, because he wished to have the successor to the throne always resident, and educated in England, according to English principles and manners. As to the allusion made to the character of the princes, he agreed that we had no right to enter into the discussion of any man's private character. But yet it was impossible to suppress what we saw, and felt, and thought, and we had had a signal cause of contrast between the marriage of the heart, and an union according to the marriage act, he meant in the union of the Princess Charlotte and Prince Leopold. (Hear, hear, hear.) There was another case with respect to the duke and duchess of Glocester. (Hear, hear.) The merits of the dukes of Kent and Sussex were also universally felt. In adverting to the character of those illustrious persons, he did not mean to make invidious allusions to others, of whose merit, indeed, he could not speak, as he did not know them. But the conduct of the dukes of Kent and Sussex in devoting their time, in rendering their rank and influence subservient to purposes of charity and instruction, was such as to conciliate universal praise. It were to be wished that other princes, especially on the continent, would imitate such illustrious examples. For such imitations would serve to diminish the glare generally attending royalty, and render it a genial light, cheering to all. Princes would thus contribute to their own best interests, by promoting the happiness, and, consequently, securing the gratitude and esteem of the people. On the whole, he thought that ministers had upon this occasion brought forward a very moderate demand, which the finances of the country could easily afford to meet, and he could never deem it fair or politic to act parsimoniously towards members of the royal family, although he was not one of those who thought that, in this country, the dignity and character of royalty were best supported by splendid retinues, or expensive establishments. Still he was of opinion, that the country would rather gain than lose by a liberal allowance, at the outset, to each of the princes.

Mr. Brand thought the house was bound to ascertain the state of our finances, before it assented to the present proposition. He agreed with the noble lord, that it was not becoming on our part to inquire into the external revenue of any of our princes, but he could not think the noble lord had made out a case to shew that the royal duke, to whom the motion referred, had not sufficient means from his revenues in this country to maintain the proper splendour of his station, without any addition to the burdens of the people, and therefore he felt himself bound to vote for the amendment. He would, however, support a proposition for granting a jointure of 6000*l.* a-year to the duchess of Cambridge.

Mr. Tierney declared, that if he were to indulge his private feelings, he should promptly vote in favour of the present proposition, for he had the honour of knowing, and he most cordially regarded, the duke of Cambridge. But he apprehended, that if he deserted his duty in one case, the house would not trust him in others. He had pledged himself on the side of economy, and he must follow up that course. In his opinion, the noble lord had failed to make out the necessity of such a vote as that he proposed, and the whole question depended upon the necessity of the case. The noble lord and others professed to think that 6000*l.* a-year was a very moderate sum, if not insignificant, according to the state of our finances. Certainly this sum was insignificant according to the rate of our expenditure, but how it was to be regarded with relation to our finances, we were yet to learn. What was the state of our finances we could not as yet precisely tell. But appearances were by no means encouraging, and it was for the house to decide this question, not according to the alleged wants of the royal duke alluded to, but according to those of the country. In speaking thus of a prince, compared to the people, he hoped the noble lord would not play off the same game with regard to him, that he had done against his hon. and learned friend. He could not agree to the doctrine, that the revenue of the duke of Cambridge in Hanover should be excluded from consideration in this case; for, if the royal duke had an establishment in that country, fully sufficient to maintain the splendour of royalty, that, in his conception, formed a strong argument against the proposed grant; and he happened to know, from as good an authority as the noble lord himself, that such was the fact. It happened indeed, to come to his knowledge, about two years ago, from the most authentic source, that the viceroy or chief governor had all the means under his own control that could be required to supply his wants, or to maintain his dignity. There was, in fact, no civil list in Hanover to limit the wishes of the duke of Cambridge. His royal highness could, therefore, command whatever he desired. It followed, then, that any pecuniary grant which that house might vote, would only afford his royal highness additional means of accumulating a private fortune. (Hear, hear.) The noble lord had said, that the proposed marriage of the duke of Cambridge had no view whatever to any grant of money; and he felt himself warranted to add, that his royal highness did not press for that grant. The noble lord was, in fact, much more anxious to establish the principle of making a certain grant to each of the royal dukes, upon their marriage, than the duke of Cambridge was for the adoption of the present motion. If the duke of Cambridge were to return from Hanover, to reside in this country with his duchess, and to require this grant, he with others, would be ready to vote for it. But his royal highness, who was the youngest branch of the royal family, was very likely to reside many years in Hanover; and he would ask the house, whether, under such circumstances, combined with the state of the country, it was willing to vote a sum of money not for the support of the splendour of royalty in England, but to enable an individual to accumulate a private fortune in another country? (Hear, hear.) It was, besides, to be recollected, that the present allowance to the duke of Cambridge—namely, 18,000*l.* a-year was, in Hanover, fully equivalent to 30,000*l.* a-year in this country. Upon what ground, then, could it be argued that the house should not go into a consideration of those things, before it consented to saddle any additional burden upon the country? But, notwithstanding all that he had urged, if the noble lord would say that the proposed marriage would not take place unless this grant were acceded to, he would immediately vote for it—if not, he felt that he must vote against it. He repeated his disposition to vote, if required, for a grant to the amount proposed, upon the return of his royal highness to England, and concluded with expressing his intention, as the prince had but a life interest in his revenue from the country, to support the grant of an adequate jointure to his duchess.

Mr. Sharp animadverted upon the improper advice which ministers had given to the princes on this occasion, namely, to apply to the people in their present distressed situation for a grant of money, and to keep the necessity, which could alone justify that application, entirely and studiously out of view.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer felt it unnecessary to occupy the time of the house after the statements made by his noble friend. The income derived by the royal duke from Hanover ought to be entirely kept out of view, if it were known; but it was not known, and he had no means of giving information on the subject. He was, however, desirous of assuring the house, that the appointment of the duke of Cambridge abroad was any thing but a sinecure. The duties annexed to it were of a very laborious nature, and entitled the individual who discharged them to the full compensation that was provided. The royal duke was now about to contract a matrimonial alliance, not only with the approbation of the crown, but with that of the house and of the country. He could not therefore imagine any occasion upon which the liberality of parliament could more properly be exercised; and he was sure that it could not be the wish of any hon. member, that, in order to justify the proposed grant, a previous message should be sent from the crown, announcing that his royal highness had resigned the government of Hanover.

Mr. Methuen could not help thinking that the present case was brought forward, in the first instance, with the view of paving the way to another, upon the merits of which the house had long since decided. He charged the noble lord who threw upon others the reproach of indelicacy, with being the first on the preceding night to introduce invidious comparisons. It was, however, he readily admitted, only paying a tribute of justice to remind the house of the dignified conduct, the private integrity, and the public worth of the duke of Gloucester and his illustrious consort.

Mr. Plunket observed, that in the vote he should give, he could not be supposed to treat with disrespect the royal message that had been communicated to the house. It was quite unnecessary to enter into any protestations of attachment to the house of Brunswick, connected as that family were with the principles of the constitution, and the security of the protestant succession. But he could not, in his conscience, see on what grounds the proposition of this grant could be supported. The country had already conferred on the princes of the blood a very liberal provision. He was not prepared to say, that the mere circumstance of an alliance by marriage being in contemplation constituted a ground for altering the amount. Such a principle did not rest on any precedents in our history, and he felt confident it had no support either in justice or reason. He did not mean to say, that if the case of necessity was subsequently made out, such provision might not be increased. The only way of measuring grants of such a description was, by a reference to the necessity of those who sought the increase, and to the ability of those who were called upon to defray the expense. It was impossible for him, therefore, to agree with those who thought, that, in considering the present proposition, the house should throw out of its consideration what the present situation and emoluments of the illustrious personage were. If these grants were proposed more fully to enable the royal dukes to sustain the splendour of their station, in order to decide on the increase necessary for that object, it was essential to know what their present situation was. He had felt it his duty to make those few observations in support of the vote he should give conscientiously, feeling that, in the present exhausted state of the country, he ought not by agreeing to the proposition, to add to its burdens.

Mr. Protheroe thought, that the chancellor of the exchequer had not, in his recommendation of this vote, sufficiently adverted to those difficulties of the country with which he must necessarily be well acquainted. He was far from being convinced by any thing that had fallen from him, that it deserved the approbation of the house.

Sir W. Burroughs called upon the noble lord to state whether or not the alliance of marriage between the duke of Cambridge and the intended duchess, would depend on the grant? By that answer his vote would be regulated.

Lord Castlereagh said, he could not be supposed to be so acquainted with his royal highness's circumstances, as to give the answer required. In the state of doubt in which the hon. baronet confessedly stood, the safer course would be to give his vote with him, in favour of the grant. (A laugh.)

The committee then divided.

For the resolution . . .	177
Against it	95
Majority	82

Lord Castlereagh then moved, "That a sum of 6000*l.* per annum be settled upon her highness the princess of Hesse, when she shall become duchess of Cambridge, in case her highness should survive his royal highness the duke of Cambridge, to be issuing and payable out of the consolidated fund of the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland."—This motion was carried nemine contradicente.

Lord Castlereagh then rose to submit a proposition to the committee, with respect to which he could sincerely say, he had never recognized any fair public ground of objection. He was perfectly aware, that certain private considerations had weighed with the house, on a former occasion, in deciding upon the claims arising out of the marriage of his royal highness the duke of Cumberland. He was desirous only of recalling to their recollection, that that alliance had been formed with the consent of the crown, although he was obliged to admit that it had unfortunately not met with the approbation of the country. It was, however, but common justice to observe, that ever since her residence in this country, not the slightest reproach or imputation could be attached to the character of the princess with whom the marriage had been contracted. But if, notwithstanding, the house was, as it had certainly appeared to him to be, as far as he had had an opportunity of judging, still disposed to abide by its former sentiments on this subject, and had not yet seen sufficient reason to withdraw its objections to a grant in consideration of that marriage, much as he should regret it, he should feel it his duty to defer to its opinion. He knew that it was the feeling of many hon. members that it was scarcely open to parliament, consistently with its own character, to take cognizance of a question on which it had already decided. Under these circumstances, he could not undertake to press the adoption of his motion, unless he should perceive, in the course of the discussion which might arise, that the sense of the house was apparently in its favour. At the same time, he could not content himself without recording his deliberate opinion, that the vote to which he invited them was justifiable upon every principle of general expediency and justice. The noble lord concluded by moving "That his majesty be enabled to grant an additional yearly sum of money out of the consolidated fund of Great Britain and Ireland, not exceeding 6000*l.* to commence from the 5th of April last, towards providing for the establishment of the duke and duchess of Cumberland."

Mr. Brougham observed, that from the manner in which the noble lord opened the measure, it was evident that he did not feel the least expectation of prevailing on the house to adopt it. For my part (said Mr. Brougham) I shall oppose the grant to the duke of Cumberland on the same grounds precisely, and on no others, on which I opposed it when it was formerly under consideration. But if the noble lord should fail in carrying his proposition, I do hope that he will not be prevented from following it up by another resolution, granting a dower of 6000*l.* to the duchess of Cumberland. (Hear, hear.) With that illustrious lady I have not the honour to be acquainted. Indeed, it is unnecessary to enlarge on the propriety of her conduct since her arrival, after the speech which the house heard from a noble lord (earl Gower) last night. I shall, therefore, leave the strength of that impression to produce its due influence, believing, as I do, the conduct of that distinguished lady to be altogether unexceptionable. What may be the nature of the objections to her in any quarter, and the prepossessions against which she has had to contend, I shall neither stop nor stoop to enquire. It would be oppressive, illiberal, ungenerous and unmanly here to give them any sanction. (Hear, hear.)

Lord Folkestone expressed his hope, that parliament would assign dower to the duchess of Cumberland; with regard to whose character, he could say of his own knowledge, that many of the prevailing prejudices were unfounded. He had himself, in common with all other Englishmen who had visited the court of Berlin during her residence there, received the greatest civilities and attention from her royal highness.

Lord Castlereagh said, it had never been his intention to pass over the requisite provision for the duchess of Cumberland, and he held a resolution to that effect in his hand.

Mr. Wrottesley contended, that if dower were granted to the duchess, it would be an extraordinary act to refuse the annuity to the duke of Cumberland. He thought such a refusal would wear a most harsh and ungracious appearance to all parties. He recollected, that different gentlemen had formerly given different reasons for opposing the grant. Some had objected to it on the ground of the uncertainty which prevailed, whether the duke and duchess of Cumberland would reside in this country. Others, he was sorry to say, had made it a personal question, and opposed the grant on the ground of morality. The conduct of these illustrious individuals had proved, that their marriage was one which could not be censured by the house, and, therefore, he did not see that they could any longer withhold the grant.

Mr. Forbes declared, that he felt much surprise at the manner in which the noble lord had brought forward this proposition. He had never heard a speech delivered by the noble lord with so much pain. For his own part he would not, if the grant to the duke should be negatived, insult the duchess with the offer of dower. (A laugh.) He had enjoyed many opportunities of learning what the general sentiment of the country was upon this subject, and he challenged any hon. member to say, that the country was disposed to insult an unprotected woman, who had trusted to its generosity. He had not the honour of knowing the duke of Cumberland, whom he had never seen but once, and he stated his opinions on no other than general grounds. He felt it his duty to call upon the house to reconsider whether an exception ought still to be made to the disadvantage of his royal highness. Would they decide on those scandalous reports which, he believed, were without any foundation whatever, that had been propagated against those illustrious individuals? It was his determination to press this question to a division; he cared not for a little unpopularity, and should despise a seat in that house if it forced him to any compromise with his own conscience.

Lord Castlereagh professed himself sorry to have incurred the hon. gentleman's censures, but was disposed to return good for evil, and to acknowledge, that he had heard with sincere pleasure the speech of the hon. gentleman. He felt strongly that the hon. gentleman had supported the cause of justice, and he did not think that cause would suffer from his own manner of introducing it, as it had been the means of calling forth the manly sentiments which the committee had just heard. At the same time, he must express his hope, that if the house should refuse the proposed grant to the duke of Cumberland, it would not withhold dower from the duchess. (Hear, hear.) He was quite sure that the object nearest the heart of his royal highness was, to feel satisfied with respect to the future situation of his duchess. As to his own course of proceeding, in calling the attention of the house to this question, he must declare that he had never expressed or shewn any reluctance to go to a division upon it. He had fairly stated that he left it to the unbiassed opinion of the house, at the same time declaring, that his own judgment coincided with the views of those who, like the hon. gentleman, thought the grant reasonable and just.

Sir Wm. Scott observed, that her royal highness the duchess of Cumberland had, during her residence in this country, discharged in the most exemplary manner the duties of her station. The question as to the settlement of a dower on her royal highness would, therefore, he was persuaded, be unanimously acceded to. With respect to the other part of the consideration, it would certainly poison the pleasure which her royal highness might otherwise feel at such a grant, if it were accompanied by any stigma on her royal consort. He, for one, could see no rational ground on which any honourable man could refuse to vote the proposed allowance to his royal highness. The only ground on which, on a former occasion, the house refused to make a provision for their royal highnesses was, that the opinion of parliament had not been taken on the marriage, and that the character of her royal highness was unknown to them. Now, however, her character was known, and by universal attestation approved. The house must, therefore, in his opinion, even with a view to consistency, give that now which they formerly withheld, as the cause which induced them to withhold it had been removed.

Mr. Protheroe did not think that their royal highnesses were indebted to the hon. gentleman opposite for the course he had adopted. It was very unfair to take advantage of the generous disposition of the house towards an unprotected foreigner, again to propose a grant which had been so recently rejected. If the house retracted the decision to which they formerly came on this subject, they would fill the country with disgust, and bring the character of parliament into contempt. (Hear, hear, hear.) The arguments which had been urged on the former discussion of this question had been very unfairly stated. There had been great consistency of conduct in a very high quarter on this subject, and he trusted that it would be imitated by that house.

Mr. Wrottesley rose to explain. He commenced by observing, that, on the former occasion, when this question was discussed, an hon. baronet, whom he then saw in his place had expressly stated, that one of the chief objections to a grant to these illustrious personages was, the uncertainty whether they would continue to reside in this country. He had made an extract from the speech of the hon. baronet, which he then held in his hand. The words which he had used were these—"If they continue to reside in this country." (Cries of order, order.) He fancied he had a right to state the grounds on which objections had been formerly raised. (Cries of chair.)

The Chairman said, he believed the rule was, that no reference could be made to a former debate.

Mr. Wrottesley, notwithstanding this observation, was proceeding to read the extract, when cries of "order" and "chair" were renewed. The hon. gentleman attempted a third time to read the extract, but the cries of "order" and "chair" became so general, that he at last sat down.

Sir T. Acland warmly condemned those misjudging friends of the illustrious person in question, who appeared desirous of pressing the question to a division. He would refrain from restating any of those unpleasant arguments against the grant, to the repetition of which the hon. gentleman had so sedulously invited him. He felt it an imperious duty to resist the grant, and he again expressed his regret that the house were to be prevented, by the over-warmth of a few injudicious friends, from pursuing the excellent path which had been previously chalked out for them.

Lord Stanley observed, that the noble lord had called on those who voted on this question on a former occasion, to state whether any change had taken place in their opinions. He was not in town at that time, and therefore did not vote; but if he had been able to attend the house, he should most certainly have voted against the grant. (Hear, hear.) He had not heard any thing to make any alteration in his opinions. With respect to one of these illustrious personages, feeling as strongly as any man the respect that was due to her character, from what had been stated to the house, he could not allow that consideration to weigh on his mind, so as to induce him to consent to the motion of the noble lord.

Mr. F. Douglas said, the only ground on which they could grant money now, was the necessity of the case; and they had been told by his noble friend (earl Gower) that there was an absolute necessity, as the illustrious personages depended on the charity of a foreign power. Was this worthy of the high honour, and character of the British nation? (Cries of hear.) As to the duchess, from every thing that had occurred since her residence here, it would be a great want of generosity and manly feeling not to give her a jointure. He had voted formerly against a grant to both the illustrious individuals; but after the decision of the house in the case of the duke of Cambridge, he should certainly give his support to the motion for granting a similar sum to the duke of Cumberland.

Mr. Gurney said, that as the house had thought proper to grant a sum to the duke of Cambridge, it would be the height of injustice to refuse the same to the duke of Cumberland. As an humble individual of that house, he must enter his protest against the unfair and uncandid manner in which the illustrious individuals in question had been treated.

Mr. Hammersley, adverting to the correspondence which had taken place between the illustrious individuals previous to their marriage, and which he had had the opportunity of reading, observed, that he had never in his life been more strongly impressed with sentiments of respect than on that occasion; and although he was certainly not especially authorised to make any statement from it, he could not refrain from offering to the committee a few observations, to which it naturally gave rise. The correspondence began by a proposition for the marriage. The first letter was from the duchess, who stated that she could not consent to ——

Lord Castlereagh spoke to order. He conceived that the communication which the hon. gentleman was about to make to the committee, as it had not been authorised, was improper.

Mr. Hammersley said, he should be sorry to do any thing improper and contrary to order, but the character of our princes was of such great importance to the country, that it was most desirable to remove any unfavourable and unfounded impression that might exist on the subject.

Lord Castlereagh observed, that the hon. gentleman had himself allowed that he was not authorised to make the statement which he had commenced.

Mr. Hammersley was again proceeding, when the chancellor of the exchequer spoke to order, and there being a general call of order, the hon. gentleman desisted.

Mr. W. Elliott declared, that no man could wish more cordially than he did—nay, he was persuaded it was the unanimous wish of the house—to see every branch of the royal family suitably provided for. When he used the word "suitably," he meant according to the exigencies of the times. The house and the people had a deep interest in the character and dignity of the royal family. But, in the pursuance of these objects, the committee were surely to consider a little the means and condition of the country. No one could deny that our finances were in a most embarrassed situation, produced no doubt by that long contest which we had so nobly and magnanimously waged, and in which the interests of the royal personages in question were as deeply involved as those of the people at large. He, for one, could not regret this contest even with all its results, protected as the country had been by it from much greater evils. With respect to the grant to his royal highness the duke of Clarence, being so near the throne, he conceived that his royal highness was justly entitled to the moderate provision which had been made for him. But the junior branches of the royal family were already liberally provided for. (Hear, hear, hear.) He had voted against the proposed grant which had just been made to that illustrious individual (the duke of Cambridge) who was a model for persons of his high rank, because his royal highness did not want it. He should, on the same ground, vote against the present proposition. Undoubtedly, there was another reason for his doing so, namely, that on the most mature consideration parliament had before refused a similar claim. (Hear, hear.) On that occasion he had not voted; but he candidly acknowledged, that had he been present he should unquestionably have voted against the proposed grant. He had heard nothing since that period, either in or out of the house, that at all altered his opinion, and he must say, that he did not think those persons exercised a sound discretion who thus brought his royal highness before parliament again. In the course which he took on this subject he was actuated by the most conscientious motives—for he was persuaded, that any little show which their royal highnesses might sacrifice by relinquishing this claim, would be amply compensated by the stable dignity which they would acquire. Persuaded that the real interest of the royal personages in question, the character of the house, and the welfare of the country, would be best consulted by rejecting the proposition now submitted to the committee, he should certainly vote against it if it should be pressed to a division.

Mr. Canning observed, that some of the arguments which had been urged against the motion, would have been less inapplicable had the transactions in which it originated been matters of choice or caprice. But if the necessity of taking some steps, with a view to the continuance of the succession in the family at present on the throne, arose from a calamity which no power on earth could avert, it was hard to make it a matter of inculpation of his majesty's government that such steps had been taken. He could not help believing, that if the session had been allowed to pass without any steps having been taken by the executive government to supply the defect in the succession, they would have been charged with having neglected their duty. He was at a loss to know on what principle the committee were called upon to reject the proposed motion. Not on the ground of character, for that was disclaimed. Not on the ground of seniority, for that was disclaimed by the vote of last night. He trusted the committee would recollect, that though adoption was not preference, exclusion would be stigma. He was not in the house when this proposition was last discussed, and he therefore could not weigh the influence which the recollection of that discussion might have on the consideration of the present question. But it was brought forward, at present, under circumstances of a very different kind. It was in the former instance a case of a marriage prompted by no public interest, coming alone, and unconnected with any general principle of alliance. If the grant were now refused, it could be refused only on grounds personal towards the illustrious individual who was the object of it. But he begged the committee to observe, that his noble friend, in bringing forward the proposition, had shewn a marked deference to "the foregone conclusions" of the house. His noble friend expressly stated, that he entertained no determination to press the question to a division, unless he collected that the sense and feeling of the house ran in favour of the proposition. That call, conditional as it was, having been met in a manner beyond their expectation, he put it to the committee, whether his noble friend would not be deeply responsible to the illustrious individual and to the house, if he and those who acted with him, shrunk from expressing by their votes that opinion, which they would not press to a division, were they not thus invited to do so. It was on that principle, which left them no alternative, that they should proceed to the vote.

Sir John Newport contended, that as the house had negatived a proposition of the same kind three years ago, they were bound to reject it in the present instance. No change had taken place in the circumstances which could justify a departure from that precedent. Was there not the same distress in the country? Was not the demand for economy as loudly urged, and as necessary to be observed? To agree in this vote would be to pronounce a censure upon their past conduct, by retracting a decision to which they had deliberately come. He hoped they would have more regard for their own dignity and character. It had been said, that great exertions were made to obtain the former vote; if so, he was ignorant of it, and whether it was so or not, his consistency was not at all committed, not having voted on that occasion. But now that the question was submitted again, he would add his vote against it, and even felt himself bound to do so, whatever his own opinion might be originally, in order to protect the consistency of the house.

Mr. Bathurst (amidst loud cries of question) maintained, that the house was not bound by any former decision, as to the course it should now adopt.

Mr. Wynn, without going into general observations, thought it due to himself and those with whom he voted against this question three years ago, to state the ground of his conduct. As to the doctrine, that in all cases of the marriage of younger branches of the royal family, they were entitled to an additional provision from the nation, he could not in any way agree to it, but thought, that the allowances already made to them, in their single capacities, were amply sufficient. But if the fact were otherwise, was the mouth of parliament to be stopped in the discussion of these questions? Were they to be addressed with such language as "Will you enter into the character of the royal family?" when it was obvious, that in the cases of these grants, that character was of the greatest importance towards the settling of the question. (Hear, hear.) Upon such occasions, was advantage to be taken of that delicacy which every man felt when he was destined to hear of his own failings; and was it to be assumed, that all that was said in praise of individuals was to pass current for truth, because no one had taken upon himself the invidious task of contradicting it? (Hear, hear.) As to the allegation, that it was degrading for a prince of this country to receive benefits from a foreign power, and that what was allowed by Prussia ought not to be taken into consideration, he could not see any disgrace in the fact of a dowager princess of Prussia receiving a jointure from her own country. (Hear, hear, hear.) It would be so much in her favour if she chose at some future period to celebrate another marriage. (A laugh.) There was another part of this subject to which he could not forbear alluding, namely, the departure from all precedent by his majesty's ministers upon the marriage in question. No other marriage had taken place on which they had not called on the house to congratulate the throne; but, upon that occasion, they felt that there was no ground for doing so. Nay, farther, could it be denied that the marriage of the duke of Cambridge with the same princess had been broken off expressly at the desire of his majesty? A noble friend near him had suggested another topic—a female of the highest rank in this country had testified her objection to the match by refusing to receive the lady in her presence. It was on these grounds that the former decision of the house was one that gave satisfaction to the feelings and morals of the country: and whatever had since been the conduct of the lady to whom he alluded, the best panegyric that could be pronounced on her was, that nothing farther whatever had been heard of her. But this was not an alliance which called for a vote of increased allowance, and he felt it was one on which the house could not congratulate the country.

Mr. E. Littleton contended, that as the country was now emerging from the distress in which it was plunged three years ago, that fact constituted in itself a material distinction between the two applications. With regard to the illustrious lady alluded to, he was persuaded that the more her character was known, the more it would conciliate the respect of the country. As to the insinuations which were made against the character of the royal duke, for there was no proof, he should consider himself to be a weak man, were he to permit them to have the slightest influence on his judgment. He knew that none of the insinuations were proved, and he believed, on his honour, that they were unfounded.

The committee then divided.

For the grant - - - - - - 136
Against it - - - - - - - 143

Majority - - 7

Loud cheering took place in the house, when the result of the division was declared.

Lord Castlereagh then moved, "That a sum of 6000*l.* per annum be settled upon her royal highness the duchess of Cumberland, in case her royal highness should survive his royal highness the duke of Cumberland, to be issuing and payable out of the consolidated fund of the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland."

Mr. Forbes observed, that an hon. and learned gentleman had, in his opinion, acted inconsistently in voting against the proposed allowance to his royal highness the duke. In opposing the grant to the duke of Cambridge, that hon. and learned gentleman had pledged himself, in case the measure was carried against him, to support a similar grant to the duke of Cumberland.

Mr. Brougham begged the hon. member would restate the charge he had made against him, as, from the indistinct manner in which it was expressed, or from the noise in the house, he could not collect its force or import.

Mr. Forbes replied, that he understood the hon. and learned gentleman to say, that in the event of the house agreeing to an additional provision for the duke of Cambridge, he would support a similar provision for the duke of Cumberland.

Mr. Brougham said:—Sir, I cannot conceive how the hon. gentleman, whose understanding on other occasions is so sound and solid, should have so far misapprehended my meaning as to draw from my speech an inconsistency with my vote. I can scarcely conceive how his misapprehension could have arisen. In the latter case I added my vote to the sense of the house, but I did not contradict by it the principle which I laid down, as I voted against the allowances in both cases. (hear, from Mr. Croker.) The hon. secretary to the admiralty, whose understanding is as acute as that of the other hon. gentleman is solid (a laugh), cheers me on this occasion, and joins the other hon. gentleman in the charge. He would be glad to catch me in an inconsistency, and already begins to triumph in the idea that he has succeeded. If that hon. secretary has any charges against my conduct, I should be glad that he would state them openly and manfully, in a way that I can answer them. I entreat him to bring his accusations forward, in a public and undisguised manner, to meet me face to face, and not to have recourse to other methods of attack, which I have no opportunity of repelling. (Hear, hear, hear.) Instead of assailing my character or my consistency in an underhand manner; instead of watching my conduct to expose it where I cannot defend myself; let him fairly and manfully advance his charges in this house, where I can overwhelm them with instant confusion. (Hear, hear.) I never pledged myself to support the grant to the duke of Cumberland, if the proposed allowance to the duke of Cambridge met with the concurrence of the committee. Such a charge against me is totally unfounded. My argument was, that those who supported the latter, if all personal grounds were left out of the question, could not consistently vote for any additional grant to the former; and, in following my own principle, I acted consistently in voting against both resolutions. I will appeal to the understanding of the house, though I will make no appeal to that of the hon. secretary, if such was not my reasoning and my conduct; and I will ask them, whether there is here the shadow of inconsistency? As I left out of view all regard to personal qualities, I could make no distinction between the two cases; and as on public grounds I voted against the allowance to one of the royal dukes, on the same grounds I voted against any grant to the other. The resolution now before the house is totally unconnected with either, and has my cordial support.

Mr. Croker said:—Sir, I certainly laboured under the same misapprehension of the hon. and learned gentleman's speech as the hon. member under the gallery, and therefore I cheered the hon. and learned gentleman when he began to explain an apprehended inconsistency. I meant no personal allusion whatever, and would have acted in the same way by any other member. That hon. and learned gentleman has, however, accused me of an anxiety to watch his conduct, and to catch him in an inconsistency. If I thought it worth my while to watch that hon. and learned gentleman's conduct; if I could make it any object to detect his inconsistencies, I have no doubt that I could do so, both in his votes and in the debates, not only now but on former occasions. If I wished to examine his conduct in future, I might be equally successful. But he is much mistaken if he thinks that I could undertake such a task as to follow his course for the purpose of pointing out his inconsistencies; viewing him as I do, in no other light than as a member of this house, whose conduct, except in so far as it appears in debate, is to me an object of indifference. When, therefore, that hon. and learned gentleman insinuates that I have made attacks or brought charges against him in another quarter, I can assure the house, that the insinuation is totally unfounded. I am perfectly at a loss to know to what the hon. gentleman alludes. I cannot conceive what he means by the insinuation. In no writing of mine, published either anonymously or with my signature, have I ever so much as mentioned the name of the hon. gentleman. What his troubled conscience taught him to regard as an attack of mine, I am totally at a loss to conjecture. To what he alludes in saying that I have been watching his conduct for the purpose of pointing out its inconsistencies, I cannot conceive. The charges which he has brought against me, whatever he alludes to, are totally false.

Mr. Brougham asked, whether the last expression of the hon. gentleman was intended in a parliamentary sense?

Mr. Croker replied, that it was meant in the same sense in which the imputation made against him was intended.

An hon. member said, he hoped, that the hon. gentlemen would reconsider their expressions, and that the matter would not go farther. (No! no! from another member. The explanation is satisfactory.)

The resolution was then agreed to.

Mr. Protheroe moved, that the order for the call of the house on Friday the 24th instant be read, for the purpose of being discharged.

Mr. M. A. Taylor professed himself hostile to all the grants to which the committee had agreed. All the propositions voted were, in his opinion, indefensible in the present burdened state of the country. He was therefore decidedly of opinion, that a call of the house should be made for the purpose of taking the sense of members upon the bills to be introduced in consequence of them. The hon. gentleman who was now about to move for the discharge of the order, although he had voted against the grants, must have changed his opinion, otherwise he would still persist in the call, or give some reason for the change.

Mr. Protheroe said, that although he was against the grant, he felt himself obliged to yield to the sense of the great majority of the house. One of the chief grounds for rejecting the allowance to the Duke of Cumberland was, that the house had formerly decided against it, and he thought he should be acting inconsistently if he persisted in a call for the purpose of reversing its late decisions. The sooner the house was restored to harmony on these subjects, the better. He made his present motion, however, for the discharge of the order, with the perfect understanding that no attempt would be made to bring forward again the rejected resolutions.

Mr. Tierney said, that though these questions were decided, other important business was coming on, which might render it improper to discharge the order: the call might be postponed for a few days without being discharged.

After a few words from Lord Castlereagh, the motion was put, and the order discharged.

Mr. Brogden brought up the report of the grant to the Duke of Clarence.

Lord Castlereagh observed, that as his royal highness had declined accepting the sum which had been voted to him, it would be better to withdraw the report.

Mr. Tierney said, that in getting quit of the matter in this way, they were creating an irregularity in the journals. The entry should be made, and the grounds stated on which the resolution was withdrawn; otherwise it would appear, that the committee had given the sum to the royal duke, and that the house had afterwards refused it.

Lord Castlereagh suggested, that all inconvenience would be avoided by agreeing to the resolution, upon an understanding that it should not be carried into effect.

The resolution was then read, when Mr. M. A. Taylor again protested against it.

After a few words from Mr. W. Smith, Lord Castlereagh, and Mr. Tierney, the suggestion of the noble lord was adopted, and the house agreed to the resolution.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

No public business of any importance occurred.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, April 17.

Debtor and Creditor Law.] The following petition of Robert Christie Burton, was presented, ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed. "That the petitioner has heard, with more than ordinary surprise and indignation, of a most unjustifiable violation of truth, and a no less audacious indulgence in wilfully erroneous statements, on the part of one John Moxon, of Kingston-upon-Hull; and that the said John Moxon, in aggravation of this moral turpitude, has presumed to insult the house, by presenting through Sir Samuel Romilly, the said falsehoods in the shape of a petition, which has been so far successful as to be permitted to be laid upon, and to contaminate, the table of the house; that the petitioner most humbly prays to be heard in reply, and that he be permitted to destroy falsehood with truth, supported by the most honourable and respectable testimony on the part of disinterested persons; that the said John Moxon in his petition states, 'that a person possessed of five thousand a-year preferred living in gaol upon his rents, to paying his debts:' that the petitioner implores the attention of the house to the following particulars of his case, which he trusts will so far rebut the assertions of the said John Moxon, as to excite more than ordinary interest in the cause of truth; that the petitioner became security some years ago for the brother-in-law of the said John Moxon, named William Stocks Heaton, an attorney of Doncaster, for 1000*l.* by warrant of attorney, for which kindness on the part of the petitioner he never received one farthing, nor did the petitioner ever see the said John Moxon but once in his life, and on which security the petitioner paid one year's interest; that in the year 1812, the said John Moxon put an execution into the petitioner's house, at Hotham, near Beverley, in the county of York, which he shortly afterwards withdrew, on discovering that he had proceeded illegally, all the household property being that of the petitioner's wife, and regularly incorporated and scheduled in the marriage settlement, under the appraisement of three brokers, previous to the marriage, and thus failed in his first hostile attempt; that the petitioner has been upwards of five years in prison, at the suit of the said John Moxon, and most humbly trusts that the house will sympathise with him, as a gentleman, if his feelings under such circumstances would never permit him to consider the said John Moxon as otherwise than an oppressive, malignant, and unjust character; that after being a prisoner for a short time in the rules of the King's Bench Prison, for which indulgence the petitioner paid Mr. Jones the marshal of the said prison, 161*l.* and 40*l.* to his the said marshal's clerk, before he could obtain them, he was deprived of the object of it by the machinations of the said John Moxon, who brought an action against the said marshal for the amount of the sum, for which the petitioner was charged in execution at the suit of the said John Moxon, alleging that he was at Doncaster the January preceding, when it was proved that it was the petitioner's brother, whereby the said marshal was released from the action, and the said John Moxon had to pay the costs of the suit; that the petitioner has lost all the benefits, both of the rules, and the sum of 201*l.* paid for the same, and is in the predicament of one who may have paid 201*l.* to be more distressingly incarcerated; that the petitioner, so far from refusing to give up his property, actually caused deeds to be prepared at an enormous expense, for the purpose of conveying over estates for the benefit of his creditors, comprising not only the whole of his estates in possession in Yorkshire, but also estates of immense value in reversion in Canada, which facts can be verified by agents, and by the production of the deeds which are still in existence; but what will the house think of the veracity of the said John Moxon, when the petitioner most humbly but most emphatically declares, that he the said John Moxon refused to sign these documents, which authorized the conveyance of the petitioner's property to the control of trustees, for the purpose of paying the whole of his debts by half-yearly instalments, with interest, and who has now the audacity and wickedness to present himself to the house, and declare that the petitioner prefers living in a gaol to paying his debts? That the petitioner stands indebted to the said John Moxon for a still more serious injury, an interminable affliction, the loss of an affectionate wife and considerable property, who, on discovering that the petitioner was deprived of his liberty, driven from his home, and consigned to all the horrors of the interior of a court prison, where neither her health, feelings, or nerves, would permit her to accompany him, the shock produced despondency, and she soon afterwards paid the debt of nature; could the said John Moxon feel like a man, would he now add insult to injury, and falsehood to oppression? That the said John Moxon has, in defiance of the sacred laws of fair truth, soiled a skin of parchment with statements controvertible by numberless persons now living, and documents still in preservation; that the petitioner has been remunerated by the basest ingratitude instead of friendship, for having rescued the brother-in-law of the said John Moxon from those horrors to which he has consigned the petitioner for so many years; that the petitioner declares to the house, upon his honour as a gentleman, that he has repeatedly made propositions to his creditors without effect; and the petitioner most solemnly declares, that during the whole period of his imprisonment he never was at any watering-place, and that the assertions of the said John Moxon are totally groundless, he the petitioner never having been at Brighton in the course of his life; that the petitioner has often heard the aiders and abettors of the said John Moxon declaim against the house, and contend that there ought to exist a compulsory law for the seizure of property of every description, and the abolition of all privileges, regardless of hereditary property and the doctrine of primogenitorship; and the admirers of the said John Moxon are of that cast who inculcate the opinion, that, if distinction be tolerated, no privileges shall attach; and so merciless are they, that they are not satisfied with having detached a man from all domestic happiness, blighted all his future views in life, destroyed his health, his reputation, and his peace, but, after a long series of incarceration, and loss of every advantage resulting from the blessings of liberty, that a debtor shall eventually pay the pound of flesh; that the petitioner solemnly declares that he considers the petition of the said John Moxon the result of malignity and spite, and therefore most humbly, most earnestly, and with the utmost deference, prays that the petition of the said John Moxon be dismissed, and that the petitioner be permitted to prove, at the bar of the house, the truth of the foregoing allegations."

LUNATIC ASYLUMS (SCOTLAND) BILL.] A petition of noblemen, freeholders, and others, of Kincardine, against this bill, was presented, and ordered to lie on the table.

COPYRIGHT BILL.] Mr. Lambton presented the following petition of John Rodwell and John Martin, of Bond Street, London. "That the petitioners are booksellers and publishers, and frequently purchase the copyright of various works at a considerable price; and that, in common with all other publishers, they have severely felt the burthen of an act of parliament passed in the 54th year of his present Majesty, compelling the gratuitous delivery of every new publication to various public institutions, amounting in the whole to eleven copies, in addition to one which, by another act of parliament, is required to be deposited with the printer of the work; that the compliance with such requisition has in many instances occasioned great positive loss to the petitioners, being, in the case of one work recently published by them, and entitled, 'Views in Italy,' not less than the sum of 70*l.* and in the publication of another work, by Sir William Gell and J. P. Gandy, architects, to describe and illustrate the ruins of Pompeii, amounting to the sum of 50*l.*, and making, upon the whole, a very serious annual drawback from the fair profits of the petitioners' trade; that the loss occasioned by such compulsory supply must necessarily fall either upon the publisher or author of every work; in the former case it is an exclusive, and (as can be proved) a very burthensome tax upon the profits of the petitioners' particular branch of trade, in addition to those which they already bear in common with their fellow subjects, and besides the tax upon paper and the duty on advertisements, whereby their business is greatly affected, and upon which a very considerable revenue accrues to the country; but where it falls upon the author of a work, it becomes a severe tax upon the produce of intellectual exertion, and to the extent of its operation its tendency must be to restrain the advancement of literature and impede the progress of knowledge, in fact, such can be proved to have been already its actual effects and consequences in several instances, it having been the sole cause of preventing the publication of many interesting and valuable works, that would have proved beneficial to literature and honourable to our age and country; that the petitioners have recently agreed with Edward Dodwell, Esquire, for the purchase of drawings and designs, with observations and remarks, illustrating the antiquities of Athens and Ancient Greece, which that gentleman has made and collected at a very great expense during a long residence in Turkey, and with the assistance of the most eminent artists; that the cost of purchasing and the expenses of publishing such a work are so great, that the eleven copies required by the act to be supplied will be an absolute charge upon the petitioners of nearly 300*l.* independent of such gratuitous supply diminishing the number of those who might reasonably be expected to become purchasers; the petitioners are in fact hesitating between the prudence of incurring such an expense, or the alternative of publishing these splendid engravings unaccompanied by the letter-press that should explain and illustrate them; the petitioners will no further observe upon the interest and importance of this work, in a national point of view, than by remarking, that such was the opinion of the French government as to its merits and value, that the very heavy duty legally payable thereon, upon its entrance into their territory, was ordered to be remitted to Mr. Dodwell, who was pressed to publish the same in Paris, under the sanction of government, upon very advantageous terms, and free from the burthensome claim of any national institutions upon the profits of his labour or talent; the petitioners, therefore, most respectfully pray the house to take the foregoing facts into their gracious consideration, and to grant such relief in the premises to the petitioners and publishers in general, as to their wisdom shall seem fit; but, if it should be deemed beneficial to the interests of literature that certain institutions should be made depositaries of every publication of merit, the petitioners humbly submit it to the consideration of the house, that it would, in every point of view, be fair and reasonable that such public bodies should be required to pay a moiety of the price of those books it may be desirable for them to possess, which would be a considerable relief to the petitioners, and others of the same trade, and but a trifling object of expense to the respective institutions; it would, moreover, render them more discriminate and less vexatious than they have been in their requisition of books, by limiting their demand to such alone as had merit or usefulness to recommend them, and would prevent the abuse, destruction, and improper disposal of them, which it can be shewn too frequently takes place under the present system."

On the question that the petition do lie on the table,

Mr. Plunkett observed, that the petitioners had stated, that, by one work, they should lose 70*l.* and by another 300*l.*; but the house should bear in mind, that though that might be the price at which the works were sold, yet it could not be supposed that they cost the publishers the same sum. The only loss in the case was that of the price of the paper on which the additional eleven copies were printed. The booksellers had only to print those eleven copies beyond the number necessary for the public demand.

Mr. Lambton said, that when a publisher was called upon to give away eleven copies of each work, he was certainly injured to the value of those copies, be it 70*l.* or 300*l.* as he might have disposed of them in the usual course of trade.

Sir E. Brydges said, that the loss could be exactly explained. Suppose a bookseller intended to print 250 copies of a work for sale, he would be obliged to print eleven copies more for the universities. Now, by a regulation of the trade, the printing of those eleven additional copies would cost as much as if 250 copies more had been printed.

Mr. Plunkett remarked, that this loss, if any, was caused by an arbitrary law among the booksellers themselves, and if they consented to such a law, they ought to abide by the loss it occasioned. It was for them to repeal this regulation, and not to call upon the house to repeal a law of long standing and useful operation.

Sir E. Brydges replied, that the publishers had nothing to do with this rule; it belonged to the printers, and until the legislature adopted a rule to control and alter the existing rates of wages, the arrangement complained of must be acted upon.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

Sir E. Brydges then moved the order of the day for the second reading of the copy-right bill.

Mr. Wynn recommended, that the subject should be referred to a committee up stairs, who could resort to all the practical information which some gentlemen appeared to wish for.

Mr. Croker thought that this would be the better course, and, upon that understanding, the bill might now be read a second time, pro forma.

Sir E. Brydges assented to this proposition.

Mr. Plunkett, as representing one of those bodies which were interested in the continuance of the law as it stood, desired to enter his protest against the bill. Previous to the Union, Ireland was not affected by the act of Anne. Before that time, all the books which were published in England might be reprinted in that country; and so extensive was the trade of re-printing, that most of the literature of England found its way to the United States from Ireland. In 1802, this valuable trade was given up, and all that Ireland had obtained for it was, two copies of each book for two public bodies in that country. Did the English booksellers, then, wish to revert to the former plan? He conceived that they knew their own interest better; but if this bill was suffered to pass, the printers of Ireland ought to be placed in statu quo.

Mr. Peel objected to the principle of the bill, and expressed his determination to oppose it in every stage. He suggested, however, the propriety of postponing the second reading for a fortnight, to enable the committee up stairs to sit and report.

Dr. Phillimore approved of the appointment of a committee.

Mr. Wynn said, that, in point of form, the proper time for having a committee up stairs would be between the second reading of the bill and its committal in the house. With respect to what had fallen from his hon. and learned friend, the member for the university of Dublin, he begged to observe, that when the trade of reprinting existed in Ireland, there were no greater sufferers by it than the enlightened natives of that country who had contributed their portion to the literature of this side of the water. If he recollected right, no persons had lost more by that privilege than Mr. Burke and Dr. Goldsmith, and, therefore, he thought that Ireland had gained as much as England by the act of Anne. He had no doubt that, when the subject was duly considered, an equitable arrangement might be made between the publishers and the universities.

Lord Palmerston protested against the principle of the bill, and wished the subject to be sent at once to a committee up stairs.

Sir J. Newport said, that previously to the Union, it was no more a piratical act to reprint in Ireland books that had been printed in England, than it would be in an English bookseller to reprint in England works that had been printed in France.

Sir W. Scott objected to the principle of the bill, but gave his assent to a select committee.

Mr. Smyth thought, that the second reading should be postponed till the committee had made their report.

Lord Castlereagh hoped, that the hon. baronet would allow the second reading to stand over, as it seemed to be the wish of the house.

Sir E. Brydges said, he could not consent to postpone the second reading, but he should be happy to comply with the sense of the house, by referring the subject to a committee up stairs. He fully agreed with those hon. gentlemen who had stated, that the matter had never been sufficiently understood; and he was convinced that the moment it was understood, the evil would be admitted, and a remedy applied.

Sir S. Romilly could not conceive what objection there could be to the course proposed by the hon. baronet. Nothing was more common than that a bill should be read a second time pro forma, and for members to reserve their opinions as to its principle till the question for the Speaker leaving the chair. He approved of the principle of the bill, considering the existing system a heavy tax on literature.

Mr. J. P. Grant said, he disapproved of the bill, but he had no objection to a second reading pro forma.

Mr. Peel said, the second reading might take place now on a distinct understanding that it should not be inferred that the principle of the bill was agreed to.

The bill was then read a second time, and ordered to be committed on the 27th of April.

Mr. Wynn gave notice, that, on Monday, he would move for a select committee to consider the copyright acts.

PROCEEDINGS AT CAPE BRETON.] Mr. Bennet said, he held in his hand a petition to which he begged to call the most serious attention of the house. It was from Mr. Gibbons, a respectable gentleman in the island of Cape Breton, who had long filled the office of attorney-general there. He complained of most improper conduct on the part of the governor and chief justice. The governor of this island was that governor Ainslie of whom the house had already heard so much, and who, after the most atrocious conduct in the island of Dominique, had been placed by his Majesty's ministers in the situation which he now filled. Governor Ainslie's conduct in the island of Cape Breton did not equal his conduct in the island of Dominique—he had indeed been guilty of but a small part of the enormous acts committed by him in Dominique—he had not decorated the coast of Cape Breton with human heads as he had done that of Dominique—(hear, hear, hear!) But, notwithstanding he had not been guilty of those enormities, he had conducted himself in the most inhuman manner. He did not speak of the indecent and immoral life he led, and the example he set to the people over whom he was placed; he wished to confine himself to his public conduct. It was a matter of no uncommon occurrence for governor Ainslie, when natives of the island waited upon him with a view of soliciting explanation respecting any public measure, to take them by the collar and kick them down stairs (hear, hear, and a laugh). This indecent conduct he had practised on more than one occasion. Of the conduct of the chief justice it was not his intention to say more than this, that in private he led the same life as the governor did, and that his public conduct was worthy of such a governor. It was his intention to move for several papers connected with the transactions in Cape Breton. He felt a conviction, from the documents already laid before him, that these two persons, the chief justice and the governor, were utterly unfit for the situations they held.

Mr. Goulburn thought, that if any man had heard the question which the hon. gentleman put to him the other night, he would have been as astonished as he himself was at what he had just heard. The hon. gentleman had asked, whether government had not an intention of establishing a separate legislature for the island of Cape Breton: and if they had, what was the description of that legislature, as he was anxious for information on that subject, on account of a petition connected with it, which had been sent to him. He, therefore, put it to the house, whether, from the question of the hon. gentleman with respect to a separate legislature, he could have been prepared to expect a crimination of the governor and chief justice of Cape Breton? It was impossible for him, therefore, to answer the charges made by the hon. gentleman, in any other than such a general manner as could neither be satisfactory to the house nor to himself. Another extraordinary circumstance in the speech of the hon. gentleman was, that having announced his intention to move for papers, being ignorant whether those papers would be conceded or refused, and possessing no other information than that which he had received from the individual from whom he presented the petition, he had come down and made a charge of a most fearful nature against two individuals in high situations. He had heard of Mr. Gibbons's complaints, but he was not aware that Mr. Gibbons had ever made any complaint against governor Ainslie. He knew of his complaints against his predecessors, but he knew of none against governor Ainslie. If that gentleman was desirous of attaining his ends, he ought to have brought his complaint, in the first instance, before the proper tribunal. He had complained of certain duties imposed by the local authorities, and those were subsequently declared invalid by the chief justice, who, in that instance, at least, shewed no disposition to court the favour of the governor, with whose concurrence the regulations were entered into.

The petition was read, ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed. It was as follows:—

"That the petitioner is possessed, in fee simple, of several tracts of land in the island of Cape Breton, some of which he holds in his own and some in right of his wife, under grants from the crown to the original grantees; that the petitioner begs leave most respectfully to state to the house, that without previous notice, or his consent and concurrence having been obtained, or the slightest indemnification offered, he has been arbitrarily and illegally disseised of part of his said lands, in virtue of orders made by the colonial council of that island, who have not only thus assumed the greatest legislative power, but have oppressively invaded the highest and most sacred property of the subject, and also, at the same time, as a concurrent consequence, have arrogated to themselves the alarming judicial one of revoking, by their own authority, the king's grants, solemnly made under the great seal; that, at the time of issuing those orders, affecting the rights, liberties, and properties of the subject, that have been sanctioned and acted upon under major general Swayne, colonel Fitzherbert, and lieutenant governor Ainslie, no legal colonial council actually existed, of the number and qualifications required by his Majesty's commission and instructions to the governor in chief of Cape Breton, which explicitly and positively forbid the augmentation or diminution of that body, as specifically therein constituted; and, with all due deference, the petitioner is induced to believe the disobedience of that regulation has, in a great degree, facilitated the exercise of those acts of injustice, of which he complains; that he most humbly conceives, that from the period when his Majesty was pleased to require a provincial general assembly to be convened, for the purpose of making local laws, statutes, and ordinances, in that island, no legislative power could be exercised by the governor and colonial council, unless assembled in general assembly, and the taxation of real and personal property that has been and is still inforced under this authority, is not merely a violation of that constitutional law, clearly defined and solemnly declared on many occasions in the British courts, but is in direct contravention of his Majesty's instructions to the governors of that colony; that the petitioner begs permission to add, that major general Swayne, while exercising the government in Cape Breton, by his own authority, directed what he was pleased to term a military road to be opened through the most valuable part of the petitioner's land: and with such arbitrary violence was this order carried into effect, that his aid-de-camp ordered the fences and inclosures thereon (if found in the way) to be thrown down, burnt, and destroyed; that the petitioner received from major general Swayne no previous intimation of his intended invasion and seizure of his property, or offer of the smallest compensation; neither has the petitioner, or any other person having lawful authority, directly or indirectly, given the most distant sanction to this measure of unnecessary and unjustifiable aggression; that he has also to complain to the house of acts of similar violence, supported and countenanced by lieutenant governor Ainslie, that have been recently perpetrated on other lands belonging to the petitioner, and on which he now resides; that he presumes respectfully to represent to the house, that he should have sought redress for those, and many other injuries he has sustained in his personal property and reputation, by an appeal to the supreme and only court of judicature in Cape Breton, empowered to hear and determine such causes of action, but for the following reasons, which he confidently trusts will be deemed by the house conclusive and satisfactory: first, that the honourable Archibald Charles Dodd, chief justice and only judge in the supreme court, and president of the colonial council, from partial and interested motives, did, with very few exceptions, suggest, prepare, and procure to be passed, all those orders that more immediately militate against the constitutional laws of England, and the liberties and properties of the subject, as pledged and secured to the colony by his Majesty; secondly, that although in an action commenced by the collector of the provincial revenue, against the son-in-law of the said chief justice, for money due under an ordinance he had very recently advised major-general Swayne to revive (notwithstanding it had been previously voted by the council unlawful and oppressive), he, in November Term, 1816, adjudged this order (as being a tax) not binding on the people, but soon discovering this decision had given great dissatisfaction to lieutenant-governor Ainslie, he shortly after advised the magistrates to enforce other ordinances, imposing a general tax upon the inhabitants by compulsive means, but refused himself to comply when required by the proper officer; however, a few days after that refusal, he again, publicly in open court, announced the legality of those orders, and in his ardent zeal to please, in March Term, 1817, went so far as to stigmatize those who doubted their validity as evil disposed or disaffected persons; thirdly, that the said chief justice has assumed to himself the arbitrary, unconstitutional, partial, and dangerous discretionary authority, of extra-judicially refusing to allow any person the necessary privilege of commencing or instituting any action in the supreme court, until his permission was first solicited and obtained, and the petitioner was accordingly refused, not having sued for such permission; the petitioner feels he should have been guilty of a dereliction and serious violation of duty to himself and others, could he even for a moment have supposed such permission would not have been withheld from him, to have submitted to, and sanctioned, this tyrannical assumption of unauthorized power, as he humbly conceives the said chief justice had no option to refuse or grant this inherent and immutable right to the meanest subject of the realm; and the petitioner begs leave to add, that it appears to him this doctrine is subversive of the constitution, and against all manner of forms, principles, practices, and rules of law, equity, and justice, as rendering the tenure on which the security of our persons, properties, and reputations, are held, uncertain, and solely at the discretion and capricious will and pleasure of one man; that the petitioner thus deprived of his birth-right, and stripped of his property and privileges as a British subject, appealed to lieutenant-governor Ainslie, his Majesty's representative in that island, for justice, protection and support; but this he was pleased peremptorily to refuse, unless, as the lieutenant-governor informed the petitioner, lord Bathurst, to whom he had referred the petitioner's complaint, should determine that the petitioner might be permitted to enjoy and receive the protection of the laws of his country; and the petitioner humbly and respectfully implores that the house will be pleased to direct that an early inquiry be made, and restore and secure to him those rights, of which he has been so unjustly deprived, and grant to him such further relief in the premises as to the wisdom and justice of the house shall seem meet."

Marriages of the Royal Dukes.] The report of the committee on the Prince Regent's message was brought up. On the motion for the second reading of the resolution for an additional grant of 6000*l.* a year to the duke of Cambridge,

Mr. Lambton said, he had intended to make some observations on the subject of the grants to the royal dukes, but he would not press them on the house.

The resolution was then agreed to.

On the second reading of the resolution for granting 6000*l.* a year to the duchess of Cumberland,

Earl Gower said, he had every reason to believe that it would give satisfaction to the house to know, that her royal highness the duchess of Cumberland had determined to accept the provision which the house had been pleased to make for her. The first impression on the mind of her royal highness was, that although it was impossible for her not to feel a grateful sense of the kindness of the house, yet from delicacy she ought not to accept of the provision, lest, by concurring in any measure of that nature, she might appear to be separating her own interests from those of her husband. But, as it was the anxious desire of his royal highness the duke of Cumberland, that whatever might happen to him her royal highness should be amply provided for, she had made to the wish of the duke a sacrifice of that feeling to which he had alluded. Her royal highness, while she had the highest sense of the kindness of the house, hoped and trusted that she might never become a burden on a people by whom she had been treated with so much generosity.

Lord Castlereagh said, that her royal highness had felt a repugnance to accepting the grant; but she had yielded to the entreaties and judgment of her husband. If it had been any thing directly advantageous to herself, she would not, perhaps, have accepted it; but as it was with reference to an event which she hoped would never occur, she had received it as a mark of the respect of the house.

Mr. Wynn said, that according to the ancient practice in cases of this kind, it would be proper that these grants should be charged on the hereditary revenue of the crown, instead of the consolidated fund, as was intended.

Lord Castlereagh said, that a proper arrangement would be made on that point.

Cotton Factories Bill.] Lord Stanley presented a petition from several cotton manufacturers, complaining of calumnious statements in a pamphlet, which had been carefully kept concealed from them, and had been put into the hands of such members only as were deemed favourable to the bill. The petitioners were anxious that the hon. baronet, by postponing his measure for some time, might give them an opportunity of vindicating their character.

Sir R. Peel said, that if the persons who published the pamphlet had erred, that had nothing to do with his bill.

Mr. Curwen thought that the publication had a good deal to do with the subject, as it occasioned a considerable impression on the minds of some. The object now was, to know whether the hon. baronet would agree to postpone his bill some time longer, or consent to the appointment of a committee up stairs for farther examination. The petitioners said, they could produce the opinions of different medical men in their favour, in contradiction to the assertions made. The measure proposed was one of great importance to manufacturers. If the house legislated respecting cotton manufacturers, they must be called upon, time after time, to do so with all other branches of trade. It was quite a new principle to legislate in this manner between parent and child. The whole body of manufacturers and labourers should have an opportunity of giving their opinions. It was possible that, in some cases, the hours of labour might be too long (hear, hear); but that was occasioned by the parties themselves. He might venture to add, that what had already been said on the subject would be enough to occasion any necessary remedy without the passing of the bill. (Hear.)

Mr. Brougham wished to call the attention of the house to the prayer of the petition, which requested the house to pause, and defer their proceedings, after discussions on the subject session after session, merely because some persons had drawn up a statement unfavourable to the petitioners. A similar attempt was made on Mr. Pitt, in 1804, respecting the slave trade, in consequence of some publication of which he could not say he approved; but Mr. Pitt said, that it might as well be requested that the house should suspend its proceedings, because a speech had been delivered which some one might think it necessary to answer.

Lord Lascelles said, he happened to know that this bill proceeded out of that evidence which had been clandestinely circulated. The evidence taken in 1816 had lain dormant till other evidence was circulated among members. If this system were to be permitted, of collecting clandestine information for the purpose of circulation, neither character nor property in the country would be safe.

Mr. W. Smith said, he did not know one member who had been operated on by any other evidence than that taken in the committee. He would forego every particle of evidence that was not taken by the committee, and contend, that there was more than enough to satisfy every member of the necessity for this bill. With respect to the persons accused of getting up surreptitious evidence, it ought to be borne in mind, that they could not have any interested motives, and that those whom they opposed were interested in their proceedings from beginning to end.

Mr. Phillips contended, that it was indecent for such a publication, containing such accusations, to be drawn up, and then circulated only among certain members, for a particular object, while it so grossly attacked individuals. The Manchester gentlemen who had signed this petition could not at first get a sight of the pamphlet: they applied to the printer at Manchester for a copy of it, on the 14th of April. The persons who had been accused were the parties who had been precluded from seeing the pamphlet. The petitioners begged that gentlemen would take sufficient time to examine into the real state of the manufactories, before they legislated on their management. Let the house be acquainted with all the facts, and not proceed in the dark. (Hear.)

Mr. F. Robinson expressed his wish that gentlemen could agree to postpone the discussion of the merits of the bill. The petition had given rise to a warmth of debate, however natural it might be, which was not favourable to a fair consideration.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

The house then resolved itself into a committee on the bill. On that clause being read which limited the hours of labour for children under sixteen years of age, to twelve hours and a half, including an hour and a half for meals.

Mr. Wilberforce said, he could not but admire the sensibility and feeling which had done so much for these poor children, but as he thought that children of nine years of age were unable to sustain labour as long as those of fourteen or sixteen years, he should propose, that there should be two classes, one containing those from nine to twelve, the other those from twelve to sixteen.

Sir R. Peel said, he was anxious to do what was practicable towards ameliorating the condition of these children, but he was afraid, that to make greater alterations than he had done would be very inconvenient to those that carried on the trade, and might injure the trade itself. He trusted, therefore, that the house would allow the bill to proceed with the clause as it stood at present.

Mr. Philips said, that he had, by a misconception of the course of proceeding, abstained from discussing the principle on the previous stage of the bill. To that principle he objected, but if it were sanctioned by the house, he should propose amendments which would render the details less objectionable. But, till that principle were sanctioned, he would not bring forward those amendments, and he should therefore reserve himself for the discussion on the report.

Lord Lascelles said, he believed the time for considering the principle of the bill was passed. It had been expected that he would oppose it, and he certainly thought it due to himself to state, that he had not done what he should have done. With regard to the bill itself, he did not consider it at all as it respected the interest of the spinners. The most proper mode, in his opinion, for coming fairly to a conclusion on the bill, would be to give an opportunity for those parties to be heard who had statements to make on the subject. He did expect that that would be done, for he thought it only justice to all concerned. Every parent was the natural guardian of his child. It was too much, perhaps, to take that guardianship out of the parent's hands, by the interference of that house. If a parent derived assistance to the amount of eight shillings from his child's labour, it might seem cruel and unjust to deprive him of it. This interference with free labour appeared to him the most objectionable circumstance connected with this measure; but his real wish was, that the parties accused should have an opportunity of justifying themselves. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. F. Robinson was sorry that the motion made by an hon. gentleman opposite had dropped, because there had yet been no discussion on the principle of this bill, although such a discussion was essential to the right understanding of the measure. He knew not, in the present shape of the question, how to come to any decision. Many gentlemen had left the house with an understanding that no discussion was to take place on the several clauses of the bill. If the discussion did not take place on the clause now read, which, in fact, involved the whole principle of the bill, he should move an amendment that the chairman leave the chair.

Mr. Wynn said, that if the chairman were now to leave the chair, it would put an end to the bill altogether; but if he were to report progress, and to ask leave to sit again, it would afford an opportunity of discussing the principle of the bill afterwards, on the question that the speaker leave the chair.

Mr. Robinson by no means wished to put an end to the bill, and, therefore, he adopted the amendment, that the chairman report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. Peel was unwilling to accede to the proposed delay, and principally because the bill, being of a popular nature and affecting the labouring classes, excited much interest out of doors. It was not desirable to protract a measure of such a description for many reasons, and chiefly because, in the present instance, a false idea might be entertained of the cause of delay. The objections to the bill were limited to the clause now read; for the objections to other clauses had been withdrawn. Any discussion upon the principle might, therefore, take place now on the reading of that clause. All those who had left the house might be presumed to be favourable to the bill.

Mr. W. Smith said, that as one of the friends of the bill, he had no objection to any arrangement which would ensure a full discussion, without compromising the object of the bill itself. But it appeared to him that objection to the principle of the bill, in reality, there was none. On the ground of principle, it was as much an interference with parental authority to say children should not work under five as to say they should not work under nine years of age, yet to some regulation on this subject no one objected. He could not see any reason why the bill should not go through a committee, but, if the opposers of the bill thought they thus lost any advantage, he had no objection to take the discussion on another stage.

Sir J. Newport thought the bill should now go through a committee, as he did not see what advantage the opposers of the bill would thus forego. They might discuss the principle on any subsequent stage, and he thought it expedient that a bill which affected, and consequently agitated, a large portion of the community, should suffer as little delay as possible.

Mr. Blackburn wished that the bill should be discussed in a full house, as it was a matter of great importance to the community, and especially to the county of Lancaster.

Mr. Huskisson regretted that a bill so important had been allowed to pass thus far without discussion. The objection to the principle must be first disposed of, and if that objection were unsuccessful, then, it would be of importance to alter the bill in a committee, in order to make it more acceptable to those interested in it. It seemed, therefore, necessary to have the bill recommitted. He lamented the delay, because the bill ought to be disposed of as soon as possible; but no substantial progress could be made to-day.

Lord Stanley said, he was no party to the delay of the discussion on the principle of the bill. He had understood the commitment to be only pro forma. His sole view had been to refer the subject to a committee up stairs. Much alteration was required in the bill. The limitation of hours was extremely improper and extremely injurious.

Mr. Peel said, there could be nothing more futile than these discussions on the course of proceeding. The hon. gentleman had some amendments to propose, by which he conceived the bill would be improved. Why could he not now propose those amendments, reserving to himself the right of opposing the principle hereafter?

Mr. Philips objected to the bill, because it would really injure those whom it pretended to benefit. The subject had occupied his mind for twenty-five years, and he was convinced that legislative interference would do more harm than good. The management of manufactories was gradually improving without such interference. He would offer no modification of the bill till it was decided whether there should be a bill at all. If there should be a bill, he would endeavour to make it as little mischievous as possible.

Sir T. Acland thought that any modifications or improvements might be now proposed, and the discussion on the principle could take place on the report. By this means the present discussion would not be lost. He considered it a great evil, and a great inconvenience, that discussions both on the principle and on the whole merits of a measure should take place on the presenting of petitions.

Mr. Canning said that, besides the friends of the bill and the opposers of the bill, there was another class in the house, and he was one of them, who were very desirous indeed to hear a discussion of this subject. He had hitherto heard nothing respecting this bill. This was not from inattention, but from aversion to discussions that arose on the presenting of petitions, a practice on which the hon. baronet had justly animadverted. Discussion consisted of argument, and of the warmth excited by argument. The discussions on petitions contained all the warmth, and had no argument. (A laugh.) If ever he came to the house without prejudice respecting any subject, it was with respect to this subject. The only prejudice he felt was, the conviction resulting from all speculations on political economy, in favour of non-interference in contracts between man and man. But that degree, not of prejudice, but of disinclination, was, by mere examination, he would not say, changed, but become the ground of much desire to hear discussion upon the subject. But the more he considered it, the more disposed he was for the discussion, and the more he expected a full discussion on the principle of the bill, before it should go through a committee, by those whose information and experience enabled them to understand all the parts of the question. He thought it improper to make amendments before the discussion of the principle, because they would be made at random, and without a fixed object. The subject was itself of a very delicate and complicated nature, and its consequences deserved much consideration. He did not say any thing decisive on the question; but it ought to be examined with great caution and coolness. The bill had, somehow or other, slipped from under them, without the necessary discussion, and it must therefore be brought back again to them.

The bill was then reported, and recommitted for Monday next.

IRISH MISCELLANEOUS SERVICES.] On the motion of Mr. Peel the house resolved itself into a committee of supply.

Mr. Peel then rose and observed, that in submitting the estimates for the Irish miscellaneous service, he did not think it necessary to enter into any details with regard to the various items of which they were composed. If any difference of opinion should be indicated upon any particular point, he should be willing to postpone for the present the grant to which it referred. It was not his intention to propose any but the ordinary votes, and of those there was but one case in which any addition was made. He had stated last year, that there was a reduction in the aggregate expenditure under this head of the public service, as compared with former years, of 123,000*l.*, and he had now to state that a farther decrease had been effected to the amount of 10,000*l.* He was not disposed to move for any additional sum to the charitable institutions in Ireland, because he had seen reason to entertain considerable doubts of their policy and utility. He feared that, whilst they collected in a particular spot a great mass of wretchedness, they had not the means of extending relief to the increased number of applicants who crowded to them under a false impression that there relief was certainly to be found. (Hear, hear.) It would be seen, that upon some particular items a diminution had taken place, whilst a very small comparative addition had been made. He should now conclude by moving his first resolution, "that a sum not exceeding 38,331*l.* British currency nett be granted to his Majesty, for defraying the expense of supporting the Protestant charter schools of Ireland, for one year, ending the 5th of January, 1819."

Sir J. Newport animadverted upon the amount of this sum, for the education of only 2430 children. Such a sum, well applied, would serve to educate a much greater number. But of this sum, no less than 7000*l.* was allowed for officers of the several institutions, namely, for masters, ushers, and catechists. To the grant for catechists he particularly objected; because he thought, where the clergy of the established church had, in many instances, so little to do, the parish rectors should act as catechists at those schools. He was free to confess, that the system upon which those schools were conducted had undergone considerable improvements, in consequence of the discussions which had taken place upon the subject since the Union; and among those improvements was the removal of the absurd regulation which excluded all the children of protestants. But still farther improvement was necessary; and he threw out those observations, not with any view to hostile opposition, but in the hope of extracting observations from others, and of directing the attention of the house to the subject.

Sir George Hill assured the hon. baronet that many improvements had been adopted, and others were in progress, in consequence of the recommendations of the commissioners who were appointed to inquire into the subject. There were 36 schools in the whole, and to each of them the office of a catechist or examiner was attached, the duties of that office being discharged by the curate of the parish.

Mr. Peel said, the committee should understand, that the sum in question was applicable to the clothing and maintenance, as well as to the education, of the children.

Mr. Grattan said, that these charter schools, in their original construction, were bad. The system, however, under the vigilance of public opinion, had been much improved. If the question was, whether protestant schools, under a principle of proselytism, ought to be supported by parliament, he should object to it, but as it was an old grant, improving in its operation, and capable, by being watched, of being rendered more beneficial, he should not oppose it.

The resolution was agreed to; after which the other usual annual grants for Ireland were put and carried, without discussion.

PARDONS UNDER THE GREAT SEAL BILL.] This bill was read a second time and ordered to be printed.

BRITISH MUSEUM—DR. BURNEY'S LIBRARY.] Mr. Bankes brought up the following report, which was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.—"The committee to whom the petition of the trustees of the British Museum, submitting to the house the propriety of purchasing the collection of the late Dr. Burney for the use of the public, was referred, have directed their attention, in the first place, to inquiring into the component parts or principal classes of literature, of which this library consists; secondly, into their value; and thirdly, as to the importance of purchasing the whole at the public charge for the purpose of adding it to the collection now existing in the British Museum, having ascertained that Dr. Burney's executor was unwilling to separate one portion from the rest, or to treat for the sale of the collection otherwise than as entire and undivided.—One of the large classes consists of manuscripts of classical and other ancient authors; among which that of Homer's Iliad, formerly belonging to Mr. Townley, holds the first place in the estimation of all the very competent judges who were examined by your committee; although not supposed to be older than the latter part of the thirteenth or beginning of the fourteenth century, it is considered as being of the earliest date of the MSS. of Homer's Iliad known to scholars, and may be rated as superior to any other which now exists, at least in England; it is also extremely rich in scholia, which have been hitherto but partially explored.—There are two copies of the series of Greek orators, probably written in the fourteenth or fifteenth centuries, of which that upon vellum was brought to this country by Mr. Cripps and Dr. Clarke, and is esteemed as extremely valuable; an account of the orations contained in it was drawn up by Dr. Raine, late master of the Charterhouse, and of the collations which he had made in comparing it with the Aldine edition.—This manuscript of the rhetoricians is indeed one of the most important manuscripts ever introduced into this country, because it supplies more lacunæ than any other manuscript; there is contained in it a portion of Isæus which has never been printed: there is only one printed oration of Lycurgus in existence, which is imperfect, and this manuscript completes it; there is also an oration of Dinarchus which may be completed from this manuscript. Among the rarer manuscripts in the collection, there are two beautiful copies of the Greek gospels, of the tenth and twelfth centuries. The Geography of Ptolemy is another of the finest MSS. enriched with maps, which although not older than the fifteenth century, yet, from the circumstance of all the other known copies of this work in the original language being in the collection of different public libraries abroad, the possession of this copy is rendered particularly desirable. There is likewise a valuable Latin manuscript of the comedies of Plautus, written in the fourteenth century, containing twenty plays; which is a much larger number than the copies already in the museum, or those in foreign libraries in general contain, most of which have only six or eight, and few, comparatively speaking, more than twelve plays. A beautiful and correct manuscript of Callimachus of the fifteenth century; a very fine copy of Pappus Alexandrinus' collection of Mathematical Treatises, of similar date; and a manuscript of the Asinus Aureus of Apuleius, an author of extreme rarity, deserve also particular notice. The whole number of manuscripts amounts to about 385, but those above mentioned are the most important and valuable.—Exclusive of the manuscripts already noticed, there is a very large number of memoranda and criticisms, in Dr. Burney's own hand, (exclusive of the Fragmenta Scenica Græca, and books with Dr. Burney's own notes;) three or four articles of which seem nearly prepared for the press. In this part of the collection, there are several small lexicons of the Greek dialects, with numerous remarks on ancient authors; the merit of which, though certainly considerable, can only be thoroughly appreciated by patient investigation.—There are also many original letters of Isaac Casaubon, who maintained an extensive correspondence with many of the learned men of his time, whose letters to Casaubon have never been published.—Among the printed books, the whole number of which is from 13,000 to 14,000 volumes, the most distinguished branch consists of the collection of Greek dramatic authors, which are arranged so as to present every diversity of text and commentary at one view; each play being bound up singly, and in so complete but expensive a manner, that it has occasioned the sacrifice of two copies of every edition, and in some instances of such editions as are very rare: the same arrangement has also been adopted with regard to Harpocration, and some of the Greek grammarians; and both the editions of and annotations upon Terentianus Maurus, are particularly copious and complete. It appears indeed that this collection contains the first edition of every Greek classic, and several of the scarcest among the Latins, and that the series of grammarians, lexicographers, and philological writers, in both languages, is unusually complete. The books are represented to be generally in good though not in what may be styled brilliant condition; the whole having been collected by Dr. Burney himself, from the different great libraries which have been of late years brought to sale, beginning chiefly with the Pinelli collection.—To enable the house to form an opinion upon this branch of the collection, your committee subjoin the words of one of the witnesses, whom they examined; who says, 'The great feature of this eminent scholar's library, is that part which relates to Greek literature, whether ancient or more recent. In this respect it is probably the most complete ever assembled by any man, as it comprises all the materials requisite for classical criticism. In Latin Classics, and in the criticism connected with Roman literature, it is not so copious as in the Greek; but nevertheless it contains a number of rare and valuable books, which would considerably enrich the stores deposited in the museum.'—The same witness, with reference to the collection of memoranda above alluded to, further says, 'The books with manuscript notes may be divided into three portions: first, those which have their margins more or less crowded with remarks, collations, &c. in the hand-writing of many very eminent scholars, viz. Bentley, Burmann, Casaubon, &c.; secondly, the books with manuscript notes by Dr. Burney. The greater portion of the books thus enriched, are the Greek tragedians and the ancient Greek lexicographers. To illustrate the Greek drama, and to add to the stores of the ancient lexicographers, Dr. Burney seems to have directed the greatest portion of his industry, and to any future edition these remarks and additions would prove a most interesting acquisition. Another important portion of this collection may be called the Variorum Collection; this is, perhaps, one of the most remarkable series of books in the whole library: in it, Dr. Burney has so brought together the comments and notes of many celebrated scholars upon several Greek, and particularly the dramatic writers, that at one view may be seen almost all that has been said in illustration of each author; it extends to about 800 volumes in folio and quarto. One portion of this remarkable collection consists of a regular series of 170 volumes, entitled Fragmenta Scenica Græca, which comprises all the remains of the Greek dramatists, in number not less than 300, wheresoever they could be traced."—The great copiousness of Dr. Burney's library in Greek literature, may be collected at once from the following comparative statement of the editions of several authors, in that collection and in the library of the British Museum.

Another and a very different branch of this collection comprises a numerous and rare series of Newspapers, from 1603 to the present time, amounting in the whole to 700 volumes, which is more ample than any other that is supposed to be extant. A large collection of between 300 and 400 volumes in quarto, containing materials for a History of the Stage, from 1660 to the present time, and particulars relating to the biography of actors, and persons connected with the stage, may be classed after these daily journals.—Dr. Burney's collection of Prints has been principally made with reference to this object, comprising the most complete series that probably exists of theatrical portraits; beginning in the latter part of queen Elizabeth's reign, which is the period of our earliest engravers of portraits, such as Geminie, Hogenburgh, Elstracke, and the three Passes, and continued to the present time. The number of these theatrical engravings is about 5000, many of which are bound together in ten volumes; besides these, there are about 2000 other engraved portraits, principally of authors, commentators, and other learned persons.—With respect to the value of the manuscripts, the Homer is rated by the different witnesses at from 600*l.* to 800*l.* and one of them supposed it might even reach so high a price as 1000*l.*; the Greek Rhetoricians are estimated at from 340*l.* to 500*l.*; the larger copy of the Greek Gospels at 200*l.*; the Geography of Ptolemy at 65*l.* and the copy of Plautus at 50*l.* One witness estimates the whole of the ancient manuscripts at upwards of 2500*l.*; and an eminent bookseller at 3000*l.* The set of newspapers, from the year 1603 to the present time, is valued at from 900 guineas to 1000.—The books with manuscript notes, together with Dr. Burney's Variorum Compilation, including the Fragmenta Scenica Græca, are estimated by one at 1000*l.* and by another as high as 1340*l.*; who likewise computes the materials for the History of the Stage at 140*l.*—The Prints are judged to be worth the sum of 450*l.*; and the bookseller above referred to, who has examined the whole (except the engravings) for the purpose of enabling the present proprietor to set a value upon them, estimates the printed books in the library at 9000*l.*, some other books in his study adjoining, and a great number of tracts, at 500*l.*; and the whole, exclusive of the prints, at 14,500*l.*—A considerable expense would necessarily attend the selling of this, or any other library by public auction, which usually amounts either to 15 or 17½ per cent. upon the gross produce of the sale; but your committee having questioned the last witness alluded to, Mr. Payne, found it to be his opinion that the net money price of the library in question, after deducting all expenses, might amount to 14,500*l.*—The persons examined by your committee, as being particularly competent to assist them in forming their judgment, have been, Henry Ellis, esq. the reverend Henry H. Baber, and Mr. Smith, from the British Museum; Richard Heber, esq. the reverend T. F. Dibdin, the reverend J. Cleaver Banks, Mr. Payne, and Mr. Evans; the substance of whose testimony, your committee have endeavoured to put the house in possession of.—The importance of acquiring for the British Museum, a library stored with such literary treasures as have been enumerated, is sufficiently apparent from what has been already stated; but it is obvious, that in purchasing the entire collection, much more will be bought than it will be necessary to retain; and that a considerable number of the printed books, being duplicates of those already in the British Museum, must be sold again; and that this cannot be done otherwise than at the expense of 17½ per cent. upon the produce of such sales, whatever the amount may be. It is also to be borne in mind, that even if the purchase should be completed without delay, these duplicates could not be sorted and examined, so as to bring them to sale in the course of the present session.—Your committee therefore suggest, that, for the ensuing year, the net amount of such sale (which may be estimated at from 3000*l.* to 4000*l.*) should so far be refunded to the public, as to go in diminution of the annual grant to the British Museum; and also, that, in consideration of so ample and costly an accession being made to the existing stock of books, it may be proper to suspend or reduce, for a time, the annual grant of 1000*l.* to the book fund, with the exception of such parts of that annual sum as are applied in subscriptions to works now in the progress of publication.—Upon the whole matter, your committee venture to recommend as the result of the best consideration which they have bestowed both upon the importance and just value of the entire collection, that the proprietor, being ready to dispose of it for the sum of 13,500*l.* it will be a very material addition to the public stock of literature, and purchased at a price which cannot be deemed unreasonable."

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, April 20.

PRIVATELY STEALING BILL.] This bill was brought up from the commons by Sir Samuel Romilly, and read a first time.

STATE OF THE CURRENCY.] The Earl of Lauderdale rose to move, that a committee be appointed to inquire into the state of the currency of the country. He said, he certainly did not proceed to the task he had undertaken without a sense of the difficulties which stood in his way, in calling upon their lordships to consider this question, as it was a subject to which many of their lordships had probably paid no particular attention, and on which they might, therefore, suppose he could not easily make himself understood; and because it was also a subject, with respect to which others of their lordships, having been disappointed in the results they expected, might think no accurate conclusion could be drawn; though, in fact, he could assert, that there was no question on which more certainty could be obtained. There was another difficulty arising from the nature of the subject itself, and which consisted in the propriety of entering into some minute details, with the view to a full explanation. On the other hand, he was aware that it was quite impossible to command attention to a speech founded chiefly on a dry detail of figures. When a much younger man than he now was, he recollected that the father of a noble lord who sat near him (the Marquis of Lansdowne) had advised him always to avoid, as far as possible, resorting to figures when he addressed a public assembly; and his own experience had since convinced him of the propriety of that advice. It would, therefore, be his study to engage their lordships' attention as little as possible to details of that sort. If he should fail in making any part of the subject sufficiently clear, he was confident that his noble friends who might follow him would amply supply the deficiency. When he first gave notice of the motion he was now about to submit to their lordships, it was his intention to have entered at considerable length into the state of the currency, with the view of demonstrating the necessity of immediately resorting to cash payments. In consequence of the gold coin having disappeared, he meant to have in particular recalled their lordships' attention to the state of the mint regulations, in order to shew, that though the Bank had reduced the quantity of their notes in circulation to the amount which circulated before the restriction took place, and that though the country banks had also limited their circulation to even a lower scale than before that period, still, under the present regulations of the mint, it would have been impossible for the Bank to have paid in specie. If he could have had any doubt on this subject before, he must have felt his opinion confirmed by the proceedings of ministers since notice of his motion had been given. He alluded to the declared intention of renewing the Bank restriction act, and the scheme for making country bankers deposit stock or exchequer bills for the notes they might issue under the value of 5*l.* With the knowledge of these proceedings before the house, it would be impossible for their lordships, if they did not mean to desert their duty to the public, to refrain from inquiring into the important subject he now wished to bring immediately under their consideration. In doing this he should find it necessary, in the first place, to consider how far it was necessary that the Bank restriction act should be renewed and continued for another year. He was prepared to shew, that the reasons which had been assigned for its renewal were unfounded; that the Bank might have returned to payments in specie, were it not for the departure which had been made from that ancient system on which the superiority of this country with respect to currency was formerly founded; and that, though the Bank had taken every step which might otherwise have been necessary, it would have been perfectly impossible, under the present mint regulations, to resume cash payments. With regard to the reasons assigned for continuing the restriction, he was never more surprised than when he heard foreign loans stated as the principal, or indeed, almost the sole reason, coupled with the assertion that there was nothing in the internal situation of the country that rendered the measure necessary. He should, however, shew that the only reason was, the internal situation of the country, created as it was by the measures of ministers. But here he could not help asking their lordships to consider in what situation this country was placed when this great question—one of the most important which a legislature could be called upon to decide—was no longer to be left to the judgment of parliament, but was made to depend on the caprice of foreign powers? Was it to be henceforth a maxim, that when the Emperor of Austria, the King of Prussia, or the legislative assemblies of France chose to undertake certain financial operations, the Bank of England must suspend payments in cash? Were this to be maintained, there would be an end of the power of the British parliament with respect to one of the most important objects of legislation, and no hope could be entertained of the restoration of that solid system of currency on which the commerce and wealth of the British empire had been founded. Fortunately, however, the proposition could not be maintained, for it had no foundation in truth. In the first place, he denied the fact that foreign loans ever had or could have the effect which had been attributed to them. He knew that endeavours had been made to support the opinion he opposed, by reference to the opinion expressed by the Bank directors, with respect to a proposed loan, in 1797, of 3,000,000*l.* to the Emperor. They expressed an apprehension of injurious consequences if that loan were to be negotiated; but would the noble lord opposite venture to say that any loan had been the cause of the Bank restriction? To be satisfied on this point, their lordships had only to look at the evidence taken before the committee appointed to inquire into the facts. They would find, from the examination of the Bank directors, that the gold transmitted to Austria, in consequence of the loan of 1795, did not exceed 500,000*l.* Indeed, if their lordships took the trouble of examining the state of the exchanges at that time, they would find that it was perfectly impossible that gold could have been sent to Hamburgh without loss. This was clear from the evidence of Mr. Boyd. It could not be sent out without loss, when the exchange was at 34 par. It might be sent at 2½ usance, with the exchange at 33.6; because then, in consequence of the interest, there would be a profit on the transaction; but an examination of the tables would shew that this favourable case for its exportation did not occur. Indeed, a report which was drawn up, he believed, by the father of the noble lord opposite, proved, that during the two years in which the imperial loans had been negotiated, and large subsidies were paid, the remittances had not been made in cash, but in goods. It appeared that, in those years, the exports to Germany amounted to 8,000,000*l.*, though usually they did not exceed 1,900,000*l.* It appeared also, that those exports equalled all those that were in the same time made to France, Flanders, and

Holland. Thus it was evident, that if their lordships considered what had been the effect of the loans and subsidies of 1794 and 1795, they would find, that the remittances had been made almost entirely in goods, and not in bullion. Was it possible, then, that the noble earl opposite could allege the loans now negotiating to be a reason for continuing the restriction, on the ground that it had been originally caused by the imperial loan? Nothing was more evident than that that loan had nothing to do with the measure. But if their lordships wished to know what had been the real cause of the restriction, they had only to look at the evidence of Mr. Giles and Mr. Bosanquet. Those gentlemen distinctly stated, that if all the advances made by the Bank to government had been repaid, there would have been no occasion whatever to have resorted to that measure. Were their lordships, then, to believe that the cause was a different one from that which the Bank directors at the time, who were acquainted with all the circumstances, declared it to be? They certainly were best acquainted with the real cause. In 1797, the Bank directors appeared to have imagined that the restriction act would be allowed to expire, and that they would have to return in the following year to payments in specie. The directors did not then affect to make their operations depend upon foreign loans, but made proper arrangements for the event they expected. There was a meeting at the Bank in October, in which the state of the advances to government was taken into consideration. The advances to government had amounted to 11,280,000*l*., but they were then found to be reduced to 4,278,000*l*.; so that the Bank, in the expectation of being obliged to pay their notes in cash, had compelled government, so early as the month of October, 1797, to pay up about 7 millions. Having said this much, he might safely stop here, and ask their lordships to reject any argument for the continuation of the restriction founded on foreign loans; but he wished to state some considerations which would render the matter still more convincing. And here he would venture to state, as an indisputable proposition, that that man must be ignorant to a degree which would be disgraceful who believed it possible that this country would be drained of its specie if the Bank paid its notes, though all the powers in Europe were making loans, and all these loans were negotiated in England. He had stated this proposition in the broadest manner, and nothing was ever more capable of proof. It was not in gold alone that remittances were made by one country to another. In every well regulated commercial country it was fit that there should be circulation, consisting both of paper and of specie; but the paper always payable on demand, and the coinage established on just principles. When a great trading country stood in this situation with respect to its currency, it was perfectly impossible that it could be exhausted of its specie. This was no new opinion of his; he had published it several years ago, and it had never yet been refuted. In truth, it was very obvious, that there were two ways of making remittances from one country to another—in commodities or in money. Now, as merchants would always make remittances in the articles which were most advantageous to their own interests, it followed that the foreign loans which had been so much dwelt on could not have sent any money out of the country, or to a very small extent. The security against a country being drained of specie was complete. If the merchants remitted cash to foreign countries, they would raise the price of commodities, and they never sent out gold when it was their interest to send goods. It was true they might glut the foreign market with goods, and thus cause a depreciation of value there; but the demand for gold could only be temporary, and it was impossible the country could be exhausted of that specie, which formed part of its currency, if its coinage were well regulated. It was difficult to convey these doctrines in a speech, and he would rather state them from print. Here his lordship read a long extract from a work which he published in 1812, and in which the principles stated in his speech were enforced. He shewed, that gold would never be sent out of a country, except when there was a want of such commodities, the exportation of which, joined to the state of the exchange, would afford a profit to the merchant. Their lordships would perceive that, in the year 1812, he had fully discussed the question now at issue; and the conclusion was evident, that a country could not be drained of its coin which had commodities of its growth and produce to export. Such a state of things could only occur in consequence of issues of paper raising the value of the gold. He believed he had now proved, that the reason assigned for the continuance of the Bank restriction was totally unfounded. The real reason was, the advances made by the Bank, and the increased circulation of notes. He found, from the accounts laid before the house, that there had recently been an increase of 2,000,000*l*. in the issues of the Bank, and the discounts of the Bank could not be estimated at less than 1,000,000*l*. The average issues of the Bank amounted on the whole to 29,000,000*l*. This state of things plainly shewed that the Bank had made no progress towards diminution, and that of course payments in specie could not be expected. What the sum total of the advances made by the Bank to government might be, he could not pretend to say, as the account he moved for with the view of ascertaining that sum had been refused. The Bank held exchequer bills and other government securities, purchased in the market, to a great extent; but all such purchases, he would maintain, were illegal, according to the act of William III. The noble earl opposite might seem surprised at this, but such was the fact, and by his refusal to grant the information demanded, and the continuance of the restriction, he screened the Bank in an illegal practice. Here his lordship referred to the act of the 5th William III., which, he contended, the Bank violated in the purchase of exchequer-bills. The act provided, that treble the value of any advances made by anticipation on lands or revenues of the Crown should be forfeited. Every advance made by the Bank, which was not sanctioned by parliament, was, in consequence of this act of William III., illegal. In 1793 ministers were aware of the effect of this act with respect to treasury bills, and a clause was accordingly smuggled into an act passed at that time. But exchequer bills were precisely in the same situation. The clause in the act of 33 Geo. III. was framed expressly to authorize the Bank to hold these bills, which were not especially charged upon any part of the public revenue. This plainly evinced what had been the feeling both of the Bank directors and of the ministers on the subject. This clearly shewed that the clause in question extended to loans on exchequer-bills; he was, therefore, surprised at the appearance of doubt put on by the noble lord with regard to this subject, and at his refusing, on principle, to shew what securities on government the Bank had. His object was to see whether the Bank issues were conducted in that salutary manner as to enable them at any time to be called in in six weeks. But he believed that the Bank had not sufficient left in their coffers to effect such an operation. What with the 29,000,000*l*. of paper that had been issued and was in circulation, what with the loans to government in addition, was there any body who did not think that the coin requisite for resuming cash-payments must be more than double the amount of the 11,000,000*l*. that had been so confidently stated as the sum? And yet, according to the noble lord, the Bank was perfectly ready to pay! The government was anxious that payments should be resumed. But on his conscience he believed, that those payments were at a greater distance than ever: the whole business was a complete juggle between the Bank and the government, and the country was completely their dupe. (Hear, hear, hear.) In fact, the Bank had the complete regulation of the price of commodities. However, it was his object merely to persuade their lordships, that foreign loans could not affect the question of the resumption of cash-payments, or that the Bank was incapable of resuming them; but, at least, that their lordships would not take these or any other points for granted, without considering it their duty to make a full inquiry into all the circumstances of the case. He must now proceed to call their lordships' attention to a second device resorted to by government for the support of this system, and a proposition it was of a most extensive and important nature. It seemed, that country bank-notes of one pound were not to be circulated unless the bankers deposited a security with government to a certain amount. He begged to be allowed to say, that this scheme was contrary to the whole spirit of the commercial laws of this country: those laws required no other security than the promise to pay, and the power to demand the fulfilment of that promise. When, however, he recollected that, on government pledging the Bank to pay in July, his prediction that no such payment would then take place was treated with derision, could he or any other man suppose that government would let the Bank pay next year? But he would contend, that the securities proposed were wholly unnecessary, and that people wished for no better securities than bank-paper, payable on demand. Restore to them their ancient system, and they would have no occasion for this. He therefore thought, that the restriction would be continued for more than a year from the 5th of July; but whether that should be so or not, the proposition respecting securities was, in itself, of the most objectionable nature. This country was the most opulent in Europe, and had gradually risen through the whole of the last century to its present state of prosperity by means of banks of credit. Consult authors of any credit on the subject, and they would tell you why monetary banks of deposit were not so good as banks of credit. Our system was founded, and had risen to eminence, entirely on credit: when honour, probity, and regularity were the foundation of credit, it was altogether inexhaustible; because, in proportion as extended commerce created an extended demand, the state of credit would increase along with it; and if commerce slackened, credit would decline proportionably; but under the system of banks of deposit, credit always failed most when there was the greatest demand for it. His objections, therefore, went to the whole proposition of the noble lord. What was it but an arbitrary interference of parliament, in order to favour creditors of a particular class? Did not the noble lord, in fact, say, that he wished to annihilate country notes under the value of 5*l*.? If so, this was to cast a stigma on those who uttered them, and nobody would trust a stigmatized man. Credit depended on confidence; and if there was a stigma, how could there be any confidence? The effect of the plan was only to make the country bankers a sacrifice to the Bank of England, the favoured Bank of England! The scheme proposed was bad in theory, and equally bad in practice. He did not believe that bankers of any character would submit to this indignity; especially as, under the plan proposed of issuing stock-notes, any stockholder might, on paying 30*l*., dispose of his stock bills as a banker, and make a double profit. Much as he had objected to the evils arising out of the paper system, the remedies proposed were so suspicious, that he could not forbear laying them before their lordships. Their lordships, he was sure, could not give up that system of banks of credit which had raised this country to such a pitch of unexampled opulence, without making inquiries as to what could render such a step necessary. It was impossible for any man to say that the state of our circulation was not such as to require investigation, when all notes issued previous to 1817 were payable, and sold at a premium of 2 per cent. Their lordships could not refuse the duty of inquiry. In the payment of these notes, 2,000,000*l.* had been paid away, which, as every man knew, had all vanished from circulation, and every man knew why. Nor was this the only evil. The state of the paper currency was such, that there was to be bank paper, bank paper at a premium, country paper without deposit, and country paper secured by a deposit. The noble lord had agreed with him that it was a salutary state of circulation, that paper should go as far as it could towards supplying the currency of the country, corrected, nevertheless, by the liability to pay in cash; but it had never entered into the mind of the noble lord that there would be four species of this paper in circulation at once —bank paper with and without a premium, and country paper with and without a deposit. But to secure country paper in the way proposed was such an absurdity as could be found with the noble lord alone, and not any where else. If this state of the paper circulation required investigation (and there was nobody who would say that paper of four different species could circulate together), yet the state of the coin afforded a still stronger ground for inquiry. There existed a work which, respecting the noble author (the late Lord Liverpool) as he did, had pretty fully explained how erroneous the noble lord's opinions on this subject were. He (Lord Lauderdale) had before told the noble lord that his system was wrong. He had set up two metals for his standard, which was a bad monetary system altogether, and the effect of it was only to make both disappear. He had argued, too, that silver ought to be the standard here. To this observation he had been answered, that a rich country required a rich standard, while a poor country might go on with a much cheaper standard: this idea he had ridiculed at the time. It was indeed as much as to say, that if a country manufactured a great deal of cloth, it ought therefore to have an extended yard. The coin of a country was advantageous to it in two points of view: it served as a measure of value, and an equalizer of demand and supply; and the richer a country was, the more it ought to be anxious for silver instead of gold. So far was there from being any difference between a rich and a poor country, that it was an advantage to a rich country to have a circulation of silver. There was no writer on political economy that had not stated, that as much of the circulation of a country as possible ought to be conducted in paper, that paper being limited by the demand for payment at will. Now the best encouragement for such a system as this was, to have a cheap circulation. When men had to pay in silver; the operation, being tedious, would drive them to another representative of value, and thus encourage paper money. These were not his own opinions merely, but those of every other person who was acquainted with the subject; and, at this crisis, when gold was disappearing so rapidly, it was high time to inquire into it. What could be of importance if the circulation of the country was not? Indeed, all orders of the people were concerned in it. If he stood in the situation of the noble earl, there was not a man whom he would not excite to inquiry on the subject. When he recalled to the memory of their lordships our paper of four species, our gold coin, our silver coin, with a seignorage of one value in England and of another value in Ireland, it was in vain for his lordship to say, that paper would maintain a uniform value. Had the noble lord considered the value of the sovereign? It passed for 10½*d.* less than it was really worth. Sir Isaac Newton had said, that if guineas would fetch 4*d.* only more than the sum they passed for, it must very soon drive them all out of circulation: and their lordships had all heard of the silver currency being melted down long ago, for a very small profit. He would state to the house that a gentleman in Scotland, knowing him to be curious on the subject, had sent him a great many crowns of the unfortunate James, and stated, as a conclusion, that in his country many persons were fond of the family, and kept those coins as memorials: they must have done so, for he (Lord Lauderdale) never saw the silver in circulation. But there was also a difference in the value of our silver in circulation to such an extent, that, while some was worth 7*s.* 3*d.*, other silver was worth no more than 6*s.* 8*d.*; so that the one was a legal tender, while the other was no more than a mere counter. If the Bank directors were serious, if the noble lord meant that they should pay back all the advantage they had gained, it was impossible that they should pay in cash; they must stop in the very attempt. At that moment he had before him the papers of price and exchanges in detail down to the 1st of January 1818; the average of exchange at Paris was 24 fr. 40 cents., and that he took as the basis of his calculation. That he might not fall into any mistake, he had called for a return of the number of grains of pure silver contained in 20*s.* of the new silver coinage; they amounted to 1,614 36-66 grains of troy, while the number of grains contained in 20*s.* of the old silver coinage amounted to 1,718 44-62 grains of troy; the number of grains contained in the sovereign were 113 18-11,214 troy. He had compared this with the state of the coinage in France also; and the result of his inquiry was, that, supposing the silver par of exchange at 24 fr. 16 cents. in our pound, the same quantity of French silver for our sovereign of 20*s.* would amount to 25 fr. 21 c. It was evident, therefore, that while the pound note was at 24 fr. no one would remit it who could get 25 fr. for the sovereign, by which he might realize a profit of 3*l.* 4*s.* 3*d.* per cent.; and if he looked to silver with a view to importing it, he might make 5 per cent. more: so that the profit on exporting gold, and importing silver, would amount to 8*l.* 4*s.* 3*d.* per cent. All our criminal laws to prohibit exportation of specie had been made when but 4*d.* could be gained on the pound of silver. But where the interests of mankind were concerned, it was impossible to prohibit such transactions; at least the prohibition must always fail of effect. Under these circumstances could their lordships believe that it was possible to compel the Bank to pay in gold, or that the payments could be made to any effect? He was perfectly convinced that this could not be, and it was a proof to him that the Bank directors knew the payment could not be resumed. If Sir Isaac Newton had shewn that silver would vanish when no greater profit than fourpence could be made, how could any man in his senses suppose that gold would remain in the country, when a profit of 10½*d.* in the pound could be made by exporting it? At any rate, could it be fit to say that the Bank should resume payments on the 5th of July, without considering first, how far such payments could be made good? He did not ask the house to consider any theory of his, but to reflect on the situation of the country, especially when the noble lord admitted that it was better to have a paper payable on demand. We had now four species of paper-money; we had gold, circulating at 10½*d.* in the pound more than silver; we had silver, at two prices, 6*s.* 8*d.* and 7*s.* 3*d.*; every symptom of our monetary system was unsalutary. How then could government, without instituting some inquiry on the subject, pledge itself that the Bank should resume cash payments on the 5th of July? He should therefore conclude by moving, "That a committee be appointed to inquire into the present state of the metallic and paper currency of the United Kingdom."

The Earl of Liverpool observed, that the noble lord who had just sat down did not in his speech seem to take advantage of the claim which he had at first advanced. The noble earl had said, that he should have one advantage in debate over those who might oppose his motion, as he would merely state doubts and call for inquiry, without pretending to lay down principles or to draw conclusions. Now, so far was this, in his opinion, from being the conduct of the noble lord, that he never heard a speech in which there were fewer doubts, and more dogmatizing. The noble earl had laid down one principle, in which he heartily concurred, namely, that the best system of currency for any country, and particularly for such a country as this, was a paper circulation, measured by the precious metals as its standard, and supported in its value by being convertible into cash at the pleasure of the holder. He agreed with him farther, that the more easily it was convertible into cash the better, and that it was highly desirable that all restrictions on that convertibility should be removed. He hoped he should get credit from their lordships when he stated publicly an opinion which all his friends knew he firmly maintained—that these restrictions should not be continued without good reasons, without a paramount necessity. There was not a man in the kingdom more anxious than he was to see a return to cash-payments as speedily as possible; and if he had come to the conclusion, that it would be detrimental to the interests of the country, that the restrictions on the Bank should be immediately removed, he could assure their lordships, that he had adopted that conclusion after the most mature deliberation, and with the deepest regret. Such was his general principle regarding the currency, and such was his opinion of the propriety of continuing, for a limited period, the restriction act, and he was anxious to be distinctly understood upon the subject. The noble lord had introduced a great variety of topics into his speech, to some of which he was anxious to address himself at present, though other opportunities would occur for discussing them more fully. He would begin with answering some of those observations with which the noble lord concluded, because they were less immediately connected with the question, and would require from him less discussion. The noble lord had referred to debates on the subject of the new silver currency, which took place about two years ago, in which he and the noble lord differed as to the question, whether gold or silver should compose the standard coin of the country. He (Lord Liverpool) had then advanced an opinion that gold should be the standard metal, and though he had heard much on the subject since, he had seen no reason to alter that opinion. Upon the question whether one metal should be the standard to which the other should be referred as its measure of value, the noble lord and he perfectly concurred. Indeed, there seemed to be no difference with regard to this principle among those who had given the subject the least consideration. Into the question of the comparative fitness of the two metals to become the standard, he would not now minutely enter, as it had already been fully discussed, as no new reason had been brought forward by the noble lord in support of the opinion he formerly maintained, and as a decision on the point would not materially affect the object of the present motion. He might say, however, as an argument in support of the conclusion to which the legislature had come, that gold had become, in fact, and in practice, the standard metal before it was declared so in law. It had risen into this state imperceptibly, before an act of the legislature had sanctioned the practice, and made it the only legal tender for all sums above 25*l.* In addition to the inference in favour of that metal, drawn from general consent and practice, it might be stated, that the expediency of making it the legal standard measure of value for other metals was supported by the circumstance, that it was less liable to fluctuation. The noble lord had said, that the two metals could not circulate together, and that, in consequence of the change effected in the standard by law, our gold was exported, and our coin melted down. He (Lord Liverpool) admitted the fact that our gold was exported, but could not allow that its exportation was attributable to the cause assigned. The noble lord, in stating the opinion of Sir Isaac Newton, had overlooked one material fact which then existed, and which now existed no longer, and the omission strongly varied the reasoning. At that time both gold and silver were equally standards. You might go to the mint with a quantity of silver bullion, of standard fineness, and demand the same weight in the silver coin of the realm. You might do the same with gold. Now the case was altered: you could carry a quantity of gold to the mint, and receive the same weight in gold coin, but not so with silver. It was manifest, however, that if gold was to be exported, it would be exported in the state of bullion. The first object of the exporter would be to find bullion, from the smaller risk run, and the less trouble incurred in exporting it. No man would put himself to the trouble of melting the coin, if he could obtain a supply of the metal without subjecting it to that process. The silver could not be so easily melted; but it might be exported in the shape of bullion, and then the regulations of the mint would not affect its price. If the noble lord's doctrine were true, that when the mint gave a higher price for gold than silver, silver would fall in value, and gold would be exported in preference, then it would follow that silver must fall in exchange. But this was not the case; silver had risen even more than gold in foreign exchanges. This fact appeared to him conclusive, that the raising of the standard of silver had given no advantage to gold as a subject of export. Gold coin was not melted for export because it was of most value, but because no price was put on gold as coin above its bullion price.—He would proceed to the important subject of the paper circulation, which was more immediately connected with the motion before the house. The noble lord (Lord Lauderdale) had divided this subject into two parts, the paper circulation of the country generally, and how that circulation was affected by the advances of the Bank of England to government. On each of these points he would make a few observations. He would make some remarks on the general circulation; first, because having laid down the principles on which it rested, the second part of the subject would be better and more easily understood. The noble lord had alluded to a book which contained the opinions of one for whom he (Lord Liverpool) must always feel the highest veneration (the late Lord Liverpool's Letter to the King on the Coinage.) It was the opinion of that individual, that when the circulation of the country came back to something like its natural state, then it would be proper to adopt some regulation regarding the paper currency. His belief was, that unless some regulation were adopted, property would become insecure, and the circulation would be subjected to repeated shocks which might cause great public calamity and individual suffering. The evil of insecurity could not be a solitary evil. The repeated failures of country banks would give a shock to public credit, and the character of all paper currency would be affected by that of the most insecure. The system would thus be exposed to convulsions, which ought to be prevented, both from a regard to the general security of the country, the country banks, and even the Bank of England itself. All these interests required some regulation for the currency. To that which had been proposed, he (Lord Liverpool) had heard objections strongly urged; but upon asking those who stated those objections, "Do not you think some check is necessary?" he never heard a dissenting voice—he never saw an individual who did not answer that question in the affirmative. By the law, as it now stood, there was no restriction on the issue of country bank notes of 1*l.* or 2*l.* to any amount, and on any security. When this law expired, in two years after the removal of the restriction on the Bank of England, this privilege would cease, and their issues would be confined to notes at or above 5*l.* The question was, therefore, ought the law to be allowed to expire, or ought it to be continued? With regard to the first point, he never heard but one opinion. He never heard any body say, that, considering the habits and necessities of the country, changed as they had been by the continuance of 25 years of a contrary system, we should recur to the system that then prevailed, and place the country banks under the restrictions by which they were then limited in their issues. Were we, then, to repeal the act, and allow issues of one and two pound notes on any security, or without security at all? Let the house consider the history of the currency of country banks for the last three years, and the calamities that had arisen from bank speculations. Out of 700 country banks that existed in 1814, 200 had now been swept away, to the ruin of individuals and whole districts, and to the general injury of the agricultural and commercial interests. He had always been of opinion, that, although many of the difficulties out of which we were now emerging were to be traced to that convulsion which was caused by the rapid transition from war to peace, they were greatly aggravated by the failure of country banks. The distress of the agricultural interests in particular had been, in a great measure, owing to the exorbitant issues, and the consequent insecure currency of the country banks. Some districts and counties might be named, in which the distress of the people was solely attributable to this evil. This was an evil which would, in his opinion, be aggravated by the removal of the restriction from the Bank of England, if no regulation were adopted in consequence of that measure. Let the house consider what the effect might be, if the system of country bank currency attained as great an extent as formerly, without any security, and after the restriction was removed from the Bank of England. There might then be a run on the country banks, then on the Bank of England itself, and the consequence might be a general shock to credit all over the nation. He would therefore lay down this as a principle, that if we could not recur entirely to metallic currency, and if it were necessary to allow country banks to supply its place, to a certain extent, by issues of small notes, these country banks ought to be placed under some regulation for the general security of credit, and with the view of preventing those convulsions which might result from their failure. The most material consideration in this state of the business was not whether one system of regulations were better than another, but whether there ought to be any regulations at all.—The noble lord then alluded to Scotland, to which the act was not meant to extend, because, from the wise regulations under which the banking system was carried on there, no change of system was necessary, as not one, or only one failure had taken place during the late shock given to credit in this part of the island. If regulations were necessary, it was conceived there could be no objection to the adoption of a plan by which the legislature should say to the country banks—" You have no right to issue one and two pound notes after the lapse of two years from the expiry of the restriction act; then your privilege ends; if after that time you issue small notes, you must do so on depositing, as a security for the payment of them, exchequer-bills to the amount of your issues in small notes, or stock to double the nominal amount." To this scheme he had heard only one objection of importance, but that objection appeared to him to admit of an easy answer. The objection was this—that if notes of one or two pounds only were issued on security, the plan would cry down all notes of a larger amount, which were to be issued without the same demand of security. In opposition to this prediction, he would say, that so far from the deposit of securities for small notes being injurious to the credit of notes of a greater amount, the very deposit of such securities for the former, would give the latter additional credit. This opinion would be confirmed, if it were considered that double the nominal amount in stock must be deposited for the small notes, which, at the usual price of the public funds, would afford to the holders of the five-pound notes, a balance for the payment of the latter. But, without laying much stress on this argument, he would say, that the holders of large notes would not be in a worse situation than they were before small notes were allowed to be issued at all, and as they then took on credit, for their own convenience, large notes in preference to gold, there was no reason why they should not afterwards, for the same convenience, take them in preference to small notes. Why did people take notes at all, when they might have guineas or sovereigns, but because the former, when great sums were concerned, were more easily carried, and had other conveniences? There was nearly the same difference in point of convenience between a great number of small notes and a large one of equal amount, as between a quantity of sovereigns and the same value in a large note. As, therefore, people took notes on credit in preference to gold, when the latter was solid wealth, and the former depended on the solvency of the banker, so it might be supposed that they would take the same large notes on credit, in preference to small notes on the security of a deposit. Security was not preferable to solid money, and the motives of convenience that operated to prompt the reception of notes on credit in the one case would operate in the other. Cash opposed to credit, was as strong as security opposed to credit; and he had no doubt the result would be the same in favour of the larger notes, when the parties found their convenience in the larger notes, and had confidence in those who issued them. He was, therefore, of opinion, that this objection to the measure was unfounded. He knew that there would be difficulties in carrying it into execution, and in settling the details; but he did not think them insurmountable. It was pretty well known what was the proportion of small notes issued by the Bank of England, and the time they continued in circulation without being renewed. The average might be reckoned about 8,000,000*l.* and the time the notes lasted about two or three years. Upon the whole, the more the measure was examined and discussed, the more it would appear to be wise and eligible. The noble earl (Lauderdale) had objected to the want of uniformity in our system of currency. He (Lord Liverpool) admitted the fact, but did not see the force of the objection. Our currency was not uniform, nor did he think it should be so. It was different in different places. An instance of this want of uniformity might be mentioned in the case of one of the most populous, wealthy, and commercial counties of England. In Lancashire, since 1797, there had not been a single bank that issued paper. The people carried on their business with Bank of England paper, and the consequence was, that they had not suffered in the late distress from the circulation.—He came now to another part of the noble lord's observations. On a future occasion he should have to propose the continuance of the restriction act for one year; but he would say again, that there was nothing in the internal state of the country, or of its foreign relations, that called for such a measure; but there were circumstances arising from the pecuniary transactions of other countries which rendered it expedient. He knew, too, and he could assure the house, that the Bank had made most ample preparation to resume cash-payments, and that they were ready to do so. The noble lord had doubted this fact, and had given as a reason of their inability, the advances they had made to the government. He denied both the fact and the cause. The Bank might have returned to cash-payments last year, when all the advances they had made to government remained unpaid. If, however, any thing had happened after this to disturb public credit, the Bank would have said, we must draw in our advances. The government was ready to pay up what it owed them, and, therefore, the advances made to government could no longer be an obstacle to the resumption of cash-payments. The noble lord had said, that, in the spring of 1797, the government owed upwards of 11,000,000*l*. to the Bank, and, by October, reduced the debt to 4,000,000*l*. The proportion was nearly the same this year. Government owed 12,900,000*l*., and was ready to pay 9,000,000*l*. The house had no more right to inquire into the mode in which the Bank employed its private funds, than they had to investigate the accounts of any individual commercial concern.—The noble lord had built one of his arguments on the course of exchange, and had given, as the great reason of their unfavourable state, the inordinate issue of notes: he had particularly insisted on the circumstance, that during the last six months 2,000,000*l*. more of Bank paper had been issued, than in the corresponding six months of the last year. He, however, considered this as a perfectly inadequate cause of the state of the exchanges; and this he was prepared to prove, independently of the question whether the additional issue had been wise or unwise. For his own part, he considered the condition of France as the great cause of the unfavourable state of the exchanges. In 1816, and during part of 1817, the exchanges were in our favour; but when those great transactions began to take place which were necessary for the adjustment of the claims of the different countries of Europe, then, and not till then, the exchanges began to be unfavourable: the question, therefore, was, whether—not with reference to any particular loan, such as that to Prussia—but with reference to the winding up of the great concerns of Europe—this was the opportunity for compelling the Bank to resume cash-payments. For his own part, if he had been one of the most strenuous opponents of the Bank-restriction, he should not have thought the present a fit opportunity for removing it: because, anxious as he was for the resumption of cash-payments, he was on that very account the more anxious that the resumption should be safe, and that no mischief might accrue from the necessity of again recurring to a paper circulation. These were the observations which he thought it his duty to make on the general question; and as to the particular motion, the house had, in fact, been inquiring into the subject ever since it had been sitting; for information had been laid before it day after day. He did not believe, that an inquiry by a committee would lead to any other result, than to bring forward the mere speculations of two or three individuals.

The Marquis of Lansdowne said, that the question was, whether, at the end of a long war, during which several expedients had been resorted to for temporary objects—whether after that period of transition from war to peace which had been so much talked of had passed away,—whether, under these circumstances, without inquiry, without any assignable principle, and as the mere effect of accident, the house was prepared to continue a system during peace, which had by many been thought inapplicable even to a state of war. The noble earl had told the house, that he was induced to persevere in what he admitted to be an unsafe and unsound system, because circumstances existed such as had never existed before: and the noble earl, in support of his view, had referred to arguments which had been used in another place, but which, if examined into, would not for a moment maintain his position; for as to the pecuniary transactions with other countries, he supposed that, whether those contracts were made with individuals or governments, still they must be conducted on one and the same principle: and whatever theory might be broached by the noble earl, yet practice alone must, after all, decide the question. Now practice had clearly shewn that no remittance to another country, however extensive, or however repeated, was capable of preventing the remitting country from enjoying its own circulation as free and uninterrupted as before. As an instance, he might refer to the Italian states, particularly to Genoa, which, though not by a great deal so rich as this country, was yet able to supply the powers of Europe with loan after loan, without any impediment to its own currency. Holland had during the last century been engaged in frequent and extensive money-contracts: and one house, that of Hope of Amsterdam, had alone lent enough to influence the circulation of the country according to the theory of the noble earl. Yet, what was the fact? The circulation had never been checked, and Holland had considered such transactions as a trade highly beneficial to the state. And in the present, indeed, in all cases, it must be considered a beneficial trade when the richer country lent to the poorer. Again, what was there new in the present relation of this country with respect to France? In the early part of the last century, similar successes to those of the present day had attended the English arms, and France and England stood on a footing relatively the same. At that time, the money transactions between this country and our neighbour were so extensive and so general, that, in common language among the French, the terms Anglois and Créancier were synonymous; and when a man said, he was going to pay an Englishman, he meant, generally, that he was going to pay a creditor. So much for the novelty of the pecuniary situation of the two countries. As to the argument founded on the number of absentees, which, he understood, had been used in another place, it was really the last thing he should have expected to hear: the removal of a few families, whether for luxury, for convenience, or for economy, could not in the smallest degree affect this question. There was a striking proof of this in the condition of Ireland. The absenteeship from that country was, no doubt, both morally and politically injurious: but if even an Irish parliament, not the first political economists in the world, had been told that it affected their finances, they would have laughed in the face of the Chancellor of the Exchequer who told them so: for the contrary was so much the fact, that during the period when absentees were most numerous, there was a remarkable abundance of the precious metals. (Hear, hear, hear.) Then, as to the bad harvest, that, he supposed, must be assumed never to have happened before: it was entirely a new thing in agricultural history: it was unheard of, till the cash-payments were suspended; otherwise, he could not see what it had to do with the present question. But it was alleged, that the Bank were perfectly willing and ready to resume their payments in specie; if so, it was rather curious that they should have increased their issue of paper to such an extent: this, really, seemed an odd preparation for cash-payments. But the fact was, that the Bank would not lose by resuming payment in specie: by withdrawing the precious metals to a certain extent from other countries, a demand would be raised for them in the same proportion, and a profitable channel would be necessarily created for their circulation. Though only 10,000,000*l.* might be withdrawn out of the 100,000,000*l.* or the 50,000,000*l.* of gold, which, according to different persons, were said to be the amount of the circulation in Europe, yet the demand for the sum so withdrawn, and the consequent profit on its re-issue, would of course be in proportion. He would not say that this cash-payment could take place immediately, but some certainty ought to prevail as to the period for the resumption; and as an indispensable preliminary step, the issue of paper ought to be limited. When the noble earl said, that no inquiry was necessary, it ought to be recollected, that there was no authentic information before the house, whether the Bank in their issues were governed by the actual demand upon them, or by the advances required by government, or merely by what did not return upon their hands. All this ought, however, to be known, before the restriction was continued, which, assuredly, ought not to take place with less inquiry than was bestowed on a turnpike or a canal bill. Before he dismissed this part of the subject, he must refer to the state of the penal laws as to forgery. (Hear, hear.) That some laws were necessary for the security of the Bank paper, he was not prepared to deny: still less was he prepared to admit, that the present were the most effectual for that object; and he conjured their lordships to weigh well that awful increase of temptation, which the present system generated —a temptation which persons, in other respects wise and virtuous, had not been able to resist— a temptation which, at every moment, presented itself to the poor man as the ready mode of relieving the wants of himself, and, perhaps, of a starving family. That this evil was referable to the paper system appeared from this—that the prosecutions for forgery had increased in an uniform ratio since the Bank restriction act, and in the very first year the increase was one hundred. Nor was this all: the prosecutions for coining had, since the same act, increased nearly in the same ratio, being in three years more than double what they were before. He knew not to what causes to ascribe this evil, except to the habits of immorality, consequent upon the temptations offered by the paper system, and in some degree to the depreciation of the silver currency, which was also referable to the same source. The county of Lancaster, which had been quoted by the noble earl with so much triumph on account of its resistance to the system of country banks, might also be quoted in illustration of the temptations to forgery arising out of the Bank restriction act; for, on account of the extensive transactions in that county, and its distance from the metropolis, which rendered the chance of detection less probable, the number of forgeries had been immense, and the loss to individuals had been consequently as great as the immorality was alarming. As to the new scheme relative to country banks, he was ready to admit, that when he first heard of it, he was disposed to approve of it; but farther consideration had made him alter his opinion. This plan was recommended on two grounds— first, as a palliative for the continuance of the Bank restriction. Now, in this point of view, it was somewhat curious, that the remedy was not to come into use till the evil had entirely ceased; for as it was said, the restriction act was only to last for a year, and the remedial bill was not to take effect till 1820, surely the remedy was superfluous; for if the restriction act were removed, country banks would at once drop with it. And here he must enter his protest against the doctrine, that the country banks which had failed, had failed on account of the agricultural distress. In Scotland, where the agricultural distress was the greatest, there was not one failure. But it was said, secondly, that the measure of restraining country banks to the issue of notes above 5*l.* would check dangerous and ruinous speculations. For his own part, he did not think so: the large speculators in land, whose schemes were likely to affect the country banker, could not have much to do with small notes. It would be large sums that he would borrow, and it would be in large notes that he would be accommodated. The plan, in his opinion, would have a tendency to take these banks out of the hands of landholders, who were for the most part concerned in them at present; nor could he see any other advantage likely to result from it, than an artificial rise in the funds—a rise, which was no more a proof of wealth, than a forced colour was an indication of health. If it should be decided, that the Bank restriction ought to be continued, he should think it his duty to call the attention of their lordships to the effect of the continuance of the paper circulation on the morals of the people, and on the criminal law of the country: so that, if nothing else were done, at least some measures might be adopted which should render the manufacture of bank-notes more difficult, and consequently diminish the temptation to a crime which was visited by such heavy punishment. He was perfectly convinced that something must be done: he did not mean to say, that he himself was acquainted with any scientific plan for that purpose: but he had reason to believe that a remedy was practicable; and their lordships must feel how desirable it was, to relieve the community from the dreadful operation of that criminal code from which judges and juries now shrunk with equal pain. (Hear, hear.)

The Earl of Harrowby contended, that nothing that had been urged in support of the motion could be sufficient to induce the house to believe, in opposition to the clear and explicit statement made by his noble friend, that it was the intention of government at any time to make the restriction of cash payments by the Bank a part of the permanent system of the country. It might be convenient to support the measure for another year, while the exchanges continued in their present state, though it might be and would be highly inexpedient to take any step that would prevent a return to the ancient circulation. The noble marquis had adverted to the injury done to the morals of the country, as well as to the melancholy loss of human life, by the continuance of the restriction. He was ready to allow, that no expense ought to be spared by the Bank to prevent, by ingenious expedients, the forging of their notes; but it should be recollected, that if the prosecutions for imitating Bank of England notes had been more numerous of late years, prosecutions for forging the current coin of the realm had also increased. Though this was in itself a melancholy consideration, yet, in the present state of things, it did not seem easily avoidable; for to diminish the severity of the punishment would multiply the instances of the commission of the crime. With regard to the continuance of the bank restriction, there seemed to be some slight discordance between one part of the speech of the noble marquis and another: he admitted, that it was not possible to discontinue it, and yet he shewed, from the instance of foreign states, that it ought to be discontinued. The question was not now, whether the restriction should or should not be taken off at any future time, but whether, at the present moment, it was expedient to do so. He was decidedly of opinion that it was not. There never was a time when the circulation of bank-notes was more useful, and when the danger of reducing them would be so great. At all periods, the change must be difficult and delicate; but, at present, the risk that would be incurred rendered it impossible.

Lord Sidmouth wished to state a few facts with reference to one part of the speech of the noble marquis; but, in the first place, he desired that it should be clearly understood that he gave his hearty concurrence to all that had been said on one side of the house, and on the other, on the necessity of giving every encouragement to ingenuity to prevent the forging of bank-notes. There was no object more desirable, both in a moral and in a political point of view. But, considerable mistakes prevailed on the subject of the numbers of persons tried and executed for forging bank-notes. By a return on the table it appeared, that in 1806, no person was executed: four were executed in 1807: two in 1808: two in 1809: five in 1810: none in 1811: seven in 1812: two in 1813: one in 1814: three in 1815: four in 1816: and five in 1817. Those who were executed for forging country notes only amounted to seven. In the 13 years previous to the bank restriction, the number of persons prosecuted for forging bank-notes was four; but for forging the current coin 808 persons were tried. During the 21 years since the passing of the bank restriction, the number of persons prosecuted for coining (including dollars and tokens) was 3,099, and for forging bank-notes 998; so that the prosecutions by the Bank did not amount to one-fourth of the number of persons prosecuted for coining.

The marquis of Lansdown asked, whether those prosecutions included persons convicted of having forged notes in their possession, as well as for forging?—The answer was in the affirmative.

The Earl of Lauderdale replied, insisting, that all that had been advanced shewed still more decisively that inquiry was necessary. Two years ago, it was solemnly promised by ministers, that the restriction should not be renewed. Then they asked for one year more, and then for another, engaging that, when those periods had expired, cash payments should be resumed. Now, however, the restriction was, for the third time, to be continued, and all the reasons that had been urged in its favour would equally prevail on the 5th of July, 1819. His lordship pressed the necessity of investigation on the subject of exchanges, and the effect of foreign loans, contending, that their operation had been much exaggerated.

The motion was negatived without a division.

Whitehall Treasury Chambers,
20th of April, 1818. C. ARBUTHNOT.

THE BUDGET.] The house having resolved itself into a committee of Ways and Means,

The Chancellor of the Exchequer rose and said, he had, in his official character, to state the terms of a bargain which had been arranged between government and certain individuals, although the whole amount of the subscription had not yet been received: 7 or 800,000*l.* still remained to be supplied; but the transaction was in a state of such forwardness, that he conceived he should be wanting in his duty to the subscribers, and to the public, if he did not take this early opportunity of calling the attention of parliament to it. Before he proceeded to that point, however, it might be expected, that he should enter into a general statement of the financial operations of the year. Most of the papers connected with this subject had been presented—but some, containing certain annual accounts, had not been laid before parliament, and, therefore, he could not have the satisfaction to make so full and plain a statement, as he could have done, if the business had been introduced at a later period of the session. But a time would arrive, when, every information being in the possession of hon. members, they would have an opportunity of making such observations as the importance of the subject might seem to require. The committee were aware, that they had already voted the navy estimates, the army estimates (with the exception of the barracks, the commissariat, and the extraordinaries) and the ordnance estimates; and a considerable progress had been made in the miscellaneous estimates. On referring to the votes, it would be seen, that the sum intended for the army extraordinaries was 1,400,000*l.* The votes which had already passed for the army, added to this sum, would make a total for the army for the present year (exclusively of the troops in France) of 8,970,000*l.* In the last year, it was 9,412,373*l.* In both cases were included the expenses of the disembodied militia, which had not been voted last year until a late period of the session.—The sum voted for the navy was 6,456,800*l.* In the last year, it was 7,596,022*l.*—The expense of ordnance, including the navy ordnance, was 1,245,600*l.* Last year it was 1,270,690*l.*—The miscellaneous services, of which a considerable portion still remained unprovided for, amounted to 1,720,000*l.* exclusive of the sum of 1,000,000*l.* voted for the building of new churches and chapels,—which he took as a separate account to be provided for by a different arrangement, namely, by the issue of exchequer bills—but including the vote of 100,000*l.* for the increase of small livings, under the act of queen Anne. Last year, the miscellaneous estimates amounted to 1,795,000*l.*—The total of the supply, therefore, was 18,392,400*l.* Last year it had been 20,074,091*l.* To this sum of 18,392,400*l.* were to be added 2,000,000*l.* for the interest of exchequer bills, and a sinking fund on them of 560,000*l.* making the grand total of supply 20,952,400*l.* In the last year it was 22,304,091*l.* He thought it very probable, that in consequence of the arrangement which he should state to the committee, there would be a considerable saving on the interest of exchequer bills, because, as a large sum was to be funded, an immediate reduction must be effected, and a still more extensive one probably next year, by this operation. In addition, however, to the items already mentioned, there were some extraordinary claims arising out of the circumstances of the present year, which remained to be provided for. The first of these was the grant of 725,681*l.* 12*s.* 3*d.* that had been voted for the fortifications in the Netherlands, under the treaty of 1815. Though that sum was voted in the committee of supply, yet no new burden would be imposed on the country for the purpose of meeting it; it would be defrayed out of the French contributions in the hands of the commissioners. The next item for which it would be necessary to provide, was the sum of 400,000*l.* which had been voted for carrying into execution the treaty with Spain for the abolition of the slave trade. Another extraordinary item was 259,686*l.* to supply the deficiency of the Ways and Means of last year. That deficiency did not arise from any failure of the Ways and Means, as they were planned for the year; but from the circumstance, that a sum of 300,000*l.* had been voted for the disembodied militia, after the other supplies had been voted, and the Ways and Means completed. The disembodied militia were formerly provided for by a charge on the land tax. It was not, therefore, a visible provision by parliament, but a reduction of the revenue to that extent. Last year it was considered a more regular course of proceeding, because it would tend to render every thing clear to the house, to vote, in supply, the sum necessary for the disembodied militia, instead of acting on an anticipation of the revenue. A grant, therefore, was voted in supply, but too late for a corresponding vote in ways and means. It therefore became necessary to provide for this sum of 259,686*l.* He would now recapitulate the different items of the supply for this year:

Army	8,970,000
Navy	6,456,800
Ordnance	1,245,600
Miscellaneous	1,720,000
Interest on exchequer bills	2,000,000
Sinking fund	560,000
Spanish treaty	400,000
Deficiency of ways and means last year	259,686
Total	21,612,086

On the side of Ways and Means to meet this charge, there was, in the first place, the ordinary vote of 3,000,000*l.* for annual duties—a vote that did not require explanation. There was next 3,500,000*l.* on those excise duties which were to be continued till the year 1821. It would be found, by reference to the accounts on the table, that, in the year ending the 5th of April 1818, those duties produced only 3,184,950*l.* but he was confident that, in the course of this year, they would produce 3,500,000*l.* The next item was the usual sum of 250,000*l.* to be raised by way of lottery. (Hear, hear, from the opposition.)—The next sum was 250,000*l.* which would accrue from the sale of old naval stores. Last year, the old stores produced 400,000*l.* But it was obvious, that in proportion as the country receded from a state of war, the quantity of old stores must necessarily diminish. The next item arose from some arrears to be received on the property tax. The committee must be aware, that last year arrears of this tax, to the amount of 1,500,000*l.* were paid, and applied to the service of the year. There still remained 350,000*l.* to be collected—and of this sum the officers at the tax office hoped to be able to collect 250,000*l.* in the present year. There was also a sum of 21,448*l.* at the disposal of the house, arising from profits made last year on the loan of 1,000,000*l.* of exchequer bills, granted to promote public works, and for the general employment of the poor. The total amount therefore of what might be called the ready money of the ways and means was 7,271,448*l.* He did not, in the present year, mean to take credit for any surplus on the consolidated fund; for, though he felt assured, that there would be a considerable surplus, yet it would not, perhaps, be more than sufficient to replace the deficiencies of former years; but, in the next year, he hoped there would be a very considerable sum, from the surplus of that fund, at the disposal of parliament. The items of the ways and means were, therefore, these:

Excise duties	3,500,000
Lottery	250,000
Old Stores	250,000
Arrears of property tax	250,000
Profits on exchequer bills	21,448
	7,271,448
Leaving a deficiency of	14,340,638
	21,612,086

This deficiency had to be provided for by some means or other. (Hear, hear, hear.) To provide for the sum of 14,000,000*l.* and for a considerable reduction of the unfunded debt, the government had to submit to the consideration of parliament the arrangement which he was now about to state. In the first place, it was necessary for him to point out the objects which ministers had in view, in the transaction which he was going to explain to the committee. The first of these was, by funding a certain portion of exchequer bills, to effect a considerable reduction of the unfunded debt, outstanding. The committee were perfectly aware, that it had always been the object of government, on the conclusion of peace, to seize the earliest opportunity of funding a great part of the floating debt, which never failed to accumulate in time of war. His reasons for adopting this system were various. The first was one of no material public consequence—but he conceived it was right that he should state it. In the year 1816 he gave a sort of notice, that, after the expiration of two years of peace, he would provide for the amount of unfunded debt accumulated in that and the two succeeding years, supposing the state of public affairs to be favourable for such an operation. He, of course, should not have considered himself bound to try this experiment, merely for the sake of consistency—merely to meet that expectation to which his statement might have given rise. (Hear, hear.) But, certainly, it was satisfactory to know that his hopes had been realised, and he could confidently declare to the committee, that all which he had been led to expect was more than fulfilled. The terms on which the bargain had been made he would presently state; but he would proceed, in the first place, to detail the more important considerations which induced him to conclude that bargain, which had for its object the reduction of the unfunded debt. In the first place, the unfunded debt had increased in a very considerable degree; in a manner, indeed, that had been much complained of, and though it was not hurtful to the public service, and was provided for with an extraordinary degree of economy, yet it was deemed impolitic to leave so large an arrear of debt unfunded. During the last two years it had increased upwards of 18,000,000*l.* This was the inevitable result of the decision of that house to put an end to the property tax. But, although no public inconvenience had arisen from this increase, yet, to prolong the existence of a debt of 50 or 60 millions would be highly inexpedient; because, if any alarm or danger should present itself, the existence of such a debt might produce serious mischief; and although he felt no fear of either alarm or danger, yet he thought it safe to remove the possibility of such an inconvenience. Those who had contemplated the history of our finances would admit, that the price of the funds, and the state of public credit, were important considerations for a prudent minister, in selecting his time for financial arrangements. The funds might, indeed, be higher, but the abundance of money in the market could not be greater than at this moment. In 1816, he had increased our unfunded debt rather than raise a new loan, because there was a considerable saving in doing so. The interest payable for a loan was saved at the time by increasing the unfunded debt; and, although the supplies thus provided for were paid by a loan at a future period, yet there was a considerable saving in this mode of proceeding. The 3 per cents. were not less than 80 per cent. Now, suppose that a loan should have reduced them to 75, there was a difference of 2,000,000*l.* This formed a good reason for having increased the unfunded debt, while the large increase of it formed now a good reason for its reduction. Another reason was, the reduction which had been effected in the capital of the national debt since the termination of the war. It might be proper to state to those who were not familiar with these transactions, that from November, 1815, the capital of the debt was reduced by the amazing sum of 50,000,000*l.* That was, the national debt was now 50,000,000*l.* less than in 1815.—By the quantity of unfunded debt which he now proposed to fund, he hoped the money market and the public credit would be so much improved, as to lead to very important consequences—he meant to the reduction of the 4 and 5 per cents. He could readily shew how this would be brought about. The interest upon money would improve, and, in consequence of that improvement, the plan of reducing the 4 and 5 per cents. would be carried into successful operation. He by no means despaired of accomplishing that object in the course of the next session.—He should now state the principle on which his present plan was founded. His object was, to raise a considerable sum of money for the service of the year without increasing the nominal capital of the debt, by creating a stock out of the 3 per cent. stock, which should bear an interest of 3½ per cent. Two advantages would be gained by this process. The first was, that money would be obtained for the public service; and the other was, that this plan was better adapted for the reduction of the 4 and 5 per cents. than any that could be devised; for 3½ per cents. would rise to par much sooner than 3 per cents.; and it would be much more satisfactory to the holders of 5 per cents. to take 3½ per cents. which were not to be reduced for 10 years, than to take 4 per cents. with the apprehension of being eventually reduced to 3 per cent. He proposed that the new stock should consist of 27,000,000*l.* by which 3,000,000*l.* would be raised for the public service. He also proposed to fund exchequer bills to the amount of 27,000,000*l.* In consideration of obtaining a transfer of 3 into 3½ per cents., a premium of 11 per cent. was to be paid as the price of the difference. The actual difference, considered as an annuity saleable on the same terms, was 13 per cent., calculating the 3 per cents. at 78. There was thus a bonus of 2 per cent. given to the purchaser of the 3½ per cents. He had been encouraged to adopt this plan by its success in the Irish funds last year. The 3 per cents. were there transferred into 3½ per cents: that is, 108*l.* Irish, were transferred for 100*l.* English, one seventh of the national rate of exchange being thus sacrificed. By this means not less than half a million was raised in the course of last autumn. This success had confirmed him in his intention of proposing a similar transfer here. He had no doubt, therefore, that this plan would prove acceptable and agreeable, in order to raise what money might be necessary for providing for the supplies and for the reduction of the public debt. On the 14th of April, it had been made known at the Bank, that a subscription would be opened for raising a part of the supply of the year, and that the parties transferring their stock should have the option of funding exchequer bills to double the amount of the money to be paid as the consideration for the exchange of the stock. Upon this notice, not less than 6,000,000*l.* had been subscribed for transfer within the first three days, and he was happy to say, that nearly the whole sum was now raised. The whole sum which he intended to fund was 34,900,000*l.* which, however, would only produce an augmentation of the nominal capital of the public debt beyond the money actually raised to the amount of between four and five millions. The difference between the interest due upon the present 3 per cents. and that of the 3½ per cents. would be 136,363*l.* 12*s.* 8½*d.* The total charge upon the whole operation of converting the 3 per cents. into 3½ per cents., and of funding exchequer bills, would be 1,625,520*l.* 1*s.* 10¼*d.* The rate of interest per cent. to the subscribers, on exchequer bills funded, would be 3*l.* 16*s.* 9½*d.*; on subscription of 11*l.* in money to convert 3 per cents. into 3½ per cent. stock, it would be 4*l.* 10*s.* 10¼*d.*; on both transactions, 3*l.* 18*s.* 2¼*d.* The rate per cent. paid by the public, including all charges, would be, on exchequer bills funded 5*l.* 9*s.* 3¼*d.*; on both transactions 5*l.* 7*s.* 4½*d.* This interest it was proposed to provide for by cancelling stock according to the plan of finance developed in 1813.—He flattered himself that he was entitled to congratulate the committee upon the conditions annexed to the plan for raising money which he had now endeavoured to explain, as compared with the terms upon which any former loan had been negotiated. Mr. Pitt, at the close of the American war, had to provide for a large accumulation of unfunded debt, and in the year 1785 funded 11,000,000*l.* of naval exchequer bills when stocks were between 56 and 57, whereas they were now as high as 80. But the intermediate improvement in the financial circumstances of the country, assisted by the progressive operation of the sinking fund, had paved the way to this extraordinary success. It might be said, that as an option was left to the subscribers whether or not they would choose to fund exchequer bills, his plan was at present necessarily uncertain as to its effects. He had, however, a perfect confidence in the result, both because he thought it the most beneficial part of the engagement, and because he had never known an instance in which subscribers had declined to perform the optional part of an engagement of this nature. It would be remembered by the committee, that, according to the plan which he had submitted in the year 1813, the sinking fund was, to a certain extent, made applicable to the immediate service of the year, whenever circumstances should arise to render such a measure expedient. It was his intention, if nothing preferable should be suggested, to propose that it should be so charged this year, as to make good whatever deficiencies might appear upon the fullest comparison of the expenditure with the revenue. In the year 1813, he recollected to have held out to the house and the country the prospect of realizing a fund of 100,000,000*l.* He was happy to state that of that sum about 90,000,000*l.* had been provided, of which 84,000,000*l.* were subservient to the purposes of the act of 1813. The manner, however, in which he intended to apply this fund would not interfere with the operations of the commissioners in the reduction of capital debt. But this part of his plan he should reserve for consideration on a future day. He should now rather choose to call the attention of the committee to the improvement in the different branches of our revenue. The favourable rise in the amount of excise duties was such, that the receipt of the last quarter, compared with that of the corresponding quarter of last year, was improved more than 10 per cent. the increase having been 510,000*l.* In the last quarter, as compared with the corresponding quarter of the former year, there was an improvement of 90,000*l.* in the excise war duty.

By a fair examination it would appear, that there was a proportionate increase in the customs, the last quarter exhibiting an excess, notwithstanding the anticipation of between 500,000*l.* and 600,000*l.* sugar duties, which were paid in during the preceding quarter. Upon all these different views, he conceived that he was justified in calculating upon a surplus in the consolidated fund. He had, however, for the present, abstained from any charges upon it, in the hope that the scheme of finance which he had now submitted would meet with the approbation of the house, and afford satisfaction to the country. The right hon. gentleman concluded by moving the following Resolutions:

1. "That, towards raising the supply granted to his Majesty, every person who shall, on or before the 24th day of April 1818, have subscribed his name in the books of the governor and company of the Bank of England, for the purpose of converting not less than 2000*l.* capital stock in the 3*l.* per centum consolidated, or 3*l.* per centum reduced annuities, into annuities at the rate of 3*l.* 10*s.* per centum per annum, shall upon the transfer of such 3*l.* per centum annuities to the account of the commissioners for the reduction of the national debt, and upon payment to the chief cashier or cashiers of the governor and company of the Bank of England, at the times hereafter mentioned, of the sum of 11*l.* in money for every 100*l.* of the said annuities, be entitled to 100*l.* in annuities after the rate of 3*l.* 10*s.* per centum per annum, which annuities shall be charged upon the consolidated fund of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and shall be payable half-yearly at the Bank of England, on the 5th day of April, and the 10th day of October, and shall be transferrable in the books of the governor and company of the Bank of England; and the whole of the money to arise from the payment of 11*l.* on each 100*l.* 3*l.* per centum consolidated or reduced annuities subscribed, to be transferred as aforesaid, shall not exceed the sum of 3,000,000*l.*

2. "That, towards raising the supply granted to his Majesty, every person who shall, on or before the 24th day of this instant April, have subscribed his name in the books of the governor and company of the Bank of England for transferring to the account of the commissioners for the reduction of the national debt 3*l.* per centum annuities for other annuities at the rate of 3*l.* 10*s.* per centum, shall be at liberty to subscribe his name in the books of the said governor and company on the 28th or 29th days of April, or the 2d day of May next, for converting into 3*l.* per centum consolidated and reduced annuities, upon the terms and conditions hereafter mentioned, any exchequer bills already issued, or which may be issued before the 1st day of August, 1818, and which may not have been advertised to be paid off before the respective days of payment hereafter specified, to an amount not exceeding 100*l.* in exchequer bills for every 100*l.* of stock subscribed to be transferred to the account of the commissioners for the reduction of the national debt; and that every such person shall, at the time of so subscribing his name, make a deposit with the chief cashier or cashiers of the governor and company of the Bank of England, equal to 5*l.* per centum at least, on the amount of exchequer bills so subscribed, as a security for delivering into the office of the paymasters of exchequer bills, the amount of exchequer bills so subscribed in manner following; viz.

20*l.* per centum on or before the 1st day of October.

And that whenever the deposit shall have been made at the bank in money as aforesaid, the paymasters of exchequer bills shall, so soon as the subscriber shall have brought in exchequer bills to the whole amount of his subscription, return to such subscriber the amount of such deposit; or such deposit may be taken into account as a part payment of the subscription of such subscribers.

"That every person who shall have made a deposit at the Bank of England to the amount of 5*l.* per centum on the exchequer bills subscribed by him, shall receive from the paymasters of exchequer bills a certificate or certificates upon which a receipt for the deposit made at the Bank of England shall be written; and such certificate, or such certificates, shall be carried to the office of the paymasters of exchequer bills at the time of making every future payment, the receipt for which shall be written thereon; and when the whole amount of exchequer bills expressed in such certificate or certificates shall have been acknowledged to have been received by the paymasters of exchequer bills, such certificate or certificates being carried into the Bank of England, and lodged with the governor and company of the said bank, shall entitle the person or persons holding the same, for every 100*l.* principal money contained therein, to 64*l.* capital stock in the 3*l.* per centum consolidated annuities, the interest whereon shall commence from the 5th day of January 1818, but the first payment shall not be made until the 5th day of January 1819; and to 64*l.* capital stock in the 3*l.* per centum reduced annuities, the interest whereon shall commence from the 5th day of April 1818, and the first payment to be made on the 10th day of October next, if the subscription shall have been completed on or before the 3d day of September next: but if the subscription shall not be completed until after that time, the first payment shall not be made until the 5th day of April 1819.

"That every such subscriber as aforesaid who shall be desirous of making up any part of the subscription in money instead of exchequer bills, shall be at liberty to do so, upon paying the same into the Bank of England to the account of the paymasters of exchequer bills, together with a sum equal to 1*l*. per centum upon such money payment; and also if such payment should be made after the 1st day of August next, a further sum, equal to two-pence per centum per diem on the amount of such payment in money, to be computed from the said 1st day of August; and the paymasters of exchequer bills shall, upon the payment to their account being duly certified to them, grant a receipt on the before-mentioned certificate for such payment, in the same manner as if exchequer bills had been brought into their office.

"That all the monies to be received by the cashier or cashiers of the governor and company of the Bank of England, or which may be paid into the bank to the account of the paymasters of exchequer bills, shall be paid into the receipt of the exchequer, to be applied from time to time to such services as shall have been voted by this house in this session of parliament."

3. "That, towards raising the supply granted to his Majesty, there be issued and applied the sum of 3,500,000*l*. out of the duties granted by an act made in the 56th year of his present Majesty, intituled 'An act to continue until the 5th day of July 1821, certain additional duties of excise in Great Britain.'"

4. "That, towards raising the supply granted to his Majesty, there be issued and applied such sum or sums of money not exceeding 250,000*l*., arising from arrears of the duties on property, professions, trades, and offices, granted by an act made in the 46th year of his present Majesty, as shall be paid into the exchequer at Westminster between the 5th day of April 1818 and the 5th day of April 1819."

Mr. Brougham observed, that after the great multiplicity of detail, and even variety of principle, displayed in the right hon. gentleman's exposition of his views with regard to the financial situation of the country, it was quite impossible on this occasion to follow him, or discuss effectually all the branches of his argument. It appeared to him, however, upon a general view of the subject, that the plan now submitted for the service of the year was calculated mainly to conceal the true nature of those operations to which the right hon. gentleman proposed to have recourse. The statement of facts resolved itself into this—that upon a comparison of the revenue with the charges upon it, there was a clear deficit of 14,000,000*l*. which it was necessary to make up some how or other. By the present plan it was proposed to borrow this sum, but not in the ordinary mode. A new form of proceeding had been invented, the loan was to be cast into a different shape, and the interest payable upon it, amounting to nearly 1,200,000*l*. per annum, was, it seemed, to be charged on the sinking fund. This being the true result of all the right hon. gentleman's calculations, and the upshot of the case being, that in the third or fourth year of peace, we were still to borrow to this enormous extent, he could not, for one, join in those flattering congratulations which the house had received on the growing prosperity of the country. So far, indeed, was the country from any prospect of making the two ends of expense and revenue meet, that new means must be provided for discharging the interest of loans, and as the old war taxes were run quite dry, it had become necessary to apply to the sinking fund. He really deemed it wise and prudent in such circumstances to abstain from any expression of triumph at the flourishing state of the national finances. The right hon. gentleman had seemed to treat his present plan as a sort of half-way-house for the conversion, in their progress downwards, of the 5 and the 4 per cents. Now, if he expected that the holders of the 5 per cents. would be willing to transfer their claims to the acceptance of stock bearing a lower rate of interest, he must think that the persons disposed to this commutation would prefer the 4 to the 3½ per cent. stock. It was pretended, that the stockholder would have a greater confidence in the 3½ per cent. fund, from its being less liable to be reduced; but he could only say for himself, that he should certainly prefer, with all its chances, an interest of 4 to an interest of 3½ per cent. He could not conclude these few desultory remarks without protesting once more against that part of the ways and means which provided for a portion of the supplies by another lottery. He was not more struck with the paltry and contemptible sum which was raised in this manner, than by the inconsistency, the gross and palpable inconsistency, which it presented with one of the articles of supply. The right hon. gentleman in his defence of lotteries on other occasions, had been driven, as it were, to his last subterfuge, and, being unable to deny the evil, had maintained, that the financial wants of the country did not permit this sacrifice to its morals. The answer given to the appeals of his hon. friend (Mr. Lyttleton) on this subject was, that the money could not be spared; and yet, by this very scheme, 400,000*l.* were to be given away to Spain for the relinquishment of the slave trade, as a fit sacrifice to justice and morality. (Hear, hear.) He had not found fault with the treaty by which we entered into that engagement; on the contrary, he had stood by the right hon. gentleman in his defence; but he deemed it, at the same time, fitting to express his sense of the inconsistency, and was happy to take this early opportunity of declaring what the general impression was, which the statement of the right hon. gentleman had produced on his mind.

Mr. Grenfell stated that he should, on some future occasion, enter at large into the details of the right hon. gentleman's measure. The house was, at length, after a state of long and anxious expectation, in possession of the minister's plan of finance; and he must declare that he looked with dismay at its probable results. He had already, more than once, communicated privately to the right hon. gentleman his opinion, that he was making a most extravagant bargain for the public. By this scheme, the three millions of money to be raised would cost the country an interest of 4½ per cent.; for the right hon. gentleman proposed to give an annuity of 3*l.* for every 66*l.* which he borrowed. The rate at which exchequer-bills were to be funded, indicated the same extravagance. If exchequer-bills could be funded at 79, why might not a direct loan be negotiated on the same terms? The only advantage was, the contingent and doubtful prospect of saving 600,000*l.*, by inducing, at the end of 10 years, the holders of the 3½ per cents. to exchange their stock for 3 per cent. But if the 5 and 4 per cents. should be converted in the mean time, the 3½ would evidently afford no advantage whatever to the public. In conclusion, he would say one word respecting the option which the right hon. gentleman had given to the subscribers to fund exchequer-bills now, or to wait until after the 2d of May. Now, he was decidedly of opinion, that if the stocks rose by that period beyond 79, the subscribers would be disposed to fund; but if they fell to 75, they would make their bow to the right hon. gentleman, and say, they would have nothing to do with him, or his exchequer-bills.

Mr. Maberly believed that the right hon. gentleman had a right to congratulate himself on the bargain which he had negotiated. He thought that the right hon. gentleman had made a most advantageous bargain for the public, and a disadvantageous one for the subscribers. That part of the bargain which gave an option to the subscribers of exchequer-bills, he considered bad, as it might leave the subscriber to fund or not. He would take the liberty of asking the right hon. gentleman what was the amount of the deficiency of the consolidated fund for this year? He wished to know this; because, if he understood the fact correctly, the interest of the national debt was charged on the consolidated fund, and if there was any deficiency, he should be glad to learn where it was to be met.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that there was a deficiency to be provided for of 14,000,000*l.*; but it must be remembered that a very considerable part of that sum arose from extraordinary charges, and which had been growing from the increase of the unfunded debt. Next year, we might confidently expect that the amount of exchequer-bills would not exceed 40,000,000*l.* and then the charge would be reduced 900,000*l.* In the ways and means of next year, he expected an increase that would occasion a considerable surplus in the consolidated fund. As to the deficiency of that fund in the last year, he begged to inform the hon. member that it was something less than 2,000,000*l.* The hon. and learned gentleman who first addressed the house, had expressed an opinion, that the subscribers had no reason to confide in the hope that no farther reduction would be made in the stock. Now, the subscribers would be guaranteed for ten years, and it was not likely that the fund would be reduced after that time. He should himself entertain no fear on that head*. As to the option respecting the exchequer-bills, he begged to observe, that he never remembered an instance in which subscribers had declined fulfilling an optional engagement; and the reason why they had not so declined was obvious enough, namely, because those engagements were generally very beneficial to them, and he was inclined to think that they would consider it very advantageous in the present instance.

Mr. Frankland Lewis observed, that, in the present year, individuals could borrow money on much better terms than before; and he had not the least doubt that government might have done the same. He did not consider that the right hon. gentleman had adopted the best mode on this occasion. He should have resorted to the old mode of an open loan, instead of the present plan of a close loan. A sum of three millions, however, had been borrowed, at 4*l.* 10*s.* per cent.; but he entertained no doubt that it might have been borrowed upon terms considerably more advantageous to the public. In private life money could be borrowed at 4 per cent. The right hon. gentleman had boasted, that no addition was made by this plan to the capital of the debt. But a great addition was made to the interest of the debt; and, surely, that was no subject for congratulation. With respect to the reduction of the 4 and 5 per cents., no attempt could be made to reduce them, till the 3 per cents. were considerably above 90. It was illusory, therefore, to suppose, that the reduction of the 5 per cents. would be hastened by the creation of this 3½ per cent. stock. He objected to the peculiar appropriation of the sinking fund to this new stock. If this was to be a bonus to this particular stock, pro tanto, it was an injury to all other stock. (Hear.) We had nominally a sinking fund at 4 per cent., but, in reality, we had no such fund. (Hear.) We were paying off a debt at 3*l.* 10*s.*, when for the debt which we borrowed, we paid at the rate of 4*l.* 10*s.* (Hear, hear.) We borrowed on exchequer-bills at a different rate from that in which we paid off in the funds. If, then, we had come to that state in which it was a loss to go on, we ought to consider what was best to be done. The sinking fund, he repeated, was a nominal piece of machinery, which, if such plans as these were persisted in, could be productive of nothing but uncertainty and confusion.

* The last time in which 3½ per cent. stock existed in this country was in the administration of Mr. PELHAM, who was able to say to the holders—"Unless you consent to take one half per cent. less interest, you shall be paid off at 100." Holders, excepting to the amount of 900,000*l.* were paid off; the others agreed to take one half per cent. less interest, and that is the reason why the present 3 per cent. reduced are called by that name.

Mr. Hart Davis said, that the plan of the right hon. gentleman was advantageous to the public, and the reason why it had not been more freely accepted at first was, that the value of the 3½ per cents. had not yet found their level in the market; but in the next year, when their actual worth should be known, a loan offered in them would be most readily agreed to, because the public would then perceive the advantage they had in it.

Sir J. Newport considered the bargain improvident and detrimental to the financial interests of the country. It was the commencement of a system of appropriating the sinking fund, but not in that manner which was likely to be most serviceable to the public. As the 3½ per cent. stock now to be created, was not to be redeemed for ten years, nor the interest reduced, he wished to know, whether all the 3½ per cent. stock to be thereafter created, was to be secured in the same way.

Mr. Huskisson said, he understood his right hon. friend to say, at the opening of his speech, that the commissioners for the reduction of the national debt should purchase a certain portion of this stock whenever it should be under par; but when it was below the level of the market, they might think it expedient to purchase more. His own opinion was, that if they should think it cheaper to purchase in this stock than in any other, it would be a great dereliction of their duty if they did not purchase it. His hon. friend opposite (Mr. F. Lewis) had said, that this was a close loan. Now, he could not see what had led his hon. friend to form that conclusion. In the last year there was only one party, for although half-a-dozen gentlemen called on the chancellor of the exchequer, yet they joined together in the contract, and consequently made but one party. That was certainly a close loan; but here the right hon. gentleman sent notice of his plan to the Stock Exchange, and gave every person an opportunity of becoming a subscriber. It was obvious then, that this was not a close loan. His hon. friend had said, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had borrowed at 4*l.* 10*s.* while private individuals might borrow any quantity at 4*l.*: consequently, that this was a most disadvantageous bargain. At the rate of 4*l.* 10*s.* his right hon. friend had raised a sum for the supplies of the year; and he was astonished to hear his hon. friend say that this mode of borrowing would create a greater additional charge on the consolidated fund than by raising it in any other way. He should be glad if what individuals had done on the present occasion, could be done for the liquidation of the national debt. He wished to see a great reduction of the national debt on the same terms as had been now negotiated. The fact really was that there was a saving in the 3,000,000*l.* of 21,000*l.* a-year to the consolidated fund. He protested against the doctrine so often asserted, that there was no available sinking fund. If three or four millions should be called off, they were undoubtedly to be made good, and so was the extra charge of a million and a half. The sinking fund and the covering of the extra charges balanced one another; but if things appeared likely to find their level, and the extra expense was not charged, on the supply of the year, there would be found a real sinking fund of the difference between the 14 millions before alluded to, and the covering of the ways and means. It was by no means wise to be forcing up the sinking fund; they ought to have such a diminution of public debt as would bear the country through any future struggle; but he could by no means see the policy of forcing the sinking fund. The budget should be looked at according to the public wants and the services of the year; indeed, if the returns were such as were disadvantageous to the people, there was no necessity, he meant no over-ruling necessity, to cause them to be accepted. And, therefore, if stock were held from being funded, the right hon. gentleman had other means and other plans for the services of the year. He was of opinion, that it was desirable to postpone any permanent arrangement for one year, because by that means they would be able to perceive what was likely to be the final expense, after every charge incurred by the war had been liquidated.

Mr. J. P. Grant considered that the right hon. gentleman had made an improvident bargain, and strongly condemned the application of the sinking fund to pay the interest of the public debt. The country had no real sinking fund as things were at present managed, but a most expensive and complicated machinery. We were in a situation where the income did not reach the expenditure, and where the sinking fund was of necessity to be applied, as far as it would go, to supply the deficiency. He wished that the right hon. gentleman would state what was his permanent plan of finance, or whether he meant to go on from year to year, neither admitting nor denying that the income was equal to the expenditure, and contracting loans for the payment of our accumulated expenses.

Mr. C. Grant, jun. insisted, that there was nothing novel or unprecedented in the arrangement of his right hon. friend. It was the same that had been acted upon on a larger scale by Mr. Pitt, the great author of the sinking fund; for when he created the 5 per cents, he determined, that they could not be redeemed until 25 millions of the 4 per cents were paid off. By the proposed plan 30,000,000*l.* were raised, by creating a capital of 34,000,000*l.* There was, in fact, a saving of 90,000*l.* per annum in the mode of raising the money, besides an increase of capital, and its favourable consequences on the funds.—The hon. and learned gentleman recapitulated some of the details of the plan, as stated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and expressed his warm approbation of its merits.

Mr. Lyttelton said, he could not permit this question to pass without recalling to the right hon. gentleman opposite, a matter which he was inclined to treat in a less important way than it deserved. He alluded to the lotteries for the year. The question of lotteries had been so fully argued on that side of the house, that he should not enter upon it then, but he could not but second what had been said by his hon. and learned friend under him, in pointing out the inconsistency of the right hon. gentleman through the whole of that measure. The right hon. gentleman had described himself very good humouredly as "a hardened sinner." But he could not help calling his sin soft sin, and designating him as a man who was any thing but a rigorous saint or moralist, and who bent his morality to the conveniences of his policy. (Hear, hear.) The part of the plan to which he alluded was totally at variance with morality and religion; and if no one more able came forward, he should feel it his duty to submit a motion on the subject.

Mr. Grenfell wished to ask a question of the right hon. gentleman. He would suppose the 3 per cents. to be at 80, and the 3½ per cents. at 91. Would the commissioners for the reduction of the national debt purchase in the latter fund?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer replied, that he ought not to be called upon to state what advice he might give the commissioners; but he had no objection to state, that it would be advantageous for this and the next year to purchase in the 3½ per cents. but not to appropriate the whole of their funds in that channel.

Mr. Grenfell begged to ask the right hon. gentleman a question relative to the terms on which a part of the public business was done at the bank. On every loan for the public service, a fee of 20*d.* in each 100*l.* was paid to the bank for merely receiving the deposits. This exorbitant charge amounted during the last war to several hundred thousand pounds, and on the loan of 1815 to no less a sum than 40,000*l.* All the committees that had sat on this subject had put their fingers on this enormous and unnecessary charge, and yet it was continued. Would this charge be made on the present loan, and at what rate, whether to the 3,000,000*l.* or to the 30,000,000*l.*?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer replied, that the Bank would continue to receive the fee on deposits.

Mr. Grenfell said, that the demand was so obviously objectionable, whether it applied to the 3,000,000*l.* or to the 30,000,000*l.* that, if persisted in, he should take the sense of the house in every stage of the measure.—(Hear, hear.)

The resolutions were then agreed to, the house resumed, and the report was ordered to be brought up to-morrow.

PARISH VESTRIES BILL.] On the motion of Mr. Sturges Bourne, the house went into a committee on this bill, when, on the motion of Mr. Alderman Wood, a clause was agreed to, to exempt the city of London from its operation.

POOR LAWS AMENDMENT BILL.] The house then went into a committee on this bill. On the clause by which the children of paupers might be taken and provided for, and settled by the parishes, under the authority of the magistrates,

Mr. F. Douglas moved an amendment, providing, that the children of the poor should not be taken, except by the consent of the parents, unless the parents had misconducted themselves. He supported it on the ground of the affection of parents to their children; and the usefulness of the children to them.

Mr. Sturges Bourne, speaking of the ill effects of paying labour out of the poor-rates, observed, that he had before mentioned a parish, the name of which had been mistaken, as a particular instance. There the labour had been reduced to sixpence per day. He wished to state, that the parish was that of Hollesley, in the county of Suffolk. The great danger to be apprehended from such circumstances was, step by step, the complete demoralization of the people. It would have been natural to apply for some remedy under the old law now repealed, which could have afforded some relief, though it could not prevent such injurious practices, which it was his wish now to do. Yet it was by no means desirable to restore the old law. It might also be found very proper to enact, that the labourer who was in employment should not be a burden on the parish, so that he might be led to maintain himself. He was glad to find that the parish whose name was mentioned by mistake, had shewn zeal in vindicating itself, a spirit which he hoped prevailed in many other parishes.

Sir C. Monck thought the present practice pernicious. He did not believe that there could be any objection or injury in placing with small tradesmen the children of their poor neighbours as apprentices.

Mr. Gooch observed, that whatever might be the case with the single parish of Hollesley, it was by no means common in Suffolk, the county he had the honour to represent, which was quite equal to other counties in proper regulations.

Mr. Brand remarked on the great evils of the present system arising from paying labour out of poor rates. He rather differed in opinion from a distinguished authority, who had stated, that labour must always find its level by competition. The fact was, that the labourer was not paid according to the actual value of his labour, but according to his wants, in a proportion with the amount of the poor-rates. He conceived, that the clause would have a beneficial tendency respecting the manners, habits, feelings, and morality of the lower classes of society, which were much endangered by the present system. It would tend to give the labourer a better opinion of himself, and more regard to his character. He entertained a high opinion of the peasantry of England, and was sure they would be pleased with the means of improvement in their relative situations in life. He was convinced, that in the lower classes of society there existed as great, perhaps greater concern and affection for their children, as in the superior, and this was particularly evident in the feelings and conduct of the mothers. He could not suppose that when the parents were obliged to receive allowances from the parish to maintain their offspring, they would hesitate at having their children placed out in decent situations to learn trades to live by, and the sort of education suited to their natural condition in society. The measure might greatly diminish the evils of pauperism, by inducing the parents to support themselves without parochial aid.

Mr. Calcraft said, he had not completely made up his mind on the subject, and should defer giving his opinion decisively till after the report was received. But, at present, it appeared to him, that the clause, as it stood, did not promise to reduce the evils so much complained of. The idea of provision, and some asylum for their children, might induce those same habits of thoughtlessness which now existed, besides making, perhaps, a considerable additional charge. Notwithstanding the eloquence of his hon. friend (Mr. Brand) he was not yet convinced.

Mr. Sturges Bourne said he must repeat, that the object of the clause was to remedy the evil of the existing law, the operation of which was against the best interests of the poor themselves.

Colonel Wood was highly in favour of the clause that went to prevent the paying of labour out of poor-rates, and praised the character of the labourers in general.

Mr. C. Grant objected to the clause, because, while it prevented parents from spending the money granted to them for the support of their children, it encouraged, in the latter, a fondness for parochial assistance.

Mr. Huskisson contended that the amendment, if carried, would, in fact, put an end to the clause, since it could never be ascertained, at least not without endless discussions, whether the parent had mismanaged the allowance from the poor-rates so far as to render it proper to take his children from his management.

Mr. Lyttelton said, that the clause appeared to him to militate against a very sound and useful principle, clearly established by Mr. Malthus, that imprudent marriages should be by all means discouraged. This clause tended directly to promote imprudent marriages. If, however, it could be shewn that, by this departure from a salutary principle, we were to retrace our steps, and to make a commencement in getting rid of the enormous evil which at present existed, he should not oppose it.

The clause was then agreed to, the house resumed, and the chairman reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Tuesday, April 21.

INCOMES OF THE ROYAL DUKES.] The Earl of Liverpool presented an account of the incomes of the royal dukes.

The account was laid on the table, and after some time had elapsed, during which the bills on the table were read, and some other private business transacted,

The Marquis of Downshire moved that the account be printed.

The Lord Chancellor thought there was no necessity for ordering the account to be printed. It was laid on the table, and any of their lordships who might wish to examine it would have ample opportunities for doing so.

The Marquis of Downshire believed it would be much more satisfactory to many of their lordships if the account were printed.

The Earl of Shaftesbury suggested, that the noble marquis had better postpone his motion until to-morrow, as the noble earl who laid the account on the table had then left the house.

The Marquis of Downshire then gave notice that he would move the printing of the account to-morrow.

Tuesday, April 21.

USURY LAWS.] Mr. Sergeant Onslow, in rising to move for a select committee, to consider of the effects of the laws which regulate or restrain the interest of money, observed, that the system of the usury laws which had so long prevailed in this country, and had been so often objected to, were, in their operation, injurious to the interests of trade, commerce, and manufactures. Many gentlemen, who agreed in opinion on a former occasion, doubted whether the public could be easily brought to a change of mind, as a prejudice existed from the length of time the present practice had obtained. It was also conceived, that it was necessary that some alteration should take place in the state of the finances of the country, before any measure of this description could be adopted beneficially. At the suggestion of the noble secretary for foreign affairs, he had agreed to let his motion stand over, in order to give time for a fuller consideration of its principle and consequences. Those, however, who had any doubt upon the subject, could have that doubt removed by reading a pamphlet lately published by Mr. Cooke, who had made an important addition to the weight of authority against the usury laws. The accurate, argumentative, and ingenious production of Mr. Cooke was, indeed, conclusive upon the subject*. But the fact was, there was no high authority in favour of those laws. Dr. Adam Smith, who was the only individual of any great reputation who had, in modern times, approved of them, had changed his opinion and recommended their repeal. Both the landed and commercial interests felt very sensibly the inconvenience of those laws, especially in times of distress. The former were compelled to mortgage their property, and, frequently, to raise money upon annuities at an enormous rate. It was a mistake to suppose that the court of Chancery withheld the power of foreclosure in times of distress, when applied for in a proper mode; for which he could appeal to the hon. and learned member for Arundel (Sir Samuel Romilly), if he were present. In the cases of negotiations for loans in time of war, the chancellor of the exchequer, both from his present office, and the office he formerly held, must be supposed to have very considerable means of judging of the effects of these laws. But he could particularly appeal to mercantile gentlemen, as to their knowledge of the ill effects of these laws, in times of commercial distress. The chamber of commerce at Birmingham had resolved in favour of the principles of his bill. The chamber of commerce at Glasgow, had come to a similar opinion. (See Vol. I. pp. 1659, 1337.) He believed, indeed, that the greater proportion of the whole trading interest in the country were in favour of the bill. Under all his own views of the subject, collected from various circumstances, he should have felt himself justified in moving for a bill to repeal the usury laws; but he should so far bow to the opinions and doubts of others, as, instead of moving the repeal, to move for the appointment of a select committee. He did not yet know whether his proposition would be opposed or acceded to; but he should not trespass farther on the house than by moving, that a select committee be appointed to inquire into the effects of these laws, and to report their opinion thereupon to the house.

General Michel said, that this question had been particularly considered in Ireland as involving the interests of trade, commerce and manufactures. In the last session, he had presented a petition from the merchants, manufacturers and traders of the town of Belfast, who prayed, that the house would not sanction the repeal of those salutary laws under which the people of these countries had arisen to an eminence unequalled, and their property had found such protection; they submitted, that, in their estimation of the laws which had from time to time been deemed necessary by the wisdom of the legislature for the protection of our manufactures, commerce, and agriculture, none were more deserving of gratitude than those now in force against usurious transactions, the repeal of which would, they conceived, increase the present distresses of the empire, benefit the monied interest alone, and tend to the injury of every other class of society. (See Vol. I. p. 1363.) For his own part, he saw no necessity for repealing these laws, as money might now be easily procured at 4*l.* per cent. But he had never heard of any difficulty in raising money at moderate interest in the worst periods of distress. He himself had obtained it at 5 per cent. during the war. For these reasons, he should oppose the motion, and would move the other orders of the day.

Mr. J. P. Grant observed, that he had never heard any person say that these laws ought not to be repealed, although it had been said, that this or that particular time would not be proper for their repeal. If it were proposed when the rate of interest was high, that was pronounced a period peculiarly inauspicious, while now that the interest was low, the repeal was also deemed inexpedient. But he trusted that the good sense of the house would adopt the views of his hon. and learned friend.

Mr. Calcraft declared that he could not support the repeal of these laws, unless he were convinced of the propriety of that measure by the report of the committee.

General Thornton expressed himself in favour of the repeal, for he thought the establishment of a maximum was unjust and injurious in all cases, and especially so with regard to money.

General Michel said, that as the sense of the house appeared to be against him, he had no objection to withdraw his opposition.

Mr. Sergeant Onslow said, he had no reason to suppose that this measure would be unacceptable in Ireland. Quite the contrary. He had received many letters from that country relating to this question, and had found from no other quarter a greater desire for the measure. With respect to the petition from Belfast, the house would recollect, that, in the last session, he had presented a petition from certain inhabitants of that town, in which they expressed their conviction that the arguments in favour of the repeal of the usury laws rested on the basis of equity and enlightened policy, and that those which were urged on behalf of their continuance were founded on contracted views, formed under the influence and prejudices of habit, and at variance with those enlarged and liberal principles of political economy which had naturally kept pace with an improving state of society. (See Vol. I. p. 1364.) He begged the hon. general to remember, that Ireland had all the requisites for trade and manufactures excepting capital, and this defect was in a great degree occasioned by the operation of these pernicious laws. The hon. general had said, that he had never experienced any difficulty in borrowing money. The same could not be said by many persons of the most unencumbered estates.

The motion was then agreed to, and a committee appointed.

WINDOW TAX (IRELAND).] Mr. R. Shaw rose, pursuant to notice, to move that the petition presented by him from the householders of the city of Dublin, for the repeal of the window tax, together with the other petitions from Ireland on the same subject, be referred to a committee. It was unnecessary for him to remind the house how patiently the city of Dublin had, for the last five and twenty years, borne her share of the general pressure, and how cheerfully she contributed to the exigencies of the times, during a war as expensive and sanguinary in its progress as it had been glorious and decisive in its result, without ever making a complaint. As soon, however, as hostilities had terminated in a peace that left this country nothing to fear, a general expectation was felt throughout the empire, that every practicable relief, consistent with the indispensable necessities of the state, would be granted to the distresses of the people. This house, too, passed a great and decisive step in immediately lessening the burdens of the people in this country; and although, perhaps, there never was a tax in favour of which more could be said, upon general principles at least, than the property tax, still this house felt themselves pledged to the people of England, and justified their confidence, by removing, at once, fourteen millions a year of the public burdens. He mentioned these circumstances to shew the house how they contributed to strengthen the confident expectations entertained by the citizens of Dublin, that, in the work of general relief, Ireland would not be the only part of the United Kingdom overlooked by the imperial parliament, and more especially, too, after she had sacrificed all the local advantages of a resident legislature to the general interests of the empire. But, independently of any such general expectations, they had other, and in his humble judgment, peculiarly strong grounds for looking forward to the total repeal of the window tax, as soon as the war was over, and to claim it not so much from the bounty as from the justice of parliament. The tax was always peculiarly obnoxious to the citizens of Dublin, for several reasons: its very unequal pressure, the inquisitorial nature of its levy, and the ruinous consequences resulting to the health of the city from the contrivances of all the poorer classes to evade it; and it was now more oppressive than ever from their total inability to pay it. On its imposition by the last parliament that ever sat in Ireland, it was very generally opposed, until Mr. Corry, the chancellor of the exchequer, repeatedly pledged himself on the part of the government, that it was intended for a war tax only; and accordingly the tax was proposed and enacted, for three years only, provided the war should last so long. Now, he hoped he should not be told that the pledge of one minister was not binding on his successor; for it was of the last importance, that in all transactions between the people and the government, the faith of government should not only be pure, but above suspicion; and he entreated gentlemen seriously to consider, whether resorting to such an argument might not be received by the people of Ireland as an unworthy pretence for breaking an engagement which the legislature did not wish to keep. Mr. Corry had pledged himself and the government, of which he was in that instance the accredited organ, that if the Irish house of commons would grant that tax, their constituents should be relieved from it at the end of the war. The tax was voted, and had been levied ever since. The people of Ireland had cheerfully fulfilled their part of this contract; and if the Irish parliament were now in being, was there a doubt that this pledge would have been redeemed on the conclusion of the war? He was sure that he should not appeal in vain to the justice, to the honour of the house, to redeem that pledge which the Irish parliament, in he might almost say its last moments, gave to the citizens of Dublin. He was satisfied that the house would take care, that, in this instance, his constituents should not suffer from the want of a resident legislature. He spoke of the inquisitorial manner in which the tax had been collected. That was, indeed, an objection which had always been found to awaken the constitutional jealousy of the house, and, perhaps, was the efficient cause of the repeal of the property tax. If it were the boast of the humblest man in England, that his house was his castle, he feared that, under the operation of this act, the people of Ireland would have no reason to be very proud of their share of such a privilege. Were gentlemen aware that, under the present act, the collectors could demand an entrance into every room in every house in Ireland, from eight in the morning until sunset, and insist upon admission, under a penalty of 20*l*. There might be instances, in the case of sick persons of the other sex, where every gentleman who heard him would recoil at the idea of such an act being rigorously enforced; and he must add, in candour, that there was little apprehension of any such abuses in a department under the superintendence of a gentleman whose talents and assiduity, since he became chief commissioner of excise, had been gratefully and universally acknowledged; still, it was no answer to the many objections against the harsh provisions of the act, that they were not as rigorously enforced as they might be. It was not to be forgotten that, harsh as they were, they were still as much the law of the land as the Bill of Rights, and under them a collector, if any house were unoccupied by the absence of the family in the country, or for any other cause, might, after the empty formality of affixing a notice, break open the hall door under the warrant of any inspector of taxes, and seize and sell the furniture he found within. That the scruples of the citizens of Dublin were not new and affected, but recognised and sanctioned by the law of the land, was evident from one fact upon record. The hearth tax was abolished in this country, and the reasons assigned by the legislature in the preamble of the act, (1st William and Mary, chap. 10.) which abolished that obnoxious impost, were these: "Whereas his Majesty being informed that the revenue of hearth-money was grievous to the people, was pleased, by his gracious message sent to the commons assembled in parliament, to signify his pleasure, either to agree to a regulation of it, or to the taking it wholly away, as should be thought most convenient by the said commons; and whereas, upon mature deliberation, the said commons do find that the said revenue cannot be so regulated but that it will occasion many difficulties and questions, and that it is in itself not only a great oppression to the poorer sort, but a badge of slavery upon the whole people, exposing every man's house to be entered into and searched at pleasure, by persons unknown to him: We, your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects the commons, being filled with a most grateful sense of your Majesty's unparalleled grace and favour to your people, not only by restoring their rights and liberties which have been invaded contrary to law, but in desiring to make them happy and at ease, by taking away such burthens as by law were fixed upon them, by which your Majesty will erect a lasting monument of your goodness in every house in the kingdom; do most humbly beseech your Majesty, that the said revenue of hearth-money may be wholly taken away and abolished." This was the opinion expressed by the English house of commons, so long ago, as to the expediency of this tax, notwithstanding which it was still continued in Ireland*. He had but one other topic, with which he would trespass further on the house, and that was one of the first importance, inasmuch as health was the first of human blessings, and contagion, for the time, perhaps, the most tremendous of all national calamities. During the alarming prevalence of fever, the last year in Ireland, it was the unanimous opinion of the faculty, that unless the houses were more generally ventilated, the contagion must spread, and a plague be the consequence. That part of the city of Dublin which was occupied by the poorer orders, had become extremely unhealthy from the constant devices to evade the tax, by stopping the windows, and excluding the light and air, so that the interior of their dwellings was dark and noisome, and when crowded by fever patients were as so many nurseries for contagion. The danger became so imminent, that the government took the alarm, and the right hon. gentleman, who for so long a period had conducted the administration of Ireland with equal firmness, temper and talent, acted in a manner worthy of himself. Abandoning all minor considerations of revenue to the paramount object of the health and general safety of the community, that right hon. gentleman gave orders that all the windows which had been hitherto closed up, and that were necessary for ventilation, should be thrown open for that purpose, without subjecting the owners to any additional claims on the part of the excise. That order, followed up as it was by the prompt, liberal, and decisive measures of the administration for the removal and accommodation of all fever patients, had preserved Dublin, under Providence, from an impending plague. For the repeal, then, of a tax so universally odious to the citizens of Dublin, he had now to move on their behalf, and in obedience to their unanimous instructions. He could sincerely assure the house, that upon this question the people of Ireland had but one sentiment—they were all as one man against the tax. They thought it unjust in principle, severe and unequal in its pressure, unconstitutional in its levy and in all its practical effects upon the poorer orders, and dangerous to the health of the community. But above all, they felt, and felt strongly, that the faith of the government was pledged to the repeal of this tax, and that the exaction of it in a season of universal peace was a continued violation of that engagement. For every reason, therefore, they thought themselves entitled of mere right, justice, and good faith, to the total repeal of this tax. They had looked for the repeal of it, and the disappointment of last session was certainly felt with great and general bitterness. He never knew the citizens of Dublin upon any other question so solicitous, and, at the same time, so unanimous. He was sure that the voice of the second city of the British empire, and, indeed, he might say of all Ireland, would never be heard in that house upon any subject with indifference. He had stated the grounds upon which they asked for this repeal, and, considering it in a mere financial point of view, what would it cost the public revenue to comply? Why, a sum not exceeding annually 300,000*l.*, a drop in the ocean, compared with the vast income of the empire. He thought they would be the more entitled to it, when a view was taken of the ordinary and extraordinary resources of the two countries at the end of the war, by which it would appear, that Ireland had contributed much more than her proportion according to their respective means. By the finance returns before the house, for the year ending the 5th of January, 1816, the last year of the war, the nett public income applicable to national objects, and to payments into the exchequer for England, exclusive of loans, amounted to 79,948,670*l.* 0*s.* 2¼*d.* while that of Ireland for the same period amounted only to 7,405,324*l.* 17*s.* 7½*d.* Indeed, he believed it was now perfectly well understood, and candidly admitted by those who took the most active part at the time of the Union, that two seventeenths formed, considering the comparative resources of the two countries, a larger contribution than should, in fairness, have been assigned to Ireland; and according to the scale of their respective incomes, which he had just mentioned, the ratio of Ireland should not be so much as two seventeenths, but rather two twenty-second parts. So that the quota of Ireland's contribution even now to the taxes of the empire, ought not to be measured by the proportion which appeared to have been unfairly struck at that time. The capability of Ireland to pay taxes was, indeed, but too evidently upon the decline. This appeared from the returns upon the window and hearth tax. In the year 1816 the produce of the hearth tax was 75,000*l.*, of the window tax 370,000*l.* In 1817 the former was 55,000*l.* the latter 356,279*l.* But in 1818 the former fell to 43,000*l.* and the latter to 302,000*l.* Thus, in three years, the falling off in both the hearth and the window tax was very considerable, so considerable indeed, as should dissuade the house from calculating upon the future produce of those taxes, or making that calculation a ground for maintaining them against the will of the whole people of Ireland.—The hon. member concluded with moving, "That a select committee be appointed to consider the expediency of repealing the act of the 56th of his present Majesty, so far as respects the taxes upon windows and hearths in Ireland, and to report their opinion thereupon to the house."

* Sir W. Blackstone observes, that "as early as the Conquest, mention is made in domesday book of fumage or fuage, vulgarly called smoke farthings, which were paid by custom to the king for every chimney in the house. And we read that Edward the black prince (soon after his successes in France) in imitation of the English custom, imposed a tax of a florin upon every hearth in his French dominions. But the first parliamentary establishment of it in England was by statute 13 and 14 Car. II. c. 10. whereby an hereditary revenue of 2s. for every hearth in all houses paying to church and poor, was granted to the king for ever. And, by subsequent statutes for the more regular assessment of this tax, the constable and two other substantial inhabitants of the parish, to be appointed yearly, (or the surveyor, appointed by the crown, together with such constable or other public officer) were, once in every year, empowered to view the inside of every house in the parish. But, upon the Revolution, by statute 1 W. and M. st. 1. c. 10. hearth-money was declared to be "not only a great oppression to the poorer sort, but a badge of slavery upon the whole people, exposing every man's house to be entered into, and searched at pleasure, by persons unknown to him; and therefore, to erect a lasting monument of their Majesties' goodness in every house in the kingdom, the duty of hearth-money was taken away and abolished." This monument of goodness remains among us to this day; but the prospect of it was somewhat darkened, when, in six years afterwards, by statute 7 W. III. c. 18. a tax was laid upon all houses (except cottages) of 2s. per annum, and a tax also upon all windows, if they exceeded nine, in such house. Which rates have been from time to time varied." (1. Comm. 325.)

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, it was with extreme regret that he felt himself compelled to object to the motion. The hon. member rested his claim upon two distinct grounds. First, that the faith of parliament had been pledged that the window tax should continue during the war only; and, secondly, the oppressive nature of the tax itself. To the first of these grounds, there was this direct answer, that although the tax, when originally proposed, might have been contemplated as a war tax, it had since been, from time to time, pledged as a security for loans raised, and, therefore, it could not be repealed without acting unjustly to the public creditor. It was well known, that, at the time of the peace of Amiens, Mr. Corry, the same chancellor of the exchequer who imposed the tax, never applied for its repeal, which shewed that he did not consider the faith of parliament pledged for its removal at the end of the war. Since that period, the two exchequers had been consolidated, and no Irish member had at that time grounded any such claim as was now made. It was painful to say so, but the taxes of Ireland were not equal to the interest of the consolidated fund. Ireland had brought to this country a [illegible] addition to the national debt. At the consolidation of the two treasuries, her expenditure was 6,500,000*l.*, and her revenue 4,500,000*l.*; so that there was a deficiency of 2,000,000*l.* and that deficiency she was bound to make good. The supply for Ireland was raised by loan, and considerable taxes were pledged as a security. In this part of the kingdom, 2,000,000*l.* were raised on additional taxes, without touching that part of the revenue pledged for the public service; and to this day, the people of this country paid between 3 and 4,000,000*l.* of war taxes, under the head of excise. This formed a manifest distinction between the two countries as to the repeal of taxes. God forbid that Ireland should therefore be refused relief when relief could be extended to her. It would give him as much pleasure to afford relief to Ireland as to Yorkshire, or any other part of the empire. The two kingdoms were now consolidated. Their interests and feelings were intimately and indissolubly united. (Hear, hear, hear.) With respect, then, to the second ground on which the hon. member had founded his argument, he admitted that the assessed taxes, and especially the window tax, had indeed pressed heavily on Ireland. They had increased with such rapidity as to be at once rendered unproductive and oppressive. (Hear, hear.) In saying this, he laid no blame on his predecessor in the office which he had now the honour to hold; he had been obliged to adopt the English scale of taxation in imposing the Irish taxes; and this had occasioned much inconvenience and distress. The temporary difficulties occasioned by the sudden termination of war, and the scarcity of provisions, had lately increased this distress, and rendered the taxes still more intolerable. He therefore thought, that it was proper to extend some degree of relief from this tax. He had accordingly prepared a scale of reduction, by which 25 per cent. could be reduced on the whole produce of the tax, and applied to the parts of it where its severity was most felt. The distress of Ireland was now coming to an end. The prosperity of the country was almost restored; the comforts and consumptions of the people were increased. The exports were of greater value, according to official report, than at any period on record. The consumption of coffee, tea, wine, and sugar, had greatly increased since the last year. The reduction he proposed would give relief much more immediately than the proposed committee. The petitions were entitled to be heard with patient attention, to be investigated with great care, and to be attended to, so far as the state of the nation would admit. But when many applications were made from both parts of the kingdom for the repeal of several taxes, he thought it would well become parliament to make a firm stand, and to grant relief only in the most urgent cases.

Mr. Plunkett was sorry that the right hon. gentleman had not acceded to what had been pressed with so much moderation and propriety by his hon. friend. To prove that parliament was pledged on this subject, he observed, that the tax was first introduced in 1799, and then quoted the 40th of the king, chapter 4, and chapter 52, to shew, that it was to continue only during the war. He was astonished that these could have escaped the researches of the right hon. gentleman; but the error could not pass the limits of his mind to make any impression on the house. It was to be presumed that, but for this unfortunate error, the right hon. gentleman would have been in the greatest possible hurry to repeal the tax. (A laugh.) The income-tax, he was going to say, had not been repealed on occasion of the peace of Amiens; but the fact, he found, was otherwise. However, if the Irish window tax was not repealed then, it would be an extraordinary inference, that because the people paid the tax then, they ought to pay it now; that because they suffered an injustice for a short period, their submission to the sacrifice was, now that their eyes were open, to be converted into an argument for the continuance of the severity. As to breaking faith with the public creditor, the right hon. gentleman completely abandoned that ground, by the proposed reduction of 25 per cent.; for it appeared that he was thus ready to break one fourth of that faith. (A laugh.) This tax they were pledged to repeal. Let the right hon. gentleman find another, if that were necessary, for it was his business. (Hear, hear, hear.) The more he considered the subject, the more reason he saw for the appointment of a committee. The proposed object was the repeal of the tax, but they could recommend a modification if they thought fit. The hon. and learned gentleman here entered into comparative statements of the produce of the tax, which shewed, that the increase of produce was one-third less than the increase of the tax ought to have produced. Ireland could not, since the Union, pay her charges, because her burdens were beyond her resources and strength. She now paid three times the amount of taxes that she had paid at the Union, and yet her debt was increased fivefold since that period. Her exertions had been far beyond her means; and now they came to sober realities, it was found that Ireland could not be taxed beyond her strength, and could not produce beyond her means. Every part of the empire was bound to bear public burdens according to its means, and he would not shrink from inculcating that duty on his countrymen; but this tax, universally odious and oppressive, could not be wrung from them. Seventeen millions had been remitted to England. Remission to the extent of 300,000*l.* or 400,000*l.* was all the relief given to Ireland. He would press upon the attention of the right hon. gentleman, if it did not interrupt the business in which he was engaged (the Chancellor was then turning over the leaves of a ponderous volume, which he hastily closed,) that he was compelled to give up the income-tax with much reluctance, as a war-tax; and then he came down to the house, and voluntarily surrendered the malt-tax. (Hear.) How could he, after having thus yielded to the sense of the people of England, resist the sense of the Irish people? Although he spoke with warmth, it would not, he hoped, be imputed to any personal feeling towards the right hon. gentleman: he was satisfied that he was desirous of giving relief to Ireland. Let him, then, remit 25 per cent. immediately, and the committee would take care to throw no impediment in his way in doing so, but they would proceed with more alacrity in repealing the remainder of the tax. (A laugh.) The right hon. gentleman in his late visit to Ireland must have seen that difficulty and distress were felt by all classes, but he would be more sensible of the evil, and the necessity of a remedy, if, like him, he returned often to that country. He felt affected and distressed at every visit to Dublin, when he saw the wretched beings, with pale and famished faces, that every-where presented themselves: and not less was he grieved to observe the melancholy despondency of the better orders, who could not, with all their attention and industry, encounter the pressure of the taxes, or conceal the misery of their circumstances. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Peel declared, that it would afford him infinite satisfaction if he could find it possible to admit the force of the reasoning employed by the hon. and learned gentleman; but it was not enough to shew that a great and substantial benefit would be conferred by the repeal of a particular tax, without attending at the same time to those public obligations which would render it necessary in such a case to impose the burden elsewhere. Some topics of a peculiar nature had, indeed, been urged upon this subject, which seemed scarcely to leave to parliament any option in the decision which it had to form. The question had been argued as one of parliamentary faith, and it might be useful to refer to the origin of the measure, with a view of fairly understanding whether any and what pledges had been given at the first imposition of the tax. It was imposed by Mr. Corry, then chancellor of the Irish exchequer, for the first time in the year 1799, as a war tax. But the house must be well aware of the distinction between war taxes, commonly so called, and those, the abolition of which at the end of the war was one of their conditions. Here the right hon. gentleman quoted the speech of Mr. Corry, to shew, that the continuance of the tax was originally left to the future discretion of parliament. In the following year, 1800, two acts passed, the one for continuing, and the other for regulating the collection of the tax. Application had been made for an extension of the privilege enjoyed in England of shutting up those windows for which the householder wished to be released from paying duty; and it was declared by the act of continuance, that this indulgence should be granted at the expiration of three years from that period, if the war should continue so long. This brought him to the year 1803, which was one of peace, when the same Mr. Corry again proposed the tax, and it was kept up till 1807, when the right hon. baronet opposite (Sir J. Newport) brought in a bill for making perpetual all the annual war duties. Under these circumstances, he did not think he was over-stating the fair principle, when he contended, that the question as to the continuance of the tax was entirely open to the consideration of parliament. Undoubtedly, however, the proposition of his right hon. friend, that the abolition of this tax would amount to a breach of faith with the public creditor, of whose security it formed a part, must be understood to imply, that it was impossible, at this moment, to transfer the burden to other shoulders. His right hon. friend, in giving up a fourth of the duty, gave up no part of the principle; for he calculated upon the arguments of those who opposed it altogether, that this reduction in the amount of the tax would render it ultimately the more productive. One argument indeed, urged by the hon. gentleman who brought forward this motion, would, if well founded, carry irresistible weight with it. If it could be shewn that the operation of the tax was, however remotely, to extend contagious fever in Ireland, he should at once admit that all considerations of revenue ought to be sacrificed. He had, however, upon his own responsibility, directed the Board of Revenue in Ireland to remit the duty, whenever a medical certificate should be produced, declaring that the cure of the disease might be promoted by the opening of additional windows. It was surprising to observe the effect of this order—it, in fact, produced no more than seven applications from the whole of Ireland. The tax, it should be recollected, did not apply to houses with fewer than seven windows, and three hearths. In England it extended to houses with six windows. When it was considered what a vast proportion of houses in Ireland fell within the description which was thus exempted from the duty, he thought it must be evident that contagion could not be much extended by the inability of the sufferers to pay for the advantage of windows. He well knew that all taxation on the higher, must be felt in an almost equal degree, although indirectly, by the lower orders; but the circumstances which he was now stating were important, as applied to the argument which represented one of the evil effects of the tax to be the propagation of infectious disease. He argued, that there were still stronger reasons for a remission of taxes in Ireland than in England, because such a remission would operate as an inducement to the gentry of that country to reside at home. There was, however, some fallacy in stating the amount of the comparative remission which had taken place in the two countries since the conclusion of the war, to be 17,000,000*l.* in England, and but 400,000*l.* in Ireland. Ireland had never been subject to the property-tax, and by the act of union either country was enabled to raise a larger proportion of its supplies within the year. Ireland had paid her contributions chiefly by loans; and the whole of the debt thus created had been adopted by this country. He thought this proceeding both wise and just, but it ought to be fairly stated. When he looked, therefore, at all the circumstances of this question, the urgent demands for the repeal of other taxes, and, above all, the necessity still existing of raising the supplies by additional loans, he was reluctantly led to conclude, that no greater remission than that offered by his right hon. friend was practicable during the present year.

Sir John Newport contended, that the remission now asked for would operate to favour a very large proportion of the poorest classes in Ireland—he alluded to those who resided in lodging-houses. The practice of stopping up windows, in consequence of this tax, had been a prevailing cause of the extended ravages of contagion. In proof of this, the first medical authorities might be adduced, and among others, that of Dr. Barry, of Cork, who had stated, that he found, in the same house, the distemper raging in rooms without windows, whilst those which had them were perfectly healthy. Could such a statement be repelled by saying, that a public order, ambiguously worded, had not been more operative? Ireland had been taxed to the full extent of her capacity, and far beyond it. In 1808, her revenue was 1,1[illegible]0*l.*, since which time additional taxes had been imposed to the estimated amount of 3,700,000*l.*, the whole actual produce of which did not exceed 50,000*l.* It was thus evident, that if Ireland had not paid more in taxation, it was not from any indisposition to tax her, but from her utter inability. In proportion, indeed, as the taxes in Ireland had been increased, had the revenue diminished. The people of Ireland had been told, that the union would cause a diminution of taxation, instead of which it had occasioned an augmentation. By this system the great number of Irish absentees was kept up; the gentlemen of Ireland being unable to enjoy in that country the comforts of life. He would state one simple fact to the house. It appeared by the papers on the table, that there was in the neighbourhood of Coventry a piece of land, to the extent of 450 acres, in the possession of a noble lord, who had immense property in Ireland. For those 450 acres he paid 1000*l.* in poor rates, while, on the revenue of at least 40,000*l.* which he derived from Ireland, he paid neither to the poor, nor to the state, one tenth of that sum. He strongly recommended to parliament to lessen the taxation on Ireland at present, that she might be better able to bear it at a future period. This would be the soundest policy with respect both to Great Britain and to Ireland, whose interests were, in his opinion, inseparable. There was but one opinion in Ireland with respect to the tax under consideration, namely, that it was a tax peculiarly appropriated to the support of the war, and that it was to be remitted on the return of peace. The hon. baronet concluded by giving his hearty approbation to the motion for a committee.

Sir N. Colthurst argued in favour of the repeal of the tax; and corroborated the statement of the hon. baronet with respect to the city (Cork) which he had the honour to represent; declaring it to be the universal and decided opinion of the medical men in that city, that the contagious fever had been in a great measure occasioned by stopping up the windows to avoid the tax.

Sir F. Flood said, he had not anticipated that any objection would be made to the motion for a committee to inquire into this interesting and important subject. He had no hesitation in saying, that the tax was intolerable—it was mortal; for the medical men declared, that hundreds and thousands of lives had been sacrificed to it. No less than 3000 persons had been infected with the fever in the capital of Dublin. The fact was, that from their inability to pay the tax, many of the poor inhabitants of that city, by blocking up the greater portion of their windows, had turned their habitations into graves. Nothing could be more certain, than that in the parliament of Ireland, in which the tax was originally imposed, it was distinctly understood that it was to be merely a war tax, to be repealed on the return of peace. Had the parliament of Ireland continued to exist, he had no doubt that they would have redeemed the pledge given on that occasion, and he hoped that the parliament of the united empire, in which the Irish parliament had been absorbed, would do so in their stead.

Mr. Grattan said, that every thing he had heard from either side of the house demonstrated the necessity of going into a committee. The question was, whether parliament had kept faith with Ireland in continuing a war tax during peace? This was a fit subject for the investigation of a committee. Another reason for going into the committee was, the contagious fevers to which the tax gave rise in the principal cities and towns of Ireland. The fact of government having issued an order, to dispense with the law, was another argument for going into a committee. Objections had been taken to the petitions praying for the repeal of the tax, but the question was, not whether all the parts of the petitions were right, but whether any parts of them were deserving of the consideration of the house? It was true, the petitioners objected to all commutation; but it did not follow that parliament could find no substitute for the tax because the petitioners could find none. He conceived that Ireland might be relieved without injuring the empire. "Ireland (said Mr. Grattan) must be nursed; you must treat her like a child. You must not lay too heavy a burden on her, otherwise you will destroy her future strength. You will find it your interest at present to encourage the trade of Ireland; and by imposing moderate taxes on her, suited to her ability, you will produce present harmony and future strength. By increasing your taxes, you will find that you will diminish your revenue instead of augmenting it." For one, he should vote for going into a committee; but he could not forget, that, even if the committee should be lost, the right hon. gentleman had professed his readiness to consent to a diminution of the tax; and he hoped that, at all events, some regulations would be devised for rendering its operation less oppressive.

Mr. Parnell apprehended that a pledge had been given, sufficient to justify the public expectation, that, on the cessation of the war, the tax would be repealed. He was sorry to hear the right hon. gentleman urge, as a reason for not repealing the tax, that Ireland had failed to contribute her proportion to the taxation of the empire; thus making her poverty a reason for taxation. He objected to the criterion which had been assumed for judging of the wealth of Ireland—her exportation, so far from being an evidence of wealth, was an evidence of her poverty. Look at the face of the country—there was not a two hundredth part of the wealth to be seen which existed in this country. He was surprised that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should take her exportation as an evidence of her wealth. The whole of the corn exported went out to enable her to pay her taxes. One great advantage would result from rescuing this tax from the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer—it would oblige him to economize. (Hear.) It was an extremely oppressive tax. Ireland had been taxed to make up an imaginary proportion of the taxes of the country. He was fully persuaded, that if the right hon. gentleman would cast about in his mind, he would find some means of providing a substitute. The citizens of Dublin were not allowed to light their own streets, but an expensive board was kept up for that purpose, which ought, as a measure of economy, to be abolished. The hon. member concluded by saying, that the state of Ireland was not owing to its poverty, but to the present mode of governing that country.

Mr. May said, he considered the tax to be very oppressive. He attributed the dangerous prevalence of the fever to it, which, he thought, was evident from the relaxation of the government. He concluded by voting in favour of the committee.

Mr. Carew said, it was notorious that the contagion was attributable to this tax. He thought that it ought to be repealed; but, at all events, the Chancellor of the Exchequer should consent to the appointment of a committee to inquire into the facts.

Mr. W. Smith observed, that a principle was followed in collecting this tax in Ireland, which he hoped would never prevail in this country. An officer was allowed to enter every house, and go into every room, to see whether it was liable to be taxed or not. This was a most unconstitutional mode of proceeding, and he hoped that Ireland would not submit to it any more than England. He trusted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would allow the tax to be assessed in the same way as in England—by surveying the premises externally. This, he conceived, would not only tend to diminish the tax, but shew a respect for the feelings of the people, to which they were entitled, and which ought to be cherished and protected. If the tax were given up, he hoped that the right hon. gentleman would find a resource for it in his economy.

Mr. P. Moore wished to express his opinion on this subject. The whole tax did not exceed 250,000*l.* Now he thought, that the right hon. gentleman ought to find resources of economy equal to that amount. The health and lives of 4,000,000 of people were of more importance than double or treble the income which arose from this tax. He hoped, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would allow the committee to be appointed.

Mr. Calcraft said, the question before the house was, that a committee should be appointed to inquire into the window tax of Ireland. He was not fully acquainted with the state of that country, but he thought that this question stood on so narrow a ground that he was perfectly master of it. He thought that the question ought to go to a committee; but if it were for a bill to repeal the tax, he should vote for it. How many individuals from that part of the country had declared that the health and lives of the people were affected by this tax! Sufficient ground had been raised for an inquiry at least. He was, indeed, so satisfied by the medical opinions which had been given of the injurious consequences of this tax, that, if no other grounds were stated, he should be induced to vote for the repeal. The house ought to get rid of this tax altogether. The right hon. gentleman had frequently granted committees on much slighter grounds, and yet, in this instance, he resisted a committee for inquiry. He could really go no farther into the subject; but if the Chancellor of the Exchequer thought fit on this occasion to resist the inquiry, he should feel it his duty hereafter to come down and propose the repeal of this tax.

Mr. Shaw briefly replied. He thought, that sufficient grounds had been laid for the appointment of a committee; and, therefore, he should feel it his duty to take the sense of the house.

The house then divided.

Sir G. F. Hill, Bart.

HIGH BAILIFF OF WESTMINSTER.] Mr. Marsh rose, and moved that an order which had been made by the house, for an account of the income of the high bailiff of Westminster should be discharged. He observed, that the high bailiff had not applied for a remuneration (see page 1063.) on the ground that his profits were inadequate: he merely stated to the house, that, in consequence of an act of parliament, which made it imperative on him to erect hustings, he applied to be indemnified for those profits which he enjoyed when he took the office. The high bailiff, before this act, would have been released from providing the hustings, unless he had obtained the promise of the candidates.

Mr. Bankes wished to have an account of the profits, and how derived. In coming for a grant of public money, the first question should be, what is your present income, and what are your claims for more? This question was asked with regard to the princes, and he did not know why it should not be asked on the present occasion. In 1811, and 1814, reports were made by committees appointed to inquire into the claims of the high bailiff when an account of his emoluments was produced. Why, then, should it be withholden at present?

Lord Althorp did not see how the question of the profits of the high bailiff could be connected with his present claims of indemnity. Whether his emoluments were great or small would not decide his right to remuneration. An expense had fallen upon him which it was never intended he should incur, and the question was, whether he should be indemnified against it. This question was quite distinct from a demand for a higher income, which it depended on the house to grant or refuse; and there was no reason, therefore, for inquiring into his present emoluments, with a view to determine whether his claim should be allowed or rejected.

Mr. Tierney said, that if there had been any question of an additional income, he would have called for the account of the present emoluments of the high bailiff, but this was not the case. An unforeseen expense had been thrown upon him by the interpretation of an act of parliament, and, therefore, the question of his present emoluments had nothing to do with his claim of remuneration, which was simply one of justice. He knew nothing about the high bailiff personally; but as he applied not for an increase of income but for indemnity for a loss, he did not see how the question of his present emoluments could arise upon his claim.

Mr. Calcraft was sorry to differ from his right hon. friend, but he thought that parliament could not be called upon to indemnify persons for losses in offices which they had purchased, without making inquiry into their incomes. The house should deal with this office as with other offices, and as it had dealt by the princes of the blood. He saw nothing in the office of the high bailiff that should exempt him from giving an account of his emoluments now as he had formerly done. He had formerly produced these accounts; and if he now refused, he thought the relief prayed for should not be granted.

Mr. Tierney said, the case of the princes was entirely different. This was not a claim for a new grant, but a demand for indemnity.

Mr. Money supported the motion for rescinding the order. The expense was incurred by the neglect of parliament, and indemnity from parliament was, therefore, a matter of justice, not of favour.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer could not see why the high bailiff should not produce an account of his profits, as he had done so formerly. It was no more than common respect to the house to comply with their order.

Sir J. Macintosh said, that if the house made the order, the high bailiff must comply; but the question was, whether it was just to make the order, and whether it ought not now to be rescinded? The order was a demand for producing the amount of his profits, in consequence of a claim of indemnity which he made for an expense incurred by the interpretation of an act of parliament, which was not intended to possess the meaning which the court had thought themselves bound to put upon it. The amount of his present profits had no connexion with such a claim, as their magnitude or smallness could not determine the justice of the demand. The refusal of the high bailiff to produce that account should not operate against him, nor should any unfavourable inference be drawn from his former consent. If he had twice produced the account, that circumstance proved that he had no sinister motive in now objecting to it, and likewise shewed, that the house did not require it for information. His reason for refusing it might arise from a fear that by compliance he might compromise the rights of his office, and be submitting to a precedent injurious to those who might succeed him.

Sir J. Newport supported the motion, as he had formerly opposed the order.

Sir E. Brydges was likewise in favour of rescinding the order.

Sir W. Burroughs supported the motion. The high bailiff, he said, was entitled to an indemnity.

Mr. Forbes asked, whether one of the members returned at the election was not liable, as a candidate, though both were not, as one of them had not canvassed?

Mr. J. P. Grant replied in the negative: the court of King's Bench had decided otherwise. He thought that the question of the emoluments of the high bailiff had no connexion with his claim, which was as clear and straight-forward a demand for justice as any he had ever known.

Mr. R. Smith opposed the motion, on the ground, that if the high bailiff had been better advised, he might have obtained redress in a court of law, by making lord Cochrane, who certainly was a candidate, pay for the expenses incurred on account of the return of both members.

Lord Folkestone said, that even if the high bailiff had obtained the whole of the expenses from lord Cochrane, his lordship would have had the same claim to indemnity that the high bailiff had now preferred. It was a claim of pure and simple justice, and ought therefore to be complied with. The court of King's Bench had held, that, under this act, one candidate was not liable to the whole expense, and that, as the other member was returned without having canvassed, and was bound to serve, he was not liable to any part of it*.

The house then divided:

Ayes, 46.—Noes, 46.

The numbers being equal, Mr. Speaker gave a casting vote to the Noes.

EAST INDIA DOCK COMPANY.] Mr. B. Shaw rose to move, that the East India Dock Company should give, in pursuance of an act of parliament, a proper account of their profits to the house. In 1803, an act had passed to form that company, and to compel all ships coming from the East Indies to discharge in their docks. He should not then inquire into the expediency of that act: it was sufficient that it stood on the books. But since it was passed, a great change had taken place in the East India trade by its having become open: ships of a smaller size were now engaged in it, and owned by persons who, being unconnected with the trade when the act was passed, had no opportunity of opposing it in its progress: all they now asked was, that the house would compel the Dock Company to render their accounts in a manner to be understood, and according to the provisions of that act. The house was the guardian of the people's rights, and if it conferred exclusive privileges, would so guard them that they should not be oppressive. By a clause in the act, it was provided, that after all expenses were defrayed, and the company had divided 10 per cent., the surplus, if any, should be applied to the diminution of the rates on shipping. It was incumbent on the house to enforce this clause, to see that the accounts were rendered annually, and that the charges were reduced, if the receipts were greater than would pay all expenses, and give the company 10 per cent. He would not say that the receipts had been greater, but that the ship owners ought to have the opportunity of investigating them. They complained, that in the accounts submitted to the house, only one item had been made of the money expended in labour, for unloading and loading, labourers, taxes, incidental expenses, and for the amount of extraordinary disbursements made for additional improvements and accommodations, not provided for by the increased capital, up to September 1817. This item amounted to 41,931*l.* 13*s.* 2*d.* Why was it charged on the income, when the company had been empowered to raise an additional capital of 100,000*l.* of which they had yet raised only 58,000*l.*? Another item was, "By balance in hand, 7,005*l.* 17*s.*;" and different balances thus kept back every year had amounted to 68,000*l.* which had never been accounted for. He was far from saying that the money had been improperly expended, but the public had a right to the account, and the house would see that justice was done. He could not conceive on what ground this motion could be opposed; and if it

* On the 2d of March, 1623, it was agreed, "That a man, after he is duly chosen, cannot relinquish." Serjeant Glanvylle, in his report of this case, says, "The question was, whether Sir Thomas Estcourt was eligible, against his own consent, and contrary to his desire? and it was held clearly, that he was; and that no man, being lawfully chosen, can refuse the place; for the country and commonwealth have such an interest in every man, that when, by lawful election, he is appointed to this public service, he cannot by any unwillingness, or refusal of his own, make himself incapable; for that were to prefer the will, or contentment, of a private man, before the desire and satisfaction of the whole country, and the ready way to put by the sufficientest men, who are commonly those, who least endeavour to obtain the place." (Glanvylle's Reports of Election Cases, p. 101.)

were opposed, he must put a bad construction on the business, and conclude, that a fair account had not been rendered. It was not now a question with the ship-owners, whether they should go into the dock or not, though they complained, that they should be compelled to pay 16*s*. a ton, while, at the out-ports, they could have the same service performed for 4*s*. a ton, and in the port of London itself for 3*s*. They believed that the act was compulsory on them, but they desired an account, that they might see whether the charges could be reduced. He therefore moved, "That the East India Dock Company be required to return an account distinguishing the amount of the extraordinary disbursements incurred for improvements of, and accommodations at, the East India Docks, not provided for by the increased capital, which are stated in the account presented to this house (on the 2d of March) to be included in the sum of 41,931*l*. 13*s*.2*d*."—Also, "an account of the appropriation of the several balances appearing by the accounts of the directors of the East India docks (presented to this house) to have been in hand at the end of different years between 1808 and 1816 inclusive."

Mr. Astell opposed the motion. The charge per ton was not 16*s*.: it was only 14*s*., with a drawback of 2*s*. if a ship did not go into the outward bound dock; and this rate of tonnage was taken not on the real but on the chartered amount. This was the first time that any objection had been made to the mode of the company's accounts, which had been pursued since 1806. The sum of 13,000*l*. the real sum in dispute, had been expended on improvements. The first dividend of the company was in 1807, five per cent.; for the five succeeding years six per cent., for one year seven and a half, and last year seven, on a capital of 450,000*l*. On an average, the dividend was only six per cent., and though the balance this year was 7005*l*., it was not always in the company's favour, but frequently against them: many charges had not been included in the account, and his hon. friend ought to look to the average of the balances.

Mr. Marryat thought that the provisions of the act had not been performed by the company. Last year they had lumped many articles into their account, which they ought not to have done, so that in the end the rates could not be lowered according to the account. Their conduct on the balances was still more indefensible; there was now 68,000*l*. unaccounted for. No notice had been taken of this before, because the ship-owners at large had not had an interest in the trade till lately. The dock was built for large ships that could find no other accommodation; but small ships required no such assistance, and yet, they were compelled to pay 14*s*. a ton, while at Liverpool they only paid 2*s*. 6*d*., and would not pay more here, but for this monopoly. These high charges drove trade from the port of London to the out-ports, and even to foreign ports; and it was notorious, that no vessel could freight for London, except at a higher price than to other places. He trusted, therefore, that if any alterations were made in the dock-charter, government would not share in the profits; for if so, the charges would never fall. The docks were in themselves very useful, and capitalists had only been led to engage large sums in their very expensive construction with the view of making their profit in the tolls: but when those profits were fairly made, the tolls ought to be lowered. Hume had clearly shewn, that trade must decay if vested in exclusive companies. In speaking of the conduct of Elizabeth, in respect of these matters, he had observed, that, "had she gone on during a tract of years, at her own rate, England, the seat of riches, and arts, and commerce, would have contained at present as little industry as Morocco, or the coast of Barbary." Being informed, however, that the commons considered these monopolies as so many breaches of the people's privileges, she annulled most of her grants, and, upon that occasion, she received the thanks of the house*. In the time of

* The following is the reply which the Queen made to the members who were commissioned to return her thanks.—"Gentlemen, I owe you hearty commendations for your singular good-will towards me, not only in your hearts and thoughts, but which you have openly expressed and declared, whereby you have recalled me from an error proceeding from my ignorance, not my will. These things had undeservedly turned to my disgrace (to whom nothing is more dear than the safety and love of my people), had not such harpies and horse-leeches as these been made known and discovered to me by you. I had rather my heart or hand should perish, than that either my heart or hand should allow such privileges to monopolists, as may be prejudicial to my people. The splendour of regal majesty hath not so blinded mine eyes, that licentious power should prevail with me more than justice. The glory of the name of a king may deceive princes that know not how to rule, as gilded pills may deceive a sick patient: but I am none of those princes; for I know that the commonwealth is to be governed for the good and advantage of those that are committed to me, not of myself to whom it is intrusted; and that an account is one day to be given before another judgment-seat. I think myself most happy, that by God's assistance I have hitherto so prosperously governed the commonwealth in all respects; and that I have such subjects, as for their good I would willingly leave both kingdom and life also. I beseech you, that whatever misdemeanors and miscarriages others are guilty of by their false suggestions, may not be imputed to me: let the testimony of a clear conscience entirely, in all respects, excuse me. You are not ignorant, that princes' servants are oftentimes too much set upon their own private advantage; that the truth is frequently concealed from princes, and they cannot themselves look narrowly into all things, upon whose shoulders lieth continually the heavy weight of the greatest and most important affairs." (See Rapin, sub anno 1600.)

On this occasion, the East India company's char-

Charles the First, it was attempted to raise money by means of charters granted to exclusive companies; but the house considered this illegal, and, according to Rushworth, expelled many members for supporting it. It was clear, that such companies only should be encouraged as afforded conveniences at the cheapest rates, and that was the only way in which the port of London could be sustained. The rates charged by the East India Dock Company were higher than was necessary, and he hoped that the house would see the propriety of ordering the accounts.

Mr. Alderman Atkins said, that the building expenses of the dock had exceeded the estimate, and that the company had never received a larger dividend than seven per cent.

Mr. Thompson said, that he belonged to the dock company of Hull, and should have been ashamed to have put his name to accounts like those presented from the East India docks.

Mr. Protheroe hoped, that the directors of the East India company would not oppose the motion, for the sake of the character of the establishment.

Sir W. Curtis did not believe that it would be resisted. He was himself a director, and he should support the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

FORGERY OF BANK NOTES.] Mr. Best from the Bank of England presented an account of the number of persons committed or prosecuted for forging Bank notes in 1816 and 1817; and also, an account of the number of persons convicted for forging notes, or of uttering such forged notes, in fourteen years preceding February 1797, and since that time.

Sir James Macintosh then rose to make his promised motion on this subject. He said, he should detain the house as shortly as possible, though the question was one upon which it would be necessary to enter into some details. Two months ago he had moved for the returns which had been laid on the table; and he had now other propositions to submit for further papers, to which he understood no objection would be made, except to one of them, namely,—the expenses incurred by the Bank, since the restriction, in prosecutions for forging their notes. It was, he understood, to be said, that the document ought not to be furnished, because it would be an interference with the private concerns of the Bank; and the answer to it seemed as obvious as it was convincing; that the affairs of the Bank, as connected with the issue of their notes, and the rapid multiplication of forgeries, which, he contended, had been the consequence of the suspension, could no longer, in any sense of the word, be considered private. The suspension had produced an enormous evil; it had tainted and corrupted the morals of a large class of the people, and had occasioned an increase of crimes with a velocity unexampled (Hear). How, then, was it possible to consider the money laid out by the Bank in prosecuting crimes of which they themselves were the real authors, as a private expenditure of which parliament ought to have neither the inspection nor the control? In consequence of the great delay in presenting the returns, the materials out of which he was to make a case to shew that the house ought to interpose were necessarily scanty; but such as they were, consisting of papers produced in a former session, and at various antecedent periods, he trusted he should be able to convince every impartial man, that inquiry was imperiously demanded. It appeared, that for seven years previous to the suspension of cash-payments, the Bank had not instituted a single prosecution for forging their notes, and that for the seven years subsequent to that event, they had instituted 222 prosecutions. (Hear, hear.) Was not this a frightful leap, and only to be accounted for in one way? The calculation, of course, excluded the year 1797, as being that in which ter was confined to the space of 15 years. Cromwell laid open the trade to the East Indies, and it continued open till the year 1657. It has often been asserted, that the adventurers during that period were all ruined. The contrary, however, appears to be the fact. Thurloe, who was Cromwell's secretary, says, in a letter dated at the Hague, 15th Jan. 1654-5, that "the merchants of Amsterdam having heard that the Lord Protector would dissolve the East India company at London, and declare the navigation and commerce to the East Indies to be free and open, were greatly alarmed, considering such a measure as ruinous to their own East India company." (See the 3d vol. of Thurloe's State Papers, p. 80.) And a tract, written in the year 1680, informs us, that "during the years 1653, 4, 5, 6, when the trade was laid open, the English traders afforded the India commodities so cheap, that they supplied more parts of Europe, and even Amsterdam itself, therewith, than ever was done after; whereby they very much sunk the Dutch East India company's actions." It may be asked, then, if the private traders were so successful, why was not the monopoly abolished for ever? Bishop Burnet relates, that, down to the Revolution, it was customary for the East India company to make annual presents, of very large sums, to the King, and to the leading ministers. The King had 10,000*l*. at least, a-year. (See the Hist. of his own Times, vol. 3. p. 199.) Soon after the Revolution, the opposition that was made to their charter was very nearly successful. By large sums, however, they found means not only to buy off some of the principal private traders, but also to corrupt several members of the parliament, and some of the highest officers of the state. Mr. Anderson, in his curious account of this matter, relates, that not less than 170,000*l*. was employed for these purposes. But the affair was, afterwards, brought before parliament, when Sir Thomas Cooke, one of the company's directors, and other of its officers, were committed to the Tower, and the duke of Leeds, lord president of the council, was impeached; but the very seasonable prorogation of parliament put an end to the proceeding. (See the account at large in Anderson's "History of Commerce.")

the measure of suspension was resorted to. In the 14 years previous to the suspension, there had been only four prosecutions. In the 14 years afterwards, there had been no less than 469. (Hear, hear.) In the 21 years previous to the suspension, there had been only six prosecutions; while, in the 21 years after, they had increased to the enormous sum of 850. The proportion was, therefore, as 6 to 850; and he would ask, whether the history of the criminal law of this, or indeed of any other country, afforded a parallel instance of such a sudden and permanent augmentation of crime? (Hear, hear.) Here, indeed, he might almost close the case, but for something that had been said regarding prosecutions by the Mint. It had been at first contended, that the increase of prosecutions by the Bank had tended to diminish those by the Mint, so as, upon the whole, to make a balance; but, by the returns upon the table, it appeared, that the contrary was the fact, for the Mint prosecutions had also augmented, though not in a ratio so rapid as those of the Bank. Defeated in this position, gentlemen on the other side argued (in direct opposition to their first assertion) that there had been a great increase in the Mint prosecutions, which shewed, that the frequency of the crime of forgery only arose from the same depravity that had occasioned the frequency of the crime of coining. Here, again, however, they were answered by the returns, which proved, that the increase of Mint prosecutions, from 1783, had been gradual and regular, not with those sudden and dreadful leaps so observable in the Bank prosecutions, from 4 to 469: while the offences of imitating the coin of the realm had only doubled, those of forgery had increased nearly a hundred and twentyfold. What cause could be assigned for this singular and melancholy change? What, but the enormous and constant increase of the circulation of Bank of England notes, more especially of small notes, which, at first, had only been issued to the extent of one million and a half, but which had now ascended to the amount of seven or eight millions. Upon this statement, he would make only one single observation to the admirers of capital punishments, an observation which could not be too often repeated, namely, that while the crime was ever visited with the utmost severity, they had not been able to repress it; but, on the contrary, the more the promoters of capital punishments cried, hang! hang! hang! the more the offence was committed, and the more numerous were the offenders executed. (Hear, hear.) On the other hand, highway-robbery, which had of late met with greater lenity, had greatly diminished; and though no doubt it was partly to be attributed to the establishment of mails, (a sort of constant guard upon the road), the enclosure of commons and wastes, the erection of turnpike-houses, the improvement of the police, and other causes, yet it was impossible not to allow that a portion of the amelioration was to be attributed to the lenity with which the law was administered. But, to return to the subject of bank-notes. No man could deny, that the subject now before the house was intimately connected with the measure introduced not long since by the Chancellor of the Exchequer to its notice, for diminishing the circulation of country bank-notes. Whatever were the other merits of that bill, the proper title of it ought to be "a bill for the better promotion of forgery;" for it was intended to lessen the issue of those notes which were seldom or never forged, and to increase the issue of those, for the forging of which so many hundreds had within a few years lost their lives. (Hear, hear.) It was a bill for the erection and furnishing of gibbets; for it was not true, that forgeries of country notes were frequent, though seldom prosecuted, lest the banker should expose and injure his credit. There was a double motive for imitating the paper of the Bank of England, since it could always be done with greater effect and with more impunity. It must be admitted, that the machinery of the Bank was most perfect for the protection of its own interests; but while it had refused payment of 100,000 forged notes for its own benefit, nothing had been done to guard the public against impositions. In fact, nothing could be more clear, than that a direct tax of 25,000*l.* a-year was laid by the Bank upon the lower orders of society, least capable of detecting the fraud, and of sustaining the loss. If a tax to be so raised were proposed in parliament, there was not a man in the house who would not start from it with disgust and horror; yet the effect upon the poor was the same, and the company of the Bank were the gainers. The crime of forgery was often attended with peculiar aggravations. It had not unfrequently been made the means of seducing the unwary into guilt and its consequences, and women (from their nature weak and dependent, and incapable of the more arduous duties of life) were competent to the commission of this offence, as far at least as the uttering of forged notes constituted a part of it. What made it particularly odious was, that whole families were sometimes involved in the same crime; and instances were not unknown, where a father, his wife, and children, en masse, stood at the bar of a court of justice to receive sentence for having committed it. (Hear, hear.) The Bank had accepted the plea of "guilty of having in their possession" from many who would have been tried for forgery; and this and other parts of their conduct were necessary consequences of the plan they had pursued. The average number of executions, from 1805 to 1813, was 56. In one year, the persons executed for forgery on the Bank were 13, or one-fourth of the whole number of persons capitally executed. It had, indeed, at last been found impossible to adhere to the ancient rule, and nothing could more mark the increase of forgery, than the relaxation it had produced in that unbending rule of the law. Forgeries had been pardoned—pardoned through necessity, or the slaughter of men, under the name of justice, would have buried the crime and punishment under common abhorrence. (Hear.) It was necessary that some means should be resorted to for preventing such dreadful effects of the system. It was incumbent on the Bank to devise some plan for diminishing the calamities consequent on a paper circulation. If some such scheme were not found out, all industry, all integrity, all character, would be menaced. Most of the ingenious persons whose projects he had perused did not seem to be aware to what perfection the Bank had brought their machinery to protect their own interests. The great difficulty to be contemplated in such plans was, that of making such marks as would be understood by the most ignorant persons, at the same time that they were incapable of being copied by the numerous body of people who might unfortunately attempt to imitate them. The thing would be very difficult to accomplish, but they were bound to endeavour to complete it. It had been his intention to move for a committee with that object, as well as for other purposes connected with it. He did not, however, mean to press it, till after the motion of his right hon. friend (Mr. Tierney); but if the decision on that should render it necessary, he should certainly bring it forward. He should have no objection to have it made a secret committee. His present object was, to be informed of the expenses of the Bank in consequence of forgeries; and the best way to become acquainted with that was, to obtain the expense they had been at in their prosecutions. And, considering the enormous increase of those prosecutions; considering the number of persons employed, who deprived men of their innocence that they might afterwards deprive them of their lives; considering the many instances of this kind, some of them detected and exposed by the intrepid and unwearied benevolence of the hon. member for Shrewsbury, (hear, hear,) he thought it desirable that some of the particulars of the Bank prosecutions should be laid before the public. The hon. and learned gentleman concluded with moving, that there be laid before this house " an account of the total nominal value of forged Bank notes presented to the Bank of England from 1st January 1816 to 10th April 1818, distinguishing each year, and distinguishing the amount of those of which payment was refused, from that of the notes which were paid, and which afterwards proved to be forgeries:"—Also, " an account of the number of persons prosecuted for forging notes of the Bank of England, or for knowingly uttering or possessing forged notes, from 1st January 1816 to 10th April 1818, distinguishing each year, and distinguishing the number so prosecuted for forging, uttering, or possessing notes under the value of 5*l.*:" —Also, " an account of the total number of forged Bank notes discovered by the Bank to have been forged, by presentation for payment or otherwise, from 1st January 1812 to 10th April 1818, distinguishing each year, and also distinguishing the number of notes of 1*l.*, of 2*l.*, of 5*l.*, of 10*l.*, of 20*l.*, and above 20*l.* in value:" —Also, " an account of the whole expense incurred by the Bank of England in prosecutions for forging their notes, or for knowingly uttering or possessing such notes, from 1st March 1797 to 20th April 1818, distinguishing each year."

Mr. Manning declared, that the Bank directors were most anxious to encourage every means of preventing forgery. He concurred with the hon. and learned gentleman in most of his details, but he ought to recollect that, since the bank restriction had been imposed, there had been 3,099 cases of forgery of metallic currency, and only 998 of forgeries on the Bank. He had no objection to the first motion; but he resisted the last, on the ground, that an account of any other part of the expenditure of the Bank might be required, as well as their expenses in prosecutions for forgeries.

Sir C. Mordaunt stated, that all the respectable inhabitants of Birmingham were so shocked at the facilities and consequent encouragement to forgery which the present system afforded, that they intended to present a petition to the house, praying, that some measures might be devised to prevent the progress of an evil so afflicting to humanity, and so injurious to the morals of the country.

Mr. Alderman Wood expressed his conviction that nine out of ten of the prosecutions for forgery in London, originated with persons who were paid for exciting others to commit the crime. This he was enabled to state from official experience and authentic information. Was not the present system, then, such as called loudly for the interposition of the legislature? How came it, he would ask, that the brother of the unfortunate female who was sentenced to die on Friday for forgery, was allowed to escape by a police-officer, while his sister, whom that brother had led into crime, was prosecuted and condemned to death?

Mr. Grenfell, after eulogizing the able and luminous speech of the hon. and learned mover, asked, how it had happened that the Bank directors never acted upon the invention of Mr. Tilloch, which was submitted to them in 1797, accompanied by a certificate from the most distinguished engravers in the empire, that that invention was incapable of imitation? He thought it was incumbent on the Bank not only to shew their anxiety, but to prove that they had something in hand on the subject. He trusted the house would feel it its duty to do every thing in its power towards coming to a desirable conclusion on that most important business.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer conceived that the production of the numbers of prosecutions and convictions would answer every reasonable purpose, and that there would be no necessity for a statement of the expenses which the Bank had incurred in the conduct of prosecutions, in the view of a just and moral consideration of the subject. It appeared that the hon. and learned gentleman suspected that the Bank had recourse to the abominable practice of employing spies and informers (hear) in consequence of the supposed amount of their expenses for prosecutions; and that they paid sums of money for the treacherous practice of inveigling individuals. (Hear.) He believed, that such suspicions were wholly unfounded, as far as they related to so respectable and honourable a body as the directors of the Bank. He had the satisfaction of knowing many of them, and from the bottom of his heart he believed them incapable of acts which ought to produce such suspicions. He must, therefore, beg the hon. and learned gentleman to make some explanation as to what had fallen from him, which seemed to imply suspicions of that nature. He thought also that what the hon. and learned gentleman had said respecting judicial proceedings required explanation, and that it was more especially due from him, as he had occupied a judicial situation himself.

Mr. Bennet animadverted upon the system of prosecution instituted by the Bank, and especially upon the conduct of the Bank solicitor, who had, it appeared, the discretion of selecting such as should be victims, and such as should plead guilty. According to law, to compound a felony was a penal act, but it appeared that the Bank solicitor had in the system of those prosecutions a special immunity. (Hear, hear.) It was an indisputable fact, that a reward of 15*l.* was paid to any person concerned in discovering (which too often meant creating) the crime of forgery. No less than 30*l.* was paid to the police officer who arrested and prosecuted two poor lads who were lately transported to Botany Bay, after having been sentenced to death for a crime, the commission of which that officer might have prevented. But every agent in prosecutions instituted by the Bank was rewarded, while every one they prosecuted was sure to be punished. The punishments were so numerous and so severe as to defeat their own object, for the feeling of the country revolted against them. There had been several convictions for forgery lately, at the country assizes, which were not followed by death. At Kingston, for instance, there was a conviction for forging seamen's wills, but execution was not the consequence. No;—there the Bank was not the prosecutor; for where the Bank prosecuted, no mercy was to be expected, as appeared from their rigour with regard to the unhappy woman who was sentenced to death on Friday. The Bank might think to persevere in its system, but a change must take place; for however the Bank directors might be supported by the right hon. gentleman (the chancellor of the exchequer), the country would not much longer endure such horrible blood-shedding. (Hear, hear!)

Mr. Thompson observed, that the Bank of England notes were such as any bungling engraver could imitate, though the Bank committee were said to have sat 15 years on this subject. Country bankers had issued notes with impressions on both sides, executed by good artists, and they were very rarely forged. He would appeal to the feelings of the directors of the Bank, and ask them, whether, if there was an increased issue of their notes, which was now very possible, there would not be more forgeries? People in the country were afraid of a Bank of England note. He believed there were many more forged ones in circulation than had been presented for payment, and that the Bank of England had committed great mistakes on the subject. Lately a man was hanged at York, and he heard his confession. He stated, that he had bought the notes at Birmingham, as he had done previously. He (Mr. Thompson) believed, that he had a tolerable good knowledge of a real or forged note, but he must confess that he had great difficulty in ascertaining the notes which that unfortunate man had uttered. The fact was, that at Birmingham there were manufactories of forged notes. (Hear.) Devices of different descriptions on both sides of a note rendered the forging of them more difficult; but the Bank of England notes were badly executed, and the Roman candle figure rendered them more easy of imitation.

Mr. Dickinson suggested, that the Bank should pay their solicitor a stated salary, instead of paying him according to the number of convictions. He had seen a letter from the Bank solicitor which shewed an eagerness for prosecutions. Long ago, bishop Burnet remarked, that the Bank were getting so much power, that, in a short time, they might not be controlled by the country. If one of their clerks were now committed by the Court of King's Bench for an assault, he received, as a compensation, two or three hundred pounds from the funds of that corporation. (Hear, hear.) The Bank said to the chancellor of the exchequer, "Pay us what you owe us, and then we shall consider what we will do." To the public they said, "You may take these spurious notes on our character, and we will not repay them, though we are the cause of their fabrication and issue." (Hear.)

Mr. Babington said, he knew a country bank in which not one forged note in a year occurred, while the forged Bank of England notes appeared every week. The mischief long sustained by the country by these forged notes, had been stated at 25,000*l.* a-year. He believed it might be estimated at double that sum. A great number of them never found their way to the Bank. After circulation, they were either torn to pieces or put into the fire; and these amounted to more than went to the Bank. A bank in his neighbourhood had issued notes payable at their own office, or in London, and they became plagued with forgeries: but when they confined themselves to a small circle, and made them payable at their own compter only, then the forgeries ceased.

General Thornton approved of the motion, which was conformable to what he had originally proposed.

Mr. B. Shaw said, that the Bank should encourage artists to discover the best mode of preventing forgery. A public reward should be offered. No money could be better laid out.

Mr. Hart Davis said, the best artists had been employed by the Bank, in vain. With respect to country notes, he begged to observe, that he had seen some, executed by a most distinguished artist, which had been so completely forged, that, when brought before him, he could not distinguish the false from the true one.

Mr. S. Thornton contended, that Bank prosecutions had been conducted with the utmost possible moderation. No expenses had been incurred for the purpose of entrapping persons. To prove these assertions, the accounts of the Bank would be presented without any objection. (Hear, hear.)

Sir James Macintosh said, he availed himself of the courtesy of the house, not for the purpose of reply, but strictly to explain two parts of his speech, which seemed to have been misunderstood by the right hon. gentleman opposite. Of the judges of the land, he felt always disposed to speak, not only in respectful but in reverential terms. If he had used any disrespectful terms, they must have proceeded from the warmth of the moment; he was not conscious of it, and did not believe he had done it. He had merely complained of the severe jurisprudence on this subject. He had also intended to have spoken of the directors with respect, as the managers of a useful public institution. Of them, all he had said was, that if they refused the object of his motion, they would excite a prejudice, a suspicion, that something was concealed. Much was he, therefore, surprised to be charged with disrespect towards them, but much more to be charged with disrespect towards the judges, who must ever deserve veneration, if they should not deserve punishment, for there was no medium. The discussion for the last half-hour had wandered from the object of the motion, to a subject on which he should bring forward a motion afterwards, perhaps that day se'ennight, if, unfortunately, the motion of his right hon. friend for Friday should be rejected.

The several motions were then put, and carried without a division. When the last motion relative to the expenses of prosecutions was agreed to, the opposition benches returned several cheers.

MOCK AUCTIONS.] On the motion of Mr. Alderman Atkins, a select committee was appointed, "to take into consideration the laws relating to auctions, and to report the same, with their observations thereupon, to the house."

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Wednesday, April 22.

INCOMES OF THE ROYAL DUKES.] The Marquis of Downshire rose to move that the paper, containing an account of the income of the royal dukes, which was yesterday laid before the house, be printed. He wished at the same time to take this opportunity of observing, that in moving for this account, it had been far from his intention to shew any disrespect towards the royal persons to whose affairs it related. His only object was to obtain accurate information on the subject. As a proposition for increasing the incomes of some of the royal dukes had been brought under the consideration of the house, he thought it right that their lordships should have before them a correct statement of the present income of their royal highnesses. Having said this much on the subject of his motion, he could not help, while he was on his legs, expressing his satisfaction at hearing that it was intended to make some modification in the window duty. That tax had proved a severe burden on Ireland, and he was happy that there was a disposition to grant some relief with respect to it. He concluded by moving that the account of the income of the royal dukes be printed.—Ordered.

Their lordships then adjourned till Friday, the 24th instant.

Wednesday, April 22.

TYBURN TICKETS.] A petition was presented from the town of Manchester, setting forth, "That the parish of Manchester comprizes twenty-nine townships, and its population is also extremely numerous, wherefore offences do not unfrequently occur; that, within the last four years, fourteen certificates in respect of offences committed within that parish, have been actually sold and assigned at various prices, from 250*l.* to about 300*l.* each, and the immediate object of the purchasers, in these cases, was to obtain their exemption from the very burthensome, though highly important, public offices in the township of Manchester; that gentlemen well calculated, and generally most fit for the performance of the essential duties of the boroughreeve and constables, churchwardens, and overseers of the poor of Manchester, are by these means relieved from all liability to the execution of such offices, but this relief operates seriously to the prejudice of the public interest, and, at the same time, unjustly increases the hardship upon the remaining inhabitants, who are properly eligible for the above appointments; the petitioners, therefore, humbly submit to the house, the expediency of wholly prohibiting the transfer of future certificates of exemption, which will, in a material degree, obviate the evils complained of; and pray that a law may be passed for the purpose of preventing the transfer of all subsequent certificates of exemption."—Ordered to lie on the table.

CONTEMPT OF COURT.] Mr. Bennet presented the following petition of persons confined in the Fleet prison for contempt of the court of chancery. "That the petitioners have been confined in the Fleet prison for a great length of time, some sixteen years; and they beg leave most humbly to shew, that they have done every thing that their lawyers have directed them to do to comply with the terms of the court of chancery, the orders of which they have no intent whatever to oppose; and that they have been the melancholy witnesses of the death lately of six persons confined under similar circumstances to their own, one thirty-four years confined, one eighteen, one four, and one three; and they have no hope of ever regaining the blessings of liberty but through the interference of the house, which they most humbly implore."

Mr. Bennet said, it was with the persons who held high legal situations that the remedy of this evil rested. After the indifference that had been shewn to these cases of grievous and disproportionate or unmerited suffering, he almost despaired of a beneficial result; but he had the satisfaction to know that he had done his duty.

The petition was ordered to be printed.

EDUCATION OF THE POOR BILL.] Mr. Brougham, on moving that the committee on this bill be deferred till Monday, observed, that some facts had come to his knowledge which proved most strongly the necessity of strictly inquiring into the application of charitable funds, and the inadequacy of any general demands for returns to parliament on this subject. The information was on the authority of a gentleman in Berkshire, a barrister, who was not personally known to him, but who was well known to the members connected with that county. This gentleman stated, that the returns under the act of 1787-8, commonly called Mr. Gilbert's Act, had not been faithfully made—that in Berkshire, where he had made inquiries for a work which he was about to publish, the incomes of the charitable funds had been returned as 7000*l*. a-year; while their real income was 20,000*l*. Of 25 public benefactions in that county, no return whatever had been made. He stated also, that of enormous balances in the hands of trustees, no notice was taken, nor of the balances due by one set of trustees to another. This statement would shew more than any reasoning, the futility of calling for returns, without a strict local investigation.

CONTAGIOUS FEVER IN IRELAND.] Sir J. Newport, in rising to call the attention of the house to the prevalence of contagious disease in Ireland, said, that the welfare of so large a portion of the empire—a country containing 19 millions of acres, and at least six millions of people, could not fail to be an object of the deepest interest. Various causes had been assigned for the contagious malady, which now infected that country, and he was most desirous that the house, by the appointment of a committee, should obtain correct information on that subject. On the extent of fever, there was some information to be obtained from the number of patients in the fever hospitals, where those institutions, to which he felt proud that he had first called the attention of the house, existed. In seven months, 10,321 patients had been admitted into the fever hospital at Dublin. In Cork, where the fever had raged dreadfully, 10,040 had been admitted into the hospital in the same time; and in the little town of Boyle 800 had been admitted in five months; and in Waterford 1200. One of his objects was, to prevent the funds which had been bestowed on fever hospitals from being dilapidated or misapplied. He imagined the committee, which he should move for, would find that an efficient cause of fever was the want of employment for productive labour. He wished that the permanent causes of fever in Ireland should be investigated, and that the means of prevention should be considered. The hon. baronet, after giving his testimony and thanks to the Irish government for their exertions to arrest this evil, concluded by moving, "That a select committee be appointed to inquire into the state of Ireland, as to the prevalence of contagious fever in that part of the United Kingdom, and to investigate the causes, temporary and permanent, which have led to the increased progress of this destructive malady during the last and the present year, and to report the same, with their observations thereupon, to the house; and also to report such measures, remedial and preventive, as may seem most efficacious to arrest its further extension, to guard, as far as human foresight can provide, against its recurrence, and to secure adequate means of support to the establishments destined for the relief of the diseased."

Mr. Peel said, if the hon. bart. had not brought forward this motion, he should have felt it his duty to do so himself. Perhaps the house might expect from him some information, as he had certainly an opportunity, officially, of receiving more than many others, both as to the extent and progress of the contagion. He could not, however, then enter into any minute particulars, but would make a few observations generally, from the different reports from places where the disease had assumed peculiar features of malignity. The period at which this took place was early in September, though the disease had existed in many places three or four months previously. In fact, a low fever had prevailed in Ireland for three or four years past: but, in the beginning of last September, it became peculiarly alarming. He then took proper measures to ascertain the opinions of skilful medical men, and he had received reports from them, from the four provinces of Ireland. The fever first prevailed in the province of Ulster. All the medical men, in their reports, referred its origin to the same lamentable causes—the extreme poverty of the lower orders, the defective quality of their provisions, the depression of mind resulting from want of employment and the unpromising prospect before them. Besides, there had previously been a very wet season, which greatly deteriorated the quality of the food they generally subsisted upon, and also deprived them in a great degree of another necessary of life, by preventing their laying in a stock of fuel. These accounts had concurred from all quarters. Many attributed one cause of the spreading of infection to the great number of wandering beggars, rendered so by want of employment, and who went about begging from mere poverty. Another peculiar cause was said to be the practice in that country, of assembling in great numbers at funerals, where a deceased individual might infect all that were present. It was also a consideration, lamentable and affecting, that the contagion was actually spread in some degree by the kindness and hospitality of the lower orders in Ireland, who would not shut their doors against the unfortunate and wandering mendicant, whose sufferings they sympathized with and deplored; to which they would sacrifice their own personal security. The conduct of the Irish people in this respect was very remarkable, under their calamities and dangers. It reminded him of a passage in Lucretius, in his description of the dreadful effects of the plague at Athens. Athens was, like Ireland, strongly attached to ceremonious attentions to the dead, which the horrors of the plague suspended:

> Quo prius hic populus semper consuerat humari.

But the people of Ireland could not depart from their ancient custom of honouring the memories of their deceased countrymen, even in the midst of infection and death*. He had already observed, that the greatest malignity commenced in September. From thence to February, upwards of 7000 were admitted to the Dublin fever hospitals. On the 28th of February the numbers were 1001. There was an increase, from February to March the 14th, of 73, the number being at the latter period 1074. The total of deaths in six months was 466, and the proportion of deaths to admissions was 1 to 16. The average of daily admissions in Dublin was 39 at the hospitals. The proportion of deaths in the different hospitals varied from 1 in 13 to 1 in 19. Means were promptly taken to extend accommodation as far as was possible, and the city of Dublin was divided into four districts for inspection; but he thought he should not be too sanguine in saying that since March the 14th, there had been a considerable abatement of the calamity, both in its character and its extent. He was desirous of referring such details as he was in possession of to the consideration of the committee. He had great hopes of the abatement of the contagion, not only from the general returns, but from accurate accounts kept in Dublin. In the last month, 224 patients had been dismissed, and the proportion of the deaths had been decreased. In the hospital there had been discharged 1839, and 89 deaths, up to last month. The accounts received also represented the western districts as much improved with respect to the influence of the disorder. He was glad to find that the hon. baronet did not mean to devolve on the committee, at the commencement of their inquiries, an examination into the causes of the calamity, as arising from the non-employment of the poor. He had deeply and anxiously considered the important subject of the employment of so large a population. It must be seen by gentlemen, that to attempt creating artificial labour for the people by the interference of the government would, in its consequences, be, in fact, only deferring the evil day. Nothing was more common in Ireland than for government to receive suggestions from individuals for the employment of labourers by means of the public purse. Some individuals had found much improvement by what they had done in their own immediate neighbourhoods. No doubt, from such measures, some partial temporary good might accrue; but the funds for such a purpose must be taken from the great national reservoir of the public means, which should be the regular and natural promoter and cherisher of labour. It was said, that it was easy to apply 5000*l.* or 6000*l.* to such or such an establishment of a charitable description, as such sums were comparatively small when compared with the whole of the expenditure and revenue. Other suggestions, of a more objectionable nature, were submitted. It had been proposed, by persons of good principles and character, that applications should be made to government to supply loans; some of these were connected with the manufactures; and it was in vain to tell them, so as to convince them, that if they could not find customers for the articles they might under such circumstances manufacture, they would be increasing the evil, by increasing an unsaleable stock on hand. There were undoubtedly many difficulties attending the subject, and the evils were much to be lamented. He should second the hon. baronet's motion, and wished to give the committee all possible information.

* The practice of "watching the dead" is very common among the Irish. Watching with a corpse was an ancient custom of the church, and every where practised. They were wont to sit by it, from the time of its death to its exportation to the grave, either in the house it died in, or in the church itself. It is called the Lake-wake; a word derived from the Anglo-Saxon Lic, or Licc, a corpse, and Wæcce, a wake, vigil, or watching. It is used in this sense by Chaucer, in his Knight's Tale.

> Ne howe that Arcite is brent to ashen colde,
> Ne howe that there the lyche-wake was holde
> All that night long. Fol. 11. Ed. 1542.

See Brand's Observations on Popular Antiquities, ch. 2. p. 21.

Mr. Bennet agreed with the hon. baronet who had moved, and with the right hon. gentleman who had seconded, the motion. He rose, therefore, not for the purpose of saying any thing on that part of the subject, but in order to suggest that the Fever-hospital in the metropolis should likewise be recommended to the attention of the committee. It was matter equally of surprise and regret, that, in the metropolis of the British empire, there was no fever institution supported by public contribution. This was a subject deserving of the greatest attention. If patients of this description increased as they had done of late, the atmosphere breathed by the most populous parts of the metropolis would become polluted, the disease would get firmly and incurably established, misery and death would extend the most fearful ravages. (Hear, hear.) The effect had often been already, that sick nurses and medical students fell victims to the disease. The rapid increase of contagious fever had some time since given rise to a small institution for its cure. Within the last six months, there were in this institution not less than 700 patients. The annual revenue was not more than 400*l.* An appeal had lately been made to public benevolence, and between 2 and 3000*l.* were collected; but this was hardly sufficient to clear away the debts of the institution. The government had recently given the magistrates 1000*l.* towards defraying the expenses of this institution; but that was a very inadequate grant for the support of fever hospitals in the metropolis of the country. It was the duty of government, in his opinion, to support, if not to establish, an institution of this nature. There were many hospitals, with great funds, in this metropolis, but their regulation and conduct were much inferior to those upon the continent. It could not be unknown to any one acquainted with the hospitals at Paris and Vienna, that those of this country were very inferior. He therefore wished that the state of the Fever-hospital in London should also form a part of the inquiry of the proposed committee.

Mr. Wilberforce agreed with his hon. friend as to the necessity of inquiring into this subject, and hoped that a greater supply would be granted by government. He could not but persuade himself, that, upon inquiry, the necessity of giving a more liberal supply would become quite evident. Public liberality must be extended with more satisfaction, when it was found that no institution was more successful or attended with less inconvenience. He remembered when the prejudice against such institutions was so great, as to render any attempts to extend their benefits ineffectual. This prejudice was now happily removed, and none contributed more to remove it than the enlightened and humane Dr. Murray. Contagion was most likely to be prevented by the removal of patients from their own habitations to hospitals. This subject, therefore, well deserved a committee for itself. (Hear, hear.) Beneficence was part of our national character. It was the glory of this country, a glory which the most polished states of antiquity could not boast, that there was no form of misery for which there was not an asylum, and relief in some shape or other*. The higher orders never suffered an appeal to be made in vain to their humanity; and among the most active promoters of every scheme of charity, many members of the royal family could be mentioned. Parliament could not surely be backward in co-operating in these good works; yet he believed this was the only country in which government did not defray the expenses of hospitals. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Brougham confirmed the statement of

* On examining the ancient history not only of the Greeks but of other people, one is surprised to find how little occurs with regard to establishments for the sick. Anna Comnena gives us a long and elaborate description of a magnificent hospital erected by her father, the emperor Alexius, about the year 1110, which seems to be one of the first endowed foundations of the kind among the Greeks. She says, that Alexius built a new town in a quadrangular form, near the mouth of the Euxine sea; and among the new erected buildings, there were Hospitals, which he founded out of compassion for human infirmities, and for the comfortable subsistence of the maimed and the invalids. One might see there the blind and the lame, as formerly in Solomon's porch, which was filled with the diseased of all kinds. The building was double, and raised two stories high. It was of such a vast extent, that an entire view of it could scarcely be taken in one day. Though the inhabitants of this town, and those placed in this hospital, had neither lands nor possessions, and were reduced to a poverty equal to that of Job, they never failed to receive from the liberal hand of this prince, every thing that was necessary for their maintenance and support. And what is more strange and surprising, the persons who seemed to have nothing, had their receivers and stewards; insomuch that those of the first rank piqued themselves in taking care of their affairs. By which means great purchases were made, and great benefactions continually given to carry on so charitable a work, which she, the author of the History, lived to see finished. But Alexius first made the establishment of it, assigned the revenues for it by land and sea, and ordered that one of the prime ministers should always have the inspection of it. Though there were soldiers, who had been disabled, and old men incapable of any labour entertained here, it was called the Hospital of Orphans, because generally there was a greater number of these than of any others. There were letters patent sealed by the Golden Bull, to ascertain and secure the funds and the annual income of it. The receivers were obliged to keep an exact account, in order to justify themselves, that they did not embezzle that money which was allotted for the poor.—Procopius tells us indeed, that Justinian (who reigned in the year 527,) founded several such hospitals; but gives no particular account of them, as he does of the other edifices built by that emperor.—See Freind's Hist. of Phys. v. 1. p. 282.

the hon. member. The hospitals on the continent were managed in a superior way; but then, the expense of those hospitals was defrayed by the government, which, of course, had an arbitrary control over them, while the hospitals of this country were, for by far the most part, maintained by voluntary contributions.

Mr. Philips stated, that the hospitals at Manchester were managed with considerable judgment, and especially the establishment for the cure and prevention of fever. But still he concurred with the opinion, that government should interpose to establish hospitals throughout the country for the purpose of guarding against the propagation of contagious diseases.

Sir S. Romilly expressed his regret to find, that the Institution in London for the cure of Fevers was so inadequately supported by the contribution of government, as well as by public beneficence. The subject was of such importance, that he hoped his hon. friend, the member for Shrewsbury, who had so laudably called the attention of the house to it, would, in the course of the evening, move for the appointment of a distinct committee of inquiry. The fever which raged in London was, it appeared, very seldom fatal to the very poorer orders; but, when communicated to those who were better fed, many instances of mortality had occurred. It was obviously necessary to provide every possible guard against the propagation of contagion. He was sorry to understand, that every effort to maintain the Fever Institution by public subscription had failed. But it was the duty of government to erect an establishment of this nature, and he was confident that no objection would be expressed or felt in that house or throughout the country, against any expense that might be incurred in the construction or support of such an establishment. Government, he understood, contributed 1000*l.* annually to the assistance of the Fever Institution; but some years ago between 2 and 3000*l.* were advanced at a time when the fever was by no means so dangerous or prevalent.

The motion was agreed to, and a committee appointed. And, on the motion of Mr. Bennet, a committee was also appointed "to examine into the state of contagious fever in this metropolis, and into the condition of the institution for the cure and prevention of the same, and report the same, with their observations thereupon, to the house."

SLAVES IN THE COLONIES.] Mr. Wilberforce said, he had to apologize to the house for having delayed so long to bring this subject before them, but he had not been able to proceed otherwise. He was now only to move for certain West India papers, which would lay the foundation of some farther steps. After the abolition of the direct slave trade, the next great object was, the alleviation of the miseries, and the improvement of the condition, of the slaves who had been previously in the West Indies. He could with confidence affirm, that the shutting out of all external supplies of slaves was the surest mode of ameliorating the condition of the slaves who were there. In vain were the best internal regulations adopted, if influxes of fresh slaves supplied the markets, and deranged every attempt at gradual improvement. The morals, the comforts, and the happiness of the internal slaves were sure to be in some measure consulted, if their masters knew of no other supply. It was on this account that he had so strongly approved of the bill introduced by an hon. and learned friend (Mr. Brougham) to whom the cause of the abolition was, on many occasions, so greatly indebted. The act which made the traffic in slaves felony, did great good; but more than this was required. It was necessary to make it so clear, so palpable, so undeniable, that fresh supplies of slaves were not to be obtained; that their masters must look upon it as a thing quite impossible. It was upon this principle that he had two years ago proposed a bill of registration, a measure to which it could not be supposed that he entertained a bigotted attachment, or even a parental feeling, since it was not his own offspring, but that of an hon. and learned friend. He entreated the house, however, to consider whether any other measure was likely to prove so effectual, and whether it was possible to accomplish the end which all now professed to have in view, without guarding in the strictest manner against every variety of evasion. Perhaps it might be thought by some that he felt an unreasonable jealousy on this subject. He was not much disposed to controversy, but when he recollected what had always been the declared sentiments of those on the other side of the water, and that not only the general voice in the West India Islands, but the opinions of all their historians and legislators had uniformly been, that no arrangement of naval search could prevent continued importations, he could not regard himself as appearing singular in entertaining his present apprehensions. If he found this opinion now changed in the West Indies, was it not, under all the circumstances, a source of natural suspicion? With respect to the argument that the prosecution of the work had better be left to the colonial legislatures, he had not, when it was brought forward, felt so sanguine as many others in his expectations from that quarter. He had, notwithstanding, assented to the propriety of leaving it to them to make the experiment, and of waiting to see the result of their several endeavours. The object of his motion now was, to obtain information as to what had been done in conformity with this arrangement. It might be said, that these proceedings ought still to be left to the voluntary zeal and to the efforts of the affluent and liberal members of the West-India body; but it had ever been to him a subject of deep regret and continued disappointment, to see that more enlightened portion of the colonial interest making common cause with classes of a different description. He had always distinguished, in his own mind, these separate orders of that great society; he had always ascribed many of the evils he deplored to the absence of the larger proprietors; and had earnestly wished to see them acting and thinking for themselves, in the introduction of reform and gradual amelioration. When, however, it was known, that the recommendations of such men as Mr. Ellis and Mr. Barham had failed to make any impression on the colonial assemblies, he could place no firm dependence, except on the legislation of the mother country, and could put his trust in no other guarantee than one which should render the commission of the offence impracticable without detection and punishment. This, he thought, would be the operation of an act for establishing a registry of slaves in our West India colonies by authority of parliament. The house would see, when the papers for which he intended to move were presented, what had been done; and he hoped they would remember, that it was their duty to watch over the interests of a million and a half of beings who were at length recognized as their fellow-creatures. Their condition and their claims were entitled to the most serious consideration, and required the exercise of the utmost attention to the question, whether it was possible to prevent illicit importation by any other means than the measure he had recommended. He should conclude by suggesting, that our own exertions in this cause, in our negotiations with the other powers of Europe, imposed upon us the additional task, with a view of completing the work in which we had so meritoriously engaged, of preventing, in future, all this improper intercourse between Africa and the West Indies.—He then moved, "that there be laid before this house, copies of all laws passed in or for any British colonies since the year 1812, and not already presented to this house, respecting the condition and treatment of slaves, or the prevention of the illicit importation of slaves; and also respecting the condition of the free coloured population."

Mr. Goulburn said, that no duty could be more gratifying to him, than to afford every support to those enactments of the legislature, in the passing of which his hon. friend had acted so humane and enlightened a part. Whenever he differed from him, it was not, he assured him, as to the object, but as to the means best adapted to arrive at their common end. To the measure of a registration he was not hostile, but he believed the object could be best accomplished by first conciliating the good disposition of the colonists to its introduction. It were better, in his judgment, to have a measure less perfect, with the acquiescence and cordial support of those who were to execute it, than a more perfect measure, opposed by their prepossessions against it. He had ever thought that the abolition of the slave trade must be the first point from which an amelioration in the condition of the slaves must flow. The sense of their own interest would induce them to look to the well being of their slaves. From the ruin in which the planters, during the commercial embarrassments of the last war, were involved, it was actually impossible to pay the attention that was due to that part of their interests, but now that the fortunate change of circumstances promised the most prosperous results, he believed that the day was not far distant, when such a change would take place in the condition of the black population of the colonies, as would be most beneficial to them, and highly honourable to the character of this country.

Mr. Marryat said, that circumstances were now proving, that, in opposition to all the inflammatory language, and calumnies of the last thirty years, the colonists were disposed to perform every thing that the country could expect from them. It was in the nature of things, that when the supply of foreign negroes was cut off, the planters must, as well from interest as inclination, attend to the improvement of the condition of their slaves.

Mr. W. Smith thought the hon. gentleman might have spared his reproach, even if it were well founded, at a time when all sides were disposed to congratulate each other on the prospect of success in their endeavours on this subject. In reviewing the conduct of himself, and the other abolitionists, who persevered to the accomplishment of that great measure, he never would accept, or acknowledge, the imputation of having dealt in either inflammatory or calumnious languag

The motion was then agreed to.

Mr. Wilberforce, before he proposed his next motion, was anxious to state, that he felt as strongly as his hon. friend (Mr. Goulburn), the beneficial effects of having allied to their cause the good-will of the masters of the slaves. But he should not act honestly, if he did not declare his jealousy on that point. He was an old soldier in this warfare. His hon. friend was much younger, and youth was the season of confidence. It was under the influence of experience also, that he received with indifference the imputations of the hon. member, to which his hon. friend had adverted. Indeed, when he heard such observations advanced in that quarter, he always attributed them to the situation which the hon. gentleman held. He could not, however, agree with him, that the supply of foreign negroes was entirely cut off in the West Indies. He believed he could point out instances of recent importation. It was never his opinion that the simple abolition of the slave trade would afford a sufficient remedy. Neither did he now think that the registration, important and necessary as it was, would wholly remove the abuse. He knew that he had been considered too moderate by many. Indeed, his deceased friend, the late Mr. Dundas, had gone the length of proposing to emancipate all slaves born after the year 1800.—The hon. member concluded with moving, "that there be laid before the house, copies or extracts of such accounts as have been received from the said colonies respectively since 1807, and have not been hitherto laid before this house, shewing the increase and decrease of the number of slaves; and also of the free coloured and white population; also, the present numbers of the above classes; and as far as the same can be given, the changes in the relative proportion of males and females in the slave population."

This motion was agreed to.

Mr. Wilberforce next moved for "copies or extracts of all acts passed in furtherance of the objects of the address of this house, of June 19, 1816, 'That his royal highness would be pleased to recommend in the strongest manner, to the local authorities in the respective colonies, to carry into effect any measure which may tend to promote the moral and religious improvement, as well as the comfort and happiness of the negroes."—Also, "copies of all executive and judicial proceedings held in any of the said colonies, connected with, or in furtherance of the objects of the said address; together with copies or extracts of all such correspondence relative to the said objects, as may be communicated without detriment to the public service."

These motions were agreed to.

Slaves in Dominica.] Sir Samuel Romilly rose to submit a motion regarding the state and condition of slaves in the island of Dominica. The hon. and learned gentleman said, his only object was, that the house might be put in possession of information that had come to his knowledge, respecting the state of the law, and the mode in which it was administered in that island. From the inquiries which he had made, he had no doubt of the accuracy of the facts which he was about to state; but if any thing could be proved in contradiction of his statement, he should be ready to pay the utmost deference to it. In the last session of parliament he had moved for a return of copies of the presentment of the grand jury of the island of Dominica, in February 1817, and of the bills of indictment referred to in that presentment. Those papers were laid on the table on the 11th of July, and were ordered to be printed. (See Vol. I. p. 1817.) They did not, however, go far enough; and, therefore, he should now move for copies or extracts of all papers in the possession of the Secretary of State relative to the treatment of slaves in that island. It appeared, that in the spring of 1817 several cases came before the grand jury, and some of them shewed that the greatest cruelty had been exercised on the persons of slaves, by their masters. The first of them was a case in which John Baptiste Louis Birmingham, doctor of medicine, was charged with having violently, cruelly, and immoderately scourged and flogged certain slaves, the property of and belonging to the said John Baptiste Louis Birmingham. If the slaves had been guilty of the misdemeanours with which they were charged, they were liable to 39 lashes; but they were not found guilty, and yet, as soon as they were acquitted, they were brought out into the public market-place and underwent the penalties limited by the law. This bill was thrown out by the Grand Jury. Another case was that in which John M'Corry, esq. was charged with having, with cords, whips, sticks, and rods, immoderately scourged and flogged his slave, Jemmy, who, it was stated, had been guilty of drunkenness, quarrelling, fighting, neglect of duty, absence from labour, or absence from the plantation, without a written pass. This bill also was thrown out. A third case was (and a most horrible one it was) that of Alexander Le Guay, of the said island, planter, who was charged with having assaulted his female slave, named Jeanton, and that he did confine the said Jeanton in an iron chain, by affixing and fastening the same with padlocks in and upon the neck, arms, and legs, of the said Jeanton, such punishment not being prescribed in and by a certain act of that island in such case made and provided; and it was further charged, that the said Alexander le Guay maimed, defaced, mutilated, and cruelly tortured the said Jeanton, by fracturing, and causing to be fractured, her arm. This bill likewise was thrown out. But, not contented with this, the grand jury thought fit to declare, that these several indictments were nothing more nor less than nuisances. Their words, as appeared by the return made to the house, were these: "The grand jury have further to present the dangerous consequences which are likely to occur from the number of indictments for unmerited punishments inflicted on negroes by their owners, managers, or employers, which have been laid before them this day, unsupported by any evidence whatsoever; on the contrary, it appeared from the evidence, that in some of the cases the negroes merited the punishment they received." This presentment was dated Dominica, grand jury room, the 4th day of February, 1817: and was signed by John Gordon, foreman. In consequence of these proceedings, the attorney-general (W. W. Glanville) thought it expedient to have recourse to informations, considering it not right to trust to grand juries again. (Hear, hear.) The house had heard the nature of the offences with which the parties were charged, but in each case the persons were acquitted. Now it was well known that, in England, the information of an attorney-general was regarded as an odious proceeding; but it appeared that, in Dominica, the attorney-general deemed it an expedient measure for the protection of the black population of the island. (Hear, hear.) He was sure that the house could not but be sensible of the necessity of affording the greatest encouragement to the government of these islands to take the slaves under their protection. The laws were beneficent—but what availed the laws, when the unhappy slaves could not derive protection from them? Neither the slave, nor his family, nor friends, could obtain any redress against the cruelties of his master. The slave was cruelly treated, and the public sympathized with the master. (Hear, hear.) It was the duty of the government to protect the laws, and, without that protection, no security could be afforded. He was disposed to speak kindly of the West-Indian legislatures; but he would ask again, to what purpose were such laws enacted, if they were not observed? There was a general concurrence in opinion in the West India islands, that nothing was more improper than to interfere between master and slave: it was thought to have a tendency to excite a disposition on the part of the slaves to revolt. This, he believed, was the general impression; but he should be glad to find that he was mistaken. The object of his motion was, to confine the inquiry to the island of Dominica; and he was sure that such an opinion prevailed there. In Dominica, there was a species of punishment called "The Public Chain;" and, if any master thought that his slave had offended, he had a right to send him to that punishment. Men, boys, and even girls of the most tender age, had been subjected to this mode of torture; and the governor found that he could not interfere. The governor, willing to alleviate the sufferings of these wretched people, consulted the attorney-general, who gave an opinion, that he had no right to remit the punishment awarded by the master. It appeared that, in the island of St. Domingo, the slaves were liable to be sent to the public chain, and from a work which he then held in his hand, the cruelties inflicted by this kind of punishment were described as follows: "the slave who has been found guilty of any misdemeanor shall be put into the workhouse, where his labours are much harder than in the usual course of employment; he is employed to dig, and to perform other difficult duties, with a chain fixed about his body, and attached to other culprits, leaving him merely room to walk, whilst he is driven on to work by cattle whips, and other modes of castigation." (Hear, hear.) If the evils that existed in the administration of the laws in the colonies could be remedied, it should be done without delay. If it were possible that any check could be given to grand juries and to petty juries in Dominica, it should be given with the utmost promptitude. He confessed that he was not able himself to suggest any remedy, and he was disposed to think that no remedy could be procured but by the interference of the British legislature, and by their imposing a duty upon persons in the island, unconnected with the island, having no local tie to it, and comparatively without interest in it, to cause them to maintain the laws. The only effective remedy, in his opinion, would be that which had been recommended by Mr. Burke to Mr. Dundas, which was, to constitute the attorney-general in every island guardian of the slaves, to make it an essential part of his duty to interpose between the master and the slave when there should be a necessity. By such a regulation, it would become his duty to see that the slaves were properly treated.—There was another thing which he thought necessary, though he did not say that it would be resorted to; he only thought it his duty to mention it, and that was, the legislation of this country for the colonies. The idea of that had excited great discontent; it had been said, that this country had not properly the power of legislating for her colonies. It was needless for him to state, that that had been already done in numerous instances. He might only mention, that it had been done in the act by which colonial property was made liable as assets for debt. He might refer to that series of political controversy that had taken place during the American war. It had been said, that England could not legislate for her colonies on the very principles of her own constitution, and that they ought to enjoy that constitution. Taking the matter, however, seriously into consideration, no man could for a moment imagine that the constitution could immediately apply to any of these colonies. The constitution should be taken in every part; it should be taken as a whole. It held, that all men stood in a state of equality; that all men stood equal by the law; and that was talked of where it could not possibly exist. The moment an individual set his foot upon the British shore, he became as free as any other individual *. But what could be more inconsistent than the conduct of those

* See Salk. 666.—Hence it may be said, that the spirit of liberty is rooted in our very soil. When an attempt was made to introduce slavery, by statute 1 Edw.VI. c. 3, which ordained, that all idle vagabonds should be made slaves, and fed upon bread, water, or small drink, and refuse meat; should wear a ring of iron round their necks, arms, or legs; and should be compelled, by beating, chaining, or otherwise, to perform the work assigned them, were it never so vile; the spirit of the nation could not brook this condition, even in the most abandoned rogues; and, therefore, this statute was repealed in two years afterwards.

It is true, however, that a state of slavery formerly existed in England. The villeins, who resembled the Spartan helots, were either regardant, that is annexed to the manor or land, or else they were in gross, or at large, that is, annexed to the person of the lord, and transferable by deed from one owner to another. They could not leave their lord without his permission; but, if they ran away, or were purloined from him, might be claimed and recovered by action, like beasts or other chattels.—A villein, in short, was in much the same state with us as that of the boors in Denmark, and the traals or slaves in Sweden, which renders it probable that they were monuments of the Danish tyranny. In a former note (page 881,) it is observed, that the last claim of villeinage which we find recorded in our courts, was in the 15th of James I., about which time the race of persons, who were once the objects of it, was completely worn out by the continual and united operation of death and manumissions. It may now be added, that sir Thomas Smith, who was secretary who talked of establishing that principle in the West India islands? The constitution would be then reversed and destroyed. What was recommended would be, under the auspices of British liberty, rendering slavery worse than under the most arbitrary government. Arbitrary governments, indeed, did make laws for their colonies. But that the principle, that no man could be bound by laws to which he had not consented, could be applied to islands so situated, no man could imagine any thing more absurd.—He should now call the attention of the house for a few moments to another subject—he meant to the laws that had been passed in Dominica on the subject of manumission, which had not been attended to. A slave born on the island could not obtain his liberty, without paying a tax of 16*l.* 10*s.*; others, not born on it, were obliged to pay 55*l.* A man of colour, though a freeman of another island, became, by law, a slave, if he did not pay a tax on his arrival at Dominica. So that, a slave once landed on the British coast became a freeman; but a free man of colour, the instant he touched the soil of Demerara, became a slave! There was another law, by which all men of colour found on the island were liable to be taken up as runaways, and then, if they were not claimed by their masters, which could not be if they had no masters, they were sold for the benefit of the public. If a man was not claimed, it was nevertheless taken for granted that he was a slave, and he was sold. These laws were certainly made upon an oppressive principle. Since the abolition, there ought rather to be some measure in favour of manumission than a restraint upon it. There was no man who did not entertain hopes that the time might come when there would be no slavery in any part of the world; but slavery could not be destroyed instantaneously; it could only be done by gradual manumission, by religious instruction, by alterations in the state of marriages, by improving the condition of the slaves. The abolition, he was sorry to say, had not had all the effect that had been anticipated. It was by laws to be made, and by laws to be enforced as well as made, that that object was to be attained. There was very high authority to shew that, with respect to many laws that had passed, it had never been intended that they should be executed. He begged to call the attention of the house to what had been stated by governor Prevost, in a letter to lord Camden, in 1805. He said, "that the act for encouraging the better government of slaves appeared to have been considered, from the day it was passed till this hour, as a political measure, to avert the interference of the mother-country in the management of the slaves." He might ask, whether there remained a doubt that such had been the intention of those laws? It was a duty which this country owed to that part of her dominions; it was a duty of government to take the affairs of Dominica seriously into consideration. It should be recollected that the slaves were subjects of the King; they owed him allegiance, and would be as severely punished as any other men, nay, more so, if they were to violate that allegiance. The King, then, was bound to afford protection to them, as well as to other men; they were as much subjects as Englishmen were. He would not take up the time of the house, but should merely observe shortly upon facts that had taken place on another island; and he should only to Edward VI. says, that, in all his time he never knew any villein in gross throughout the realm; and the few villeins regardant that were then remaining were such only as had belonged to bishops, monasteries, or other ecclesiastical corporations, in the preceding times of popery. (See his Commonw. b. 3. c. 10.)

The love which the people of England cherish for the spirit of liberty, and the beneficial consequences resulting from it, are eloquently described by Mr. Burke in one of his speeches. After having observed, that America would not be taxed to support corruption, but that she would bear any useful or constitutional burthen to support the parent state.—"For that service, for all service," said Mr. Burke, "whether of revenue, trade, or empire, my trust is in her interest in the British constitution. My hold of the colonies is in the close affection which grows from common names, from kindred blood, from similar privileges, and equal protection. These are ties which, though light as air, are as strong as links of iron. Let the colonies always keep the idea of their civil rights associated with your government, they will cling and grapple to you, and no force under heaven will be of power to tear them from their allegiance. But let it be once understood, that your government may be one thing, and their privileges another; that these two things may exist without any mutual relation; the cement is gone; the cohesion is loosened; and every thing hastens to decay and dissolution. As long as you have the wisdom to keep the sovereign authority of this country as the sanctuary of liberty, the sacred temple consecrated to our common faith, wherever the chosen race and sons of England worship freedom, they will turn their faces toward you. The more they multiply, the more friends you will have; the more ardently they love liberty, the more perfect will be their obedience. Slavery they can have any where. It is a weed that grows in every soil. They may have it from Spain, they may have it from Prussia. But until you become lost to all feeling of your true interest and your natural dignity, freedom they can have from none but you. This is the commodity of price, of which you have the monopoly. This is the true act of navigation, which binds to you the commerce of the colonies, and through them secures to you the wealth of the world. Is it not the same virtue which does every thing for us here in England? Do you imagine then, that it is the land-tax which raises your revenue? that it is the annual vote in the Committee of Supply, which gives you your army? or that it is the Mutiny Bill which inspires it with bravery and discipline? No! surely no! It is the love of the people; it is their attachment to their government, from the sense of the deep stake they have in such a glorious institution, which gives you your army and your navy, and infuses into both that liberal obedience, without which your army would be a base rabble, and your navy nothing but rotten timber."

state those facts to shew the general feeling. It had been said, that cases might be cited of great enormity, and by that means imputations might be thrown upon a whole community. It was by no means his intention to estimate the British or any other character from cases of particular cruelty, but he should mention the case on which he was about to enter, merely for the purpose of shewing what was the general feeling on such subjects. In that case, the same Mr. Huggins who had been formerly the subject of conversation, was materially concerned; that person was still, he believed, a man of considerable opulence and influence in the island of Nevis. He had been before brought to trial for cruelty to slaves of his own, and there had been a general opinion against him. He had been lately brought to trial for cruelty towards the slaves of another. A Mr. Cottle had appointed him his attorney when he left the island. The case was, that he whipped two boys very severely who were charged with theft; they were two very young lads, who had been accused of receiving a pair of stockings that had been stolen. They were stated to be very young, and not to have suffered any punishment before. Huggins ordered them to have each 100 lashes. By law, 39 lashes was the utmost punishment of the kind that was permitted; but Huggins, as Mr. Cottle's attorney, by his own authority, sentenced the boys to receive 100 lashes each, and they did receive them. He related the facts from notes taken on the trial, on the accuracy of which, he believed, he could depend. There were present at the infliction of the punishment two female slaves; one was the sister of one of the boys, and the other a relation who had been treated with great kindness by Mr. Cottle. For no other offence than their having shed tears, he ordered them, the one 30 lashes, and the other 20. Huggins was brought to trial by the senior king's counsel, exercising the duties of attorney-general; the facts were established, he was acquitted, and it was thought a most odious interposition on the part of the attorney-general. If such a prejudice existed against interference between the master and the slave, he thought it ought as soon as possible to be destroyed. The opinion of the attorney-general, to which reference had been made on the subject, he should take the liberty of reading. The hon. and learned gentleman then read the opinion, the substance of which was, that the governor could not pardon a slave who had been condemned to labour by his master for any offence, to be assured of which it was only necessary to examine the definition of slavery. The opinion then defined slavery, and shewed that a slave could have no civil rights, but was the exclusive property of his master, equally transferrable with any other possession.—The hon. gentleman concluded by moving, that an humble address be presented to his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, praying that he would be pleased to order to be laid before the house "copies or extracts from all despatches, letters, and papers, in the office of his Majesty's principal secretary of state for the colonial department, which in any manner relate to the cases of John Baptiste Louis Birmingham, Alexander Le Guay, and John M'Corry, against whom bills of indictment were preferred by his Majesty's attorney-general for the island of Dominica, and to the presentment made by the grand Jury of the same island on the 4th day of February 1817, and to any presentment made by the grand jury at Dominica at any subsequent period, which in any manner relate to the power of the owners of slaves in the same island to send their slaves to be kept to hard labour in the public chain, and to the right which the governor may have, by virtue of the royal prerogative, to remit the punishment of slaves so condemned by their masters to be kept to hard labour."—Also "Copies or extracts from all despatches, letters, and papers, in the office of his Majesty's principal secretary of state for the colonial department, which in any manner relate to the case of Edward Huggins the elder, tried in the island of Nevis, in May last, for cruelty to certain slaves under his charge."

Mr. Goulburn said, that, as on the one hand, it would not be supposed that he should give credit to accusations without complete evidence, so, on the other hand, he could not be expected to stand up in his place to defend cases of the deep hue which the hon. and learned gentleman had made the subject of his speech. It would not be expected by that house, or any individual in it, that he should defend persons, either the principals in, or accessory to, acts such as had been described. All that he wished was, that, in considering the subject, the house would guard against forming any opinion till they heard the other side of the question. He might appeal to the hon. and learned gentleman himself, whether, in the larger islands, there were not the most beneficial legislative enactments for the protection of slaves; and he might also appeal to him on the subject of the feeling and temper in their favour. He might appeal to the improvements that had been made in agriculture, which materially diminished their labour, and the improvements in the estates. In the islands to which he alluded, the principles there laid down were not intrenched upon. In Jamaica, there were slaves possessed of considerable property; there were, indeed, instances in which they had bought their freedom by the earnings of their own industry. He appealed to the hon. member for Stockbridge (Mr. Barham), who had stated, that he himself had been the purchaser of considerable property from slaves, and he had declared at the time that that was not the only instance of the kind he had known. In judging of the case before them, the house could not come to any conclusion without having upon the table the whole of the evidence. With respect to the case in the island of Nevis, he could say nothing; as, having been ignorant of the hon. and learned gentleman's intention to allude to it, he had not collected the necessary information. Indeed, he was not sure whether such information had yet reached the office to which he belonged. If it had, he should have no objection to produce it. He hoped the house would do him the credit to believe, that he would not stand forward to defend any criminal, or to palliate any cruelty. The best means of exposing the one, and of preventing the other, was to lay full information before parliament, to keep a watchful eye on the transactions of our colonies, and to express an utter abhorrence of all cruel and unjust treatment, like that detailed by the hon. and learned gentleman, if the accounts of it were supported on proper evidence. He had no objection to produce the papers moved for, so far as he could; but he begged that the house would excuse the imperfect state in which it might be in his power to grant the requisite information.

Mr. Smyth was happy to hear such sentiments as those uttered by his hon. friend, and to learn his readiness to communicate the desired information. It was with great satisfaction he likewise heard that the state of society in the West India islands was improving, and that it was not nearly so bad in the larger and more populous as in the smaller islands; but while this progress towards amelioration was calculated to give satisfaction, it was not sufficient to warrant the house in withdrawing its superintendence or relaxing its vigilance. Much had been done, but much yet remained to be accomplished. When he considered, that in none of the colonies any steps had been taken to encourage the manumission of slaves; when he considered the treatment to which, in all the colonies, they were still subject; when he considered, that the cart-whip was still resorted to as an instrument of discipline; when he considered that slaves were still discredited as witnesses, and that their evidence could not be taken in a court of justice; when he considered, that such a state of servitude as this existed in all our colonies, however modified by the individual humanity of the masters, he could not help thinking it the duty both of this and the other house of parliament to keep a watchful eye over that part of the British dominions, for the protection of those who might be exposed to oppression.

Mr. A. Grant said, he did not rise to oppose the motion, or to abet the practices to which it referred. The cruelties stated by the hon. and learned gentleman, if his statement should be found to be supported on proper evidence, had his unqualified abhorrence. As he was ignorant of the grounds on which those statements rested, he could not object to their truth, nor could he complain that they had been brought forward. There were parts of the hon. and learned gentleman's speech, to the spirit and tendency of which he strongly objected. He alluded to those parts of it in which he stated, that in Dominica and Nevis, there was a disposition to enact laws for the protection of the slaves, which were never intended to be executed, and then appealed to the fact asserted of those two islands as a proof of the general spirit and disposition of all our West India colonies. He did not mean to find fault with the general tone and temper of the hon. and learned gentleman's speech, in which he professed a wish to be conciliatory; but he would appeal to his candour, whether such a sweeping inference ought to be drawn regarding the whole of our colonial possessions, from the instance of two of the most insignificant? He did not know the amount of the population of those two islands; but he could say, that it was very inconsiderable when compared with the rest. While they scarcely shipped six hogsheads of sugar to this country, Jamaica alone sent 130,000 hogsheads. How unfair was it, therefore, to apply the language which might be spoken of possessions so insignificant to the state of society and the principles of legislation prevalent in all the other islands? He could assure the hon. and learned gentleman that the legislation of the large colonies was conducted on very different principles from those which he had stated. No law was made in Jamaica which was not enacted on the perfect conviction of justice and policy, and which was not intended to be applied and executed. The hon. and learned gentleman had asked, whether an interference between master and slave was not always discouraged in the colonies, and strongly objected to on the part of the planters. He would answer the appeal in the affirmative, so far as legislation was concerned, and so far as those not sufficiently acquainted with the circumstances of both might wish to interfere; but this admission did not apply to persons within the islands. Nothing, indeed, was more common, as he could assert on his own personal knowledge, than the latter kind of interference. When a slave was ordered to receive punishment by his master, it was a very general practice for him to slip away privately to tell some neighbouring planter, and beg his intercession for a remission or mitigation of his sentence. If a slave were met going on this mission and asked his object, he would answer, that he was going to get a ticket, by which was meant a letter from a clergyman or magistrate requesting a pardon or a mitigation of punishment. This intercession was often effectual, and never objected to. If, then, a master was willing to tolerate the interference of the characters whom he had mentioned, who were clothed with comparatively little authority, was it to be believed that he would object to that of the highest law officer in the colony? The attorney-general in Jamaica might be often, from the great extent of the island, at the distance of 100 or 120 miles, and therefore could not be applied to on all occasions; but was it to be believed that masters who admitted the interference of the minor authority, would object to that of the higher? When he considered this and similar charges of the hon. and learned gentleman, he must say, without meaning any disrespect, that his speech was conciliatory in its words, but injurious in its tendency. It began by complaining of certain practices in the islands of Dominica and Nevis, and then applied the inference drawn from those practices to Jamaica and all the West India islands. If such a speech went forth uncontradicted to the public, as, from the interest attached to the subject, it certainly would do, he submitted to the house that it might produce very wrong impressions regarding the character of the West India proprietors. Its object was not to misrepresent, but its tendency was. He need mention nothing further to shew this tendency than the reference to the state of St. Domingo, which persons ill informed, or willing to be deceived, might apply to the state of society in the British possessions. To confirm impressions so created, the house, whenever punishment was mentioned, heard of the cart-whip, by which an idea of the severity and cruelty of the treatment of slaves was meant to be conveyed. (Hear, hear, from Sir Samuel Romilly, who asked across the table, was the instrument of punishment not a whip?) Most undoubtedly it was a whip; but why use the odious and invidious term of a cart-whip, implying a brutal infliction of severity, instead of a necessary correction? In what the hon. and learned gentleman had said about public chains, there was the same tendency to mislead. He did not deny that forced labour in chains existed in Jamaica. Runaway negroes were put into a workhouse and chained for the purpose of security. Various species of punishments were resorted to on the island, suited to the different kinds of offences. One of these punishments was transportation, and between the passing of this sentence and its execution, the slaves were confined in a workhouse, and compelled to labour in chains. These chains, however, were employed more for the purpose of preventing escape than inflicting punishment; and the work to which they were compelled was rather intended to promote their health, than to gain any thing by their industry in this situation. They neither suffered in this case from their labour or their chains. The hon. and learned gentleman, in speaking of the 100 lashes inflicted in one of the islands, had stated truly that only 39 could be inflicted in Jamaica. This, he had reason to believe, was not regarded by the slaves themselves as a very severe punishment, and he should be glad if circumstances would permit its severity to be lessened. He had never seen the punishment inflicted in his life, but he could judge of it from what he had seen. He had sometimes been applied to for a ticket similar to that to which he alluded, either for a remission or a mitigation of punishment. Slaves were sometimes sentenced to be corrected by the stocks (similar to those used in this country) or by solitary confinement; and in such cases those who applied to him, if they had no prospect of a full pardon, begged that he would interfere to get that species of punishment commuted into the 39 lashes. This preference sufficiently shewed that those lashes did not cause so great suffering as was generally imagined, or were inflicted with that severity which was generally described.

Mr. A. Browne said, he acquitted the hon. and learned mover of all intention to mislead; but he certainly had applied his talents to give a colouring to some of his statements, and particularly to the case of Nevis, which was not warranted. With some parts of that case the hon. and learned gentleman was totally unacquainted. The severity of which he complained did not exist. Without any evidence before him, either of the nature of the crime or the extent of the punishment, he had assumed too much in describing the latter as of unparalleled severity. The hon. and learned gentleman was too well acquainted with the law, and too intimate with the rules of that profession of which he was so distinguished an ornament, to have been led into the observations which he had made, if his humanity had not prevailed over his judgment. The only evidence he had was the verdict of a grand jury, who decided that the punishment was not severe, and acquitted the person against whom the charge of cruelty was brought. Yet, notwithstanding this, the hon. and learned gentleman had assumed not only that great cruelty existed in this case, but that a similar spirit of harshness and severity extended over the whole of the West India islands. (No, no, from Sir S. Romilly.) If the planters in Dominica or Nevis were guilty of oppressive acts, let the odium fall upon themselves, and not extend to our other possessions where such acts were not practised. The hon. and learned gentleman should remember, that with regard to the case of Huggins, the return of the grand jury who acquitted him was made on oath, and there was not one tittle of evidence to prove that their verdict was wrong. The hon. and learned gentleman did not require to be told that the conduct of men who acted under the solemn obligation of an oath ought not to be arraigned except on very strong grounds. If the present motion should be agreed to, and evidence obtained to prove that the grand jury were wrong, he would not be their apologist, nor oppose any remedy to prevent the recurrence of the abuses of which they had been guilty. He had stated, that a colour had been given to the transactions in the island of Nevis which did not belong to them. He was not acquainted with the facts till yesterday evening, when the respectable agent for the colony waited upon him, and gave the account which, with every claim for indulgence for the imperfect manner in which he should bring it forward, speaking only from memory, he would now detail to the house. He was no apologist for Mr. Huggins. He regretted that he was brought before the country in a way that reflected disgrace on himself, and extended suspicion over others; but he did not see how he could be condemned unheard, and without evidence of his guilt. The circumstances were as follow:—A negro belonging to a person for whom Huggins acted as attorney, was concerned in a theft. Two others received the stolen goods. There was no doubt of their crime. They were ordered to receive, so far as he knew, 100 lashes. (Hear, hear, hear.) He did not know what was the punishment ordered, but he was sure that what was inflicted was so slight as not to prevent them from going to a negro-masquerade the night after, in which the one supported the character of Buonaparte, and the other that of the duke of Wellington. (A laugh.) With respect to the women, the representations of the hon. and learned gentleman, however pathetic, were wrong: they were not punished because they shed tears at the sight of the sufferings of their friends, but for being guilty of yells and cries to prevent that punishment. They were not tears of sorrow, but of obstinacy, to prevent subordination. It was true that one of them was the servant of Cottle, but she had been dismissed for bad behaviour and sent to the fields. For these measures he had received the approbation of Mr. Cottle himself. As for the island favouring this severity, the charge was totally unfounded: the council and assembly had ordered a prosecution, and to give the trial greater solemnity, had sent to the neighbouring island of St. Kitts, for the assistance of the attorney general. This shewed no feeling of kindness towards Mr. Huggins, but a desire to bring him to justice. The jury had acquitted him: and it was too much for the hon. and learned gentleman to say, without any evidence to the contrary, that they acquitted him improperly. The governor had afterwards written him a letter, expressing his approbation of the decision of the jury. He would not speak of Dominica; but if the acts stated by the hon. and learned gentleman existed there, he would join with him in condemning them, and would agree to any remedy to prevent their recurrence; and he was sure that, if such a remedy were found, the hon. and learned gentleman would receive the thanks of the whole slave population, of the planters, and of mankind.

Sir James Macintosh observed, that the barbarities of Huggins had not once been denied by the hon. gentleman who spoke last, and he must therefore consider them as an undisputed truth. This, indeed, was the universal opinion concerning them; and, under such circumstances, what was his surprise at hearing the hon. gentleman read a certificate of approbation of Huggins's conduct from a person who was capable of employing him in the management and superintendence of slaves, towards whom he had been guilty of barbarities which had excited universal indignation. So far was such a certificate from affording any presumption of this man's innocence, or any extenuation of his crimes, that it could be considered in no other light than as the testimony of a leading criminal, himself implicated in or accessory to the cruelty: his testimony was presumptive of the guilt of both: it was against the master, and not in favour of the servant. The hon. gentleman had admitted the punishment of the boys for theft, and of the women for sympathizing in their distress, while suffering under the lash. The hon. gentleman, too, had complained, that the hon. and learned mover had put his own colour upon the transaction: but it was the hon. gentleman himself that had put a colour on the business, for he admitted the facts to be the same as those that had been stated. The hon. gentleman had affirmed that the tears of the women were not tears of sorrow, but yells; he (Sir J. Macintosh) might say, that they were yells of horror; but the hon. gentleman said, that they were yells of obstinacy. How was the hon. gentleman enabled to distinguish with such minute nicety between these different species of sound? Undoubtedly, they were violent expressions of emotion from persons who were spectators of a punishment inflicted on those who were dear to them. But the hon. gentleman said, they were yells of obstinacy, were expressions of mutiny! How did he know that? Perhaps this was the only instance in modern barbarity of spectators having been punished for a mere expression of sympathy. Never but once had it occurred even in Roman history; and he had heard Mr. Pitt once repeat from Livy, on a melancholy occasion, as the highest aggravation of infliction, that, ne gemitus quidem populi Romani fuit liber. The hon. gentleman had said, that the council and assembly had agreed that Huggins should be prosecuted, and had sent for the attorney-general of a neighbouring island to conduct the prosecution more solemnly; and that they, therefore, could not be implicated in the cruelties, if any, committed by Huggins. But this was a proof at least of their sense of Huggins's enormities; they probably used every means to bring him to account, and it appeared that they went out of their way to further an act of justice: but would they have done this, unless it had been absolutely necessary, and was it not almost conclusive against Huggins? The hon. gentleman had added, that the governor of Nevis had written a letter expressing his approbation of Huggins's conduct. In what part of the performance of his duty had governor Probyn done this? Were we to suppose that the governor had any connexion with this Huggins (hear, hear), that he could in any way communicate with one so polluted, so degraded, and so abhorred? The letter could not have been of a public nature, for its contents would then have been known. It could not have been a private communication, for it was not to be believed that the governor could be connected with one who was not merely an object of horror, but whose very touch was contagious, and whose presence was an abomination. What, then, could have been the subject of that epistle? Was it necessary to heal the wound that had been inflicted on this injured individual? Was it necessary to remove the stain from the name of this spotless character? He had no feeling of hostility to the inhabitants of the West Indies, but he did not think their cause or character would be served by a defence which bore such a character of exaggerated statement. As to the case of Dominica, he had one thing to observe. The hon. gentleman had not adverted to the principal point; that point was, not that the grand jury had in some cases found no bill, or that the petty jury had acquitted in others; they might both of them have acted thus in the exercise of their constitutional functions. The charge against the grand jury was, not for exercising a lawful right, but for overstepping all right; for making the bill presented to be found by the grand jury, a nuisance; and by doing this, they had forfeited all the character of a grand jury. Could any man justify such conduct, or say, that there was so much as the shadow of a pretence for it? The hon. gentleman in omitting this altogether, had observed the rule of an ancient writer—Quæ desperat tractata nitescere posse, relinquit. In consequence of the grand jury throwing out the bill, directions were issued by the governor to the attorney-general to prosecute on an ex-officio information. That being done, the grand jury which had attacked the right to present by indictment as a nuisance, proceeded next to attack the prerogative of the crown, to proceed by information ex-officio as a nuisance also. They thus barred up all the avenues to justice. They had put a negative upon the clause of Magna Charta, which says, nulli negabimus, nulli differemus, nulli vendemus, justitiam vel rectum. Not only was no justice done, but it was deemed a nuisance and public offence to attempt the attainment of it. If that were not their purpose, it was not very easy to conceive with what design they had presented the indictment as a nuisance. After all the feeling and heartfelt anxiety with which his hon. and learned friend had brought forward this motion, (a feeling that was infinitely more creditable to him than the mere professional talent on the score of which the hon. gentleman had thought fit to compliment him,) it was to to be hoped that some notice would be taken of conduct which it was intended not merely to complain of, but to shew to have been inconsistent with all law and justice whatever. It was clear that they had heard of a contempt of all authority, of the scorn in which laws had been held, and of outrages against humanity: and it was on those grounds that his hon. and learned friend thought it his duty to inform himself of the state of the island, in order to restore or give to it that blessing of equal law which was the best part of good government, and that for which our political institutions were chiefly valuable.

Mr. Marryat thought it unfortunate that there was no one in the house immediately acquainted with the island of Dominica and its laws: not being so himself, he could not enter much into the discussion. The hon. and learned gentleman had certainly quoted laws which seemed to be very barbarous, but we had many in our own statute book that were equally so. But a gentleman of Dominica had desired him to explain the presentment made by the grand jury, and he had it there from the foreman of the jury. On reading the indictment, he had felt the same impression as the hon. and learned gentleman, and as every one else would feel, that the jury had acted illegally; but, on explanation, this impression had been wholly altered. It appeared, that the presentment was made in a very different view from that which would be supposed on reading it: it had not been their intention to present all indictments as a nuisance, but only such as were presented without sufficient evidence to support them. This appeared in the case of Mr. Birmingham. There had been a mutiny among his slaves: they had been indicted, but escaped on a flaw; (for there were flaws in indictments there as well as here;) he was enraged at this, and his slaves refused to serve any longer under a coloured freeman; he then had them secured and sent to the market-place, where they were punished illegally. The grand jury complained that, on an indictment for this offence, there was not any evidence brought forward; the clerk of the market, the only evidence, not being produced, and the jury were obliged to find no bill. The presentment alleging such bills unsupported by evidence to be a nuisance, was so well understood, that the attorney-general was reprimanded for not doing his duty. Another instance of the same sort had occurred, and this sufficiently explained the nature of the presentment, to which he thought there could be no objection on these principles, because nothing tended so much to discontent, as ideas among the negroes that white men were not convicted for offences. There was not the same precision in language in that country as here, or so much legal learning as the hon. mover possessed: and where a body was concerned in the framing of an instrument, every man would put in his word, and it was generally drawn up incorrectly in the end. The printed papers before the house did not give all the evidence that was necessary. It seemed as if juries were unwilling to convict white men; but the same jury had very lately convicted a white man for the murder of a negro: a Mr. Stranach had shot at a female slave in the act of running away; and at such a distance that he could not overtake her. As to the presentment of the ex-officio information, he had never seen or heard of it; and he was equally ignorant of the circumstances of the trials that had taken place. But he should be sorry if ex-officio informations were substituted for regular proceedings. It had been lately hinted, that ministers meant to set aside trials by jury in this country, by raising a religious cry against juries; he hoped they would not do this at Dominica. However, the fact that had occurred in that island required investigation, and the papers ought to be laid fairly before the house.

Mr. Wilberforce was desirous that inquiry should be made. An hon. gentleman had endeavoured to throw a ludicrous light on the business by talking of negroes going to masquerades; but the state of slavery must still be dreadful, when it appeared that a father had flogged his own son. He had a letter from a person in the colony which stated this fact, and that the writer never saw a severer punishment inflicted. It was, indeed, dreadful, when women were punished for weeping. But the hon. gentleman had been silent as to another fact, namely, that one of these women was in a state which should naturally excite sympathy and compassion, and that her arm had been broken. This had not been denied: however, he almost regretted that so much stress had been laid on individual acts of cruelty. It was not such acts alone, but the slow, grinding, effects of slavery, the moral degradation of man, both master and servant, that was the greatest evil. In Dominica, the slaves were in general better off than in Jamaica; but in Jamaica there were not the same laws to obstruct manumission. Still the great evil of degradation remained. Mr. Burke had said, that what had been done by the West India assemblies was a trifle, because it was destitute of executory principle. Sympathy was the soul of humanity: but there was none in the West Indies, and that constituted the difference between West India slaves, and the slaves of the ancient world, or the villeins of Europe. There was no person in the ancient world who might not by the reverses of war become a slave, and among that class were philosophers and men of genius. This kept up a sympathy between them and their masters*: but, with respect to the West India slave, it had been stated in that house, that he was not our fellow-creature. In Jamaica, indeed, the slaves had the right of giving evidence, but there was no sympathy even then; and in no place were they worse off in this respect than in Barbadoes, the island that had been longest settled, and which so resembled this country, that it had been called Little Britain. After all the parade which the hon. gentleman had made about the crime of theft, the boys mentioned in the present business had stolen only a pair of stockings; and to proceed with violence for such an offence, was indeed a piece of cruelty that would not be tolerated in any other country. It had been said, that those who spoke on this subject in parliament treated the whole people of the West Indies with unnecessary harshness; but, surely, while such an instrument as the cart-whip was ordinarily employed, much more severe in its inflictions than the cat-o'-nine-tails, because it cut even masses of flesh, how was it possible to speak with mildness? One of the greatest evils was, however, the state of moral degradation; the condition of concubinage in which some of the slaves lived, without marriage or any other religious form; so much so, that one of the missionaries who had attempted to unite two slaves by bans, had been prevented from doing so. Another mischief adverted to so strongly by Mr. Bryan Edwards, in his "History of the West Indies," was, the annexation of slaves to estates, who were transferred with them from hand to hand for the payment of debts; yet not a single island had adopted any measure for altering this system, and a sum amounting to 500*l*. had not unfrequently been paid for manumission. Above all, it was important to improve the education and morals of the negroes, to raise them from their present state of degradation, and to advance them by degrees to a condition of domestic competence and comfort. He was well convinced, that the Africans were as capable of improvement, intellectual and moral, as any other uncivilized people.

Mr. W. Smith congratulated the house on the change which had recently taken place in the island of Jamaica. Those who were formerly most forward in resisting any interference with regard to slaves, were now the most ready to co-operate with parliament. There was a material distinction between Jamaica and the smaller islands of the West Indies. He had been most happy to hear that night, for the first time, the slaves of the West Indies recognized as subjects of his Majesty. Had this been earlier attended to, 9000 persons in the island of Nevis would not have remained under the control of 500 whites, at the head of whom was Mr. Huggins, with whom, after all that had been said and was

* It is certain, that the most liberal and expanded sentiments are generated by an early acquaintance with the writers of Greece and Rome. And yet, no one can look back to those republics as the patterns of civil liberty, or the seats of just government. In Athens alone there were 400,000 slaves, and only 31,000 freemen. In the small island of Ægina, there were 470,000 slaves. It was common for a private citizen of Rome to have 10 or 20,000. In general, those wretched beings were exposed to every evil that the most wanton tyranny could inflict. At Sparta, the Helots were often murdered in cold blood. At Rome, the slaves suffered every insult and every injury, without redress. (Cum in servos OMNIA liceant, &c. Seneca de Clement. i. 18.) They were compelled frequently to till the ground in chains, or confined in subterraneous dungeons, and strained to labour beyond their strength. Catenati cultores, vincti fossores are expressions which often occur in the Roman authors. It was this degraded condition of by far the greatest part of the inhabitants of Greece and Rome which made Liberty so estimable to their writers. The sense of their own happiness was heightened by contrasting it with the miseries of the slaves, and hence they always mentioned the word Liberty with enthusiastic fondness. —See Dr. Taylor's Civil Law, passim.

Sir S. Romilly replied; observing, that he had not intended to cast any imputation upon the whole of the West Indies, or to imply, from the conduct of the white inhabitants of two of the smaller islands, that the white population of the rest deserved equal reprobation. He said, that, from the trial, the story of the masquerade must be incorrect. One of the witnesses, a driver, deposed, that, six days after, there were marks of severity on the negroes, such as he had never before observed. The girls who were punished, it was distinctly stated on the trial, did not scream; they covered their faces, and shed tears. An hon. gentleman had been offended at the word "cart-whip," but this was the phrase which was used on the trial, and, as it thence appeared, the common word in the island.

The motion was then agreed to, and the house adjourned till the 24th instant.

Friday, April 24.

OFFICERS WIDOWS' PENSIONS.] The Marquis of Lansdowne rose to move, that there be laid before the house a copy of the regulation of the war-office, of the 17th February last, for taking the usual pension from such widows of officers of the army as have an income equal to double the amount of the allowance to which they would be entitled by their husbands' rank. He made this motion for the purpose of bringing under consideration a regulation, which appeared to him exceedingly objectionable. It would not be necessary for him to use many words, nor to make strong appeals to the feelings of their lordships, in order to convince them of the impropriety, and, he might say, the injustice of this regulation. The reduction contemplated by the regulation applied to a description of persons, and a scale of pensions, which ought, in fairness, as well as in liberality, to remain untouched. The fund from which these pensions were derived, was founded and supported by the army itself. It commenced in the reign of queen Anne: and in the year 1782 the fund had so far accumulated, that 200,000*l.* was taken away from it, and applied to other purposes. In justice, therefore, this sum ought to be repaid before any deduction was made from the pensions. The widows of officers were at least entitled to their pensions on the usual scale to the full extent of that sum, so far as it might go. The sum allowed to widows was, for those of superior officers 120*l.*, for widows of captains about 50*l.*, and for ensigns' widows about 30*l.* Now, he would ask their lordships, whether the circumstance of a colonel dying, and leaving property to the amount of 200*l.* a-year, should be considered a reason for depriving his widow of her pension? If a captain left only 100*l.* a-year, the case was still harder, as according to this regulation, his widow would be deprived of the small pension to which she would otherwise have been entitled. It was worthy of remark, too, that very little could be saved by this measure of severity, for it appeared, that it would not require more than 90,000*l.* to pay the pensions of the persons who came within the scope of the regulation. It appeared to him, that, whether their lordships looked to the origin of the fund, to the justice of the claims upon it, to the great inconvenience of instituting a strict inquisition into the property of the claimants, or to the temptation to fraud which that inquisition would create, it would be impossible for them to consider this regulation as one which was fit to be persevered in. He was, however, happy to hear that it had been resolved to make the regulations undergo some modification, which would be, in a certain degree, satisfactory, though they would not altogether remove his objections. He concluded by moving for a copy of the regulation, and also for an account of the number of officers' widows whose pensions would be reduced by enforcing it.

The Earl of Liverpool did not mean to object to the production of the papers, but wished to explain what had been the view of his Majesty's government. It was perfectly clear that these pensions, from whatever source they originated, were never considered as a matter of right. It had been the practice, both with regard to the army and the navy, to make provision by pensions for the widows of officers: but those pensions were always granted on a memorial being presented, stating the individual to be in necessitous circumstances. In the navy, the nature and amount of these pensions were strictly defined, and a person applying had to make an affidavit, stating that she had not been left property to the annual amount of double the pension for which she applied. With regard to the army, a different rule had prevailed. No sum was defined, and the memorialist merely stated, that she had no pension from the government, and no property left by her late husband, capable of affording her a reasonable maintenance. The statement being thus quite indefinite, the practice with regard to pensions became liable to considerable abuse. It was true, as the noble marquis had stated, that a fund had been established for widows' pensions at a very early period. It was first created out of the appointments of two troops of horse which were reduced. After the institution of that fund, the words respecting necessitous circumstances of the parties had, by neglect, been omitted in the warrants granting pensions; but they were restored in 1770, and after that date all warrants stated the grant to be made in consequence of the death of the husband and the distressed circumstances of the widow. It was evident, therefore, from the very form of the warrant, that the circumstances of the widow were always understood to be taken into consideration in granting the pension. No definite sum, however, being mentioned, a practice had prevailed of granting the pension without a strict reference to the circumstances of the claimant, and it was the object of the regulation to correct this abuse. The arguments urged by the noble marquis on this question must apply to the navy with as much justice as to the army, if he found the right to the pension money withdrawn from the pay of the officer. A rate is paid on the pay, half-pay, and pensions of naval officers towards the widows' fund, and yet the pensions for the widows of these officers were regulated by a scale similar to that laid down in the regulation of the war-office. It was certainly desirable that the two services should be placed on the same footing, and this was the sole object of the regulation complained of. It had been thought right to remove all doubts with respect to the army, by adopting a regulation similar to that which governed the pensions for the widows of naval officers. It had, however, been represented to him, that many individuals, conceiving that their widows were of right entitled to the pension of their rank, had ensured their lives to enable them to make a further provision for their families, and had, perhaps, undergone considerable privations in order to accomplish that object. He was therefore of opinion, that the regulation ought to be modified so far as to prevent it from having any retrospective effect with regard to cases of this description. But as a prospective measure, he considered it highly proper, because it placed the two services on an equality. The words which were formerly admitted as sufficient in the memorials for pensions to widows of military officers, were far too loose and indefinite, and it was proper to introduce the precise form of the naval affidavits. At the same time it had been thought advisable to make another alteration, leaving to the widows both of naval and military officers the power of receiving the pension if they had not an income equal to four times its amount. He trusted this modification of the regulation would be found to be dictated by that liberality which was due towards the individuals who were its objects, while it would at the same time perfectly assimilate the two services with regard to widows' pensions.

The Earl of Rosslyn was happy to hear the statement which the noble earl had made. The modification he had mentioned would remove many of the objections to which the regulation was liable. But, notwithstanding all that had been said by the noble earl, he still considered the pensions to officers' widows a matter of right. He considered that the purchase of commissions placed the right of officers of the army on a stronger footing than those of the navy. The sale of commissions was a saving to the government: for they were first permitted to be sold as a means of providing for old and disabled officers. If, however, an officer died without selling his commission, or was killed in battle, the whole money he had laid out in the purchase of rank was lost to his family. Nothing then remained for his widow but the pension, which she ought, therefore, to be considered as of right entitled to, whatever might be her circumstances.

Lord Exmouth approved of the arrangement proposed by the noble earl, which he considered fair and liberal towards the navy.

The Marquis of Lansdowne expressed his satisfaction at the explanation which the noble secretary of state had given; and the question being put, the motion was agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, April 24.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.] Mr. Hornby presented 26 petitions of inhabitants of Preston, praying for reform and universal suffrage, signed by 20 persons each.—Ordered to lie on the table.

LUNATIC ASYLUMS (SCOTLAND) BILL.] Lord A. Hamilton presented a petition of Commissioners of Supply, and others, of the county of Argyll, against this bill. Also, a petition of noblemen, freeholders, and others, of the county of Lanark.—Ordered to lie on the table.

Breach of Privilege.] Mr. Wynn brought up the Report of the Committee of Privileges respecting the complaint of the letter written to a voter of the county of Lanark, to influence his vote in the election of a member to serve in parliament, by Thomas Ferguson, in breach of the privileges of this house, as follows :—" That Thomas Ferguson hath admitted himself to be the author and writer of the said letter, and that it was addressed to William Dykes, a freeholder of the county of Lanark, with the intention of influencing his vote for the said county, but that he hath also expressly stated that his assertions therein contained " that he had communicated Mr. Dykes's application for a situation under government in behalf of a friend to the lord Douglas, and that his lordship had authorized the offer contained in the said letter," were perfectly false and groundless, and that he had never had any communication with the lord Douglas on the subject.—The house then resolved, " that the said letter is a corrupt attempt to subvert the freedom and independence of election, and a high breach of the privileges of the house ;" and Thomas Ferguson was ordered to be taken into the custody of the serjeant at arms.

British Museum—Dr. Burney's Library.] On the order of the day being read for going into a committee of supply,

Mr. Bankes moved, " That the report respecting the purchase of the late Reverend Dr. Charles Burney's library of manuscripts and printed books, be referred to the committee."

Mr. Bennet asked, whether the proposed grant had the consent of the crown ?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, it had.

Mr. Bennet said, he wished to ascertain this point, as that consent had been refused to a claim of justice, which was now given to a grant of munificence.

Mr. Curwen said, that if the hon. member pressed the motion for referring the report to the committee, he should feel it his duty to divide the house upon it. He had, for the same reason, opposed former plans. Whatever might be the actual value of this collection, it could only be expected to be useful to a few. They had lately refused grants to the royal family; and, in the present circumstances of the country, they ought to pause before they agreed to vote away such sums.—The house divided.

Ayes, 79—Noes, 35.

Pardons under the Great Seal Bill.] On the motion of Mr. F. Douglas the house resolved itself into a committee on this bill, and the report was ordered to be brought up on Monday next.

Poor Laws Amendment Bill.] The house went into a committee on this bill, which was read clause by clause.

Mr. D. Gilbert proposed an amendment in that clause which enabled parishes to expend a greater sum in one year than one shilling in the pound would raise, in purchasing land, or erecting buildings, for the employment of the poor. The clause, as originally framed, (see page 991) enacted, that in every case where the inhabitants should consent that a greater sum than one shilling in the pound should be expended in one year, for all or any of such purposes and objects, it should be lawful for the church-wardens and overseers, with the consent of such majority as aforesaid, of the inhabitants, &c.—To these words the hon. member proposed to add the following: " And also with the consent of two-thirds in value of the persons possessing the freehold, copyhold, or leasehold interest of the said parish, such leasehold interest not being inferior to a term of 15 years unexpired, or for a longer term, determinable on the death of one or more lives, bodies politic and corporate, whether aggregate or sole, trustees, guardians, and incapacitated persons, being capable of consenting, to be given and signed in the manner hereinbefore directed."

Mr. Sturges Bourne said, that he individually agreed with the hon. member, but the bill had been drawn up, not by him, but by a gentleman well acquainted with such matters, and he had no doubt that he had drawn it up conformably to all former bills of the same kind.

Sir Charles Monck thought it wrong in principle, and dangerous in its consequences, to burden posterity for the benefit of the present generation. This was to impose permanent burdens on real property, for the accommodation of those whose property was less stationary.

Mr. Sturges Bourne replied, that the building of workhouses, according to the act of Geo. I., was liable to the same objections. Workhouses were not for one generation. Yet, if such erec-tions were made, of which posterity were to have the advantage as well as the existing generation, why should not posterity bear part of the expense? Much advantage had been experienced in many parishes, by applying money secured upon the poor-rates to the purchase of small portions of land upon which industrious paupers might be employed. He thought it right, therefore, that this power should be reserved to them.

Lord Compton suggested, that if the land were purchased out of the parish funds, it might be sold under the same authority; at least he did not perceive any provision in the bill to prevent it.

Sir C. Monck thought the poor laws the last of all public taxes or impositions that ought to be left subject to mortgage. It was money raised expressly for present uses, and could not be diverted to other purposes, without an abandonment, pro tanto, of their original principle.

Mr. D. Gilbert defended the clause as analogous to the proceeding usually adopted in assessing the county rate. The evil, against which they had to provide, could not be redressed at one effort, and the only course left them to pursue, was one of gradual experiment.

Sir C. Monck observed, that the allusion of the hon. member to the mode of raising county-money for particular purposes, was incorrect. In all ordinary cases, provision was made for the increased expense by an augmentation of the rate; and if the object in view related to the erection of new bridges, or works of a public and permanent nature, application was always made for a special act of parliament.

The amendment was then put and carried.

The next clause was, that the owners of any house or houses, apartments or dwellings, which should respectively be let to the occupiers thereof, at any rent or rate not exceeding 20*l*., nor less than 4*l*. by the year, for any less term than one year, or on any agreement by which the rent should be reserved or made payable at or within any shorter period than three months, should be assessed to the rates for the relief of the poor, for or in respect of such houses, apartments, or dwellings, and the outhouses and curtilages thereof, instead of the actual occupiers.

Sir Charles Mordaunt said, that he had introduced a bill in the last session, on the same principle, at the request of the inhabitants of Birmingham. That bill was not approved by the house. When the committee on the poor laws was re-appointed, the inhabitants of Birmingham requested him to bring forward the subject again, but he informed them, that it would be more advisable to state the case to the committee. They acceded to that proposition, and, in consequence of the information which they had furnished, the present clause was inserted in the bill. The hon. baronet thought that it ought to be adopted.

General Thornton opposed the clause, and desired to take the sense of the committee upon it. The committee divided. For the clause 54, Against it 0.

The following clause was then proposed and agreed to. "And be it further enacted, that in any parish, not having a workhouse for the poor thereof, or where the workhouse shall be found insufficient or inconvenient, it shall be lawful for the churchwardens and overseers of the poor, by the direction of the inhabitants in vestry assembled, to erect and build in such parish a suitable workhouse, and to purchase or take on lease, any ground within the parish, for the purpose of such building; or such churchwardens and overseers may, and they are hereby authorized, to add to and enlarge any such insufficient workhouse, as the inhabitants of the parish in vestry shall think fit and direct."

The following clause was then proposed and carried. "And whereas it is expedient to discourage that reliance upon the poor's rates which frequently induces artisans, labourers and others, to squander away earnings, which would with suitable care have afforded sufficient means for the support of their families; be it further enacted, that whenever it shall appear to the justices, or to the general or select vestry, or to the overseers of the poor, to whom application shall be made for relief for any poor person, that he might, but for his extravagance, neglect, or wilful misconduct, have been able to maintain himself, or to support his family, (as the case may be,) it shall be lawful for the overseers of the poor, (by the direction of the justices, or of the general or select vestry, where application shall have been made to them respectively,) to advance money weekly or otherwise, as may be requisite to the person so applying, by way of loan only; and to take his receipt for, and engagement to repay every sum to be so advanced, (for which no stamp duty shall be required;) and it shall be lawful for any two justices, upon the application (within one year after any such loan or loans) of one or more of the overseers of the poor for the time being of the parish, to summon the person to whom any money shall have been so advanced; and if upon examination by such justices into his circumstances, it shall appear to them that such person is able, by weekly instalments or otherwise, to repay the whole or any part of the money so advanced to him, and for which he shall have given any such receipt and engagement; it shall be lawful for such justices to make an order under their hands and seals, for the repayment of the whole or of any part of such money, at such time and times, and in such proportions and manner as they shall see fit; and upon every default of payment, by their warrant to commit such person to the common gaol or house of correction, for any time not exceeding three calendar months, unless the sum and sums which shall be due and payable by virtue of such order, shall be sooner paid."

The following clause with respect to pensions was next agreed to. "And be it further enact-
